NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The result of the attack on Charleston is more unquestioned, though not more unquestionable, than any other operation of the American war, for in this instance it is impossible for the Federal authorities to conceal the completeness of the discomfiture. The Confederates, not knowing the extent of the damage sustained by the enemy, announced a disastrous repulse of the attacking fleet; the Federal accounts admit a crushing defeat. In the United States the contest has been watched with feverish anxiety, and the New York Herald no doubt represents the feeling of the North when it declares that "the repulse of the iron-clads from the gateway of Charleston, though almost bloodless in its results, may be classed among our most discouraging military disasters." When the Army of the Potomac, which the North had lavishly supplied with all the means and appliances at its command, was utterly defeated, when it was manifest that a change of Generals could not effect a change of fortune in Virginia, and when it became evident, even to the most sanguine, that the Confederate capital could not be captured, the disappointment and discontent were appeased by a promise that Charleston should be taken, and the bitter hostility of the North gratified by the utter destruction and desolation of that city. When Vicksburg and Port Hudson defied the efforts of their assailants, the people were still consoled by the assurance that Charleston should be destroyed. And the preparations for the enterprise were commensurate to its importance. A fleet of iron-clads was appointed to do the work, and success was regarded as certain. This last, or, at least, this latest, hope of the North has been signally disappointed. Charleston is not taken, and the Federals have learnt that their iron-clads are not invincible.

Europe, too, has watched this struggle with keen and unwonted interest. At Charleston was to be tried on a grand scale the question of iron-clads versus fortifications; and the trial has been made, and the issue is decisive. Iron-clads are not invulnerable, and their passage may be so obstructed and delayed as to bring upon them a concentrated and irresistible fire. We are not aware of the exact distance of the ships from the forts in the late engagement; it is probable we have not a correct version of the damage sustained by the fleet;

we are uncertain of the time the engagement lasted; and we have not any reliable and exact reports as to the number of guns which the Confederates brought to bear upon their assailants; but the want of authentic information as to these details does not affect the main conclusion to be derived from this engagement. Iron-clads cannot essay to pass or attack land fortifications with impunity. Perhaps the Confederate guns were twenty times as numerous as those of the Federals, but this is a disadvantage iron-clads must always anticipate. The number of guns an iron-clad can carry is strictly limited, the number of iron-clads that can enter a harbour simultaneously is limited; but the number of guns and forts on land is practically unlimited. The business of the iron-clad is, however, not to engage forts, but to pass them, and in this consists their peculiar efficacy. We have now learnt that their passage may be impeded. The Confederates were the first to demonstrate the superiority of iron over wood in naval warfare; and in so doing they revolutionised the navies of Europe. They have now taught us how to defend our cities and arsenals against the iron monsters that their skill and daring have called into existence.

After many delays, all things were declared ready, and it was determined to make the attack on Charleston, and the vessels were signalled to get under way. The fleet comprised nine iron-clads—the New Ironsides, which was the flagship of Admiral Dupont; the Weehawken, with an Ericsson raft chained to her bow; the Passaic; the Montauk; the Patapsco; the Catskill; the Nantucket; the Nahant; and the Keokuk. Besides these, there was a squadron of five vessels, which did not participate in the attack. The fleet crossed the bar without difficulty on the 6th April. The Federal expectation that the passage would be opposed by the fire of the batteries that command the first part of the channel was not realised. The Confederates did not open fire until they could do so with full effect. The morning of the 7th was misty, but the day became clear towards 10 o'clock. Still the fleet did not move until 1 in the afternoon; the object of this delay being that the fleet might go in with a low tide. At 1 o'clock the portholes were closed, and the fleet advanced to the attack in a single line. Another delay of nearly an hour took place, in consequence of the Ericsson raft attached to the Weehawken, which was intended to lift or explode torpedoes and to remove obstructions, becoming entangled. The vessels then proceeded, passing the batteries on Morris Island within easy range; but the Confederate forts were silent. At 3 o'clock, the fleet came within range of Fort Sumter, and of the batteries of Sullivan's Island; and then the long silence was broken, and Fort Sumter gave the signal with her barbette guns for the commencement of the attack on the fleet. The Federals at once understood why they had been permitted to proceed so far without molestation; they were now, as it were, surrounded by batteries, which poured upon them a concentrated and deadly fire. The New Ironsides quickly became unmanageable, and after being somewhat damaged by the Confederate batteries, and having discharged only one broadside, retired from the contest. Meanwhile, the rest of the fleet, in obedience to orders, proceeded so as, if possible, to pass to the North-west, which is supposed to be the most vulnerable side, of Fort Sumter, but they soon found themselves arrested, not only by the storm of shot and shell that was unremittably hailed upon them from the batteries, but also by three lines of floating obstructions. The vessels then essayed to make for a small channel to the left, which appeared open, but they were forced to abandon the attempt, for the Confederate batteries had already crippled at least four of the iron-clads. The affair was over, and after an abortive attack upon Fort Sumter the signal was given for retreat from a position which threatened the destruction of the entire fleet.

The Federal account of the damage proves that the retreat was not ordered before it was necessary. The Keokuk had been struck by ninety shots, and she left the scene of action a perfect wreck, so that in spite of strenuous efforts she sank on the following morning, after being abandoned by her crew. The Keokuk was considered one of the most perfectly constructed iron-clads of the Federal navy. The Passaic was struck 58 times, her turret was bent and disabled, and 30 of the shots took effect. The Passaic is no longer fit for service. The Patapsco was struck 40 times, and amongst other injuries her 200lb. Parrot gun was disabled. The Nahant was struck 80 times, 30 of the shots were effective, and her pilot house was shattered. The New Ironsides was hit 60 times, and her port shutters were knocked away. The Weehawken was struck 59 times, and her funnel so injured that she was worked with difficulty. The Montauk was hit twenty times. The Nantucket, besides other injuries, had her turret disabled. The Catskill was severely handled; one shot going through her deck plating, and breaking a beam beneath. The Ericsson raft had to be abandoned, and was captured by the Confederates. Such is the Federal account of this disaster, and we may be sure that if it is not substantially correct, it does not exaggerate it, or the Government would not have kept back the official despatches. The North may esteem it fortunate that their commander ordered a retreat when he did, and so saved his fleet from complete destruction. The casualties are reported to be five Confederates wounded, and thirty Federals killed and wounded. The injuries sustained by Fort Sumter are slight.

Admiral Dupont informed his officers that he did not intend to renew the attack, and on the 12th of April the whole of the fleet of iron-clads departed from the neighbourhood of Charleston. So far as the attempt to take Charleston with iron-clads is concerned, the late engagement was decisive.

The position of the Federals at Washington, North Carolina, is unchanged. Up to the 11th inst. all attempts to relieve them had failed. A detachment of 7,000 men, which had been despatched to General Foster's assistance, was driven back by the Confederates, with a loss to the Federals of fifty men. The latest news is from letters from Fortress Monroe, dated the 10th inst.—not a very reliable source of information—which report, that according to despatches from General Palmer, at Newbern, "a steamer, with a regiment of soldiers, and supplies of provisions and ammunition, succeeded in passing the batteries on the Tar River, and relieved General Foster on the 14th."

Since it is no longer possible to rumour the immediate capture of Charleston, the army of the Potomac is brought into requisition. General Hooker is reported to be making "mysterious" movements, and General Lee is said to be marching upon Harper's Ferry to invade Maryland. According to a special despatch in the Tribune, a Federal force crossed the Rappahannock on the 17th, and occupied Gordonsville.

General Wise has driven in the Federal pickets, and occupied the town of Williamsburg.

There has been some skirmishing near Suffolk, Virginia, between the Confederates and the Federal forces under General Peck. An engagement has occurred on the Nansmond River, below Suffolk, between Federal gunboats and Confederate artillery. The latter was silenced by the gunboats, one of which, however, was disabled and towed off.

All the expeditions for the purpose of retrieving the reverses of Vicksburg have been abandoned. The Federals in their retreat from Fort Pemberton and Yazoo Pass were harassed by the Confederates.

Admiral Farragut is reported to be between two batteries, neither of which he is able to pass.

The Federals are fearing an attempt upon New Orleans. The correspondent of the New York Times, writing from that city under date of April 5, says: "The attitude of the Confederates at Port Hudson, Jackson, Mobile, and on the Atchafalaya justifies the apprehension of an attack upon New Orleans, which the troops under General Banks are in no condition successfully to resist."

It is reported from Louisville that 20,000 Confederates have crossed the Cumberland, near Lebanon, Tennessee, preparatory to entering Kentucky.

General Rosecranz has, it is said, been reinforced by General Grant's troops. The Richmond Despatch of the 10th says: "General Rosecranz has sent five regiments of infantry to Kentucky, and has ordered all the cavalry from that State to his army at Murfreesboro', and is moving his troops on his left (our right), doubtless to prevent any movement upon our post in that State."

The New York telegraphic summary of news has the following items:—

Southern journals confirm the repulse of General Van Dorn, at Franklin, Tennessee. The same papers state that two Federal gunboats and three transports were destroyed on Cumberland River by Wheeler's cavalry, who had also captured several Federal trains between Louisville and Nashville.

Southern despatches from Vicksburg to the 10th inst. state that two more Federal transports filled with troops had gone up the Mississippi, and others were preparing to follow.

Fifty-three Federal gunboats had proceeded up the Coldwater River.

A Federal iron-clad was abandoned and destroyed at the mouth of the Amite River.

A month since it was announced that Admiral Farragut had destroyed the Indianola. Next we were told he had "seen the wreck of the Indianola." The latest news is that the Indianola is on the Red River, ready for action.

The New York journals state that, in compliance with the request of the Confederate Congress, President Davis, on the 10th inst., issued an address to the people of the Confederate States upon the present condition and future prospects of their country. He says, in this address, that, alone and unaided, the Confederacy had defeated the most formidable military and naval combinations of its enemies, and, at the end of two years of war, could look back with pride upon all it had accomplished. Referring to the discomfiture of the Federals at Vicksburg, Port Hudson, and Charleston, he says that the forces of the Confederacy were never so numerous or efficient as at the present moment. He says:—

There is but one danger which the Government regards with apprehension, and to avert this, I appeal to the spirit and patriotism of the people. The harvest of last year was far below the average yield, especially in the northern part of the Confederacy, where supplies are most needed for the army. If, through confidence in early peace, people now plant cotton and tobacco, instead of grain and articles necessary for the subsistence of the people and the army, the consequences may prove serious, if not disastrous, especially if the present season proves as the last. The wheat harvest in more Southern States promises an abundant yield, but the difficulties of transportation will embarrass military operations, and cause suffering among the people, if the crops in the middle and northern portions of the Confederacy prove deficient. No uneasiness is felt for the mere supplies of bread for the men. It is for corn and forage to raise live stock and supplies for animals used in military operations that the deficiency of last harvest was mostly felt.

He urges the people to raise exclusively corn, oats, beans, peas, potatoes, and other food for man and beast, and to sow corn broadcast for fodder in the immediate proximity of railroads and canals. The supply of meat is deficient. The deficiency is, however, only temporary, as measures have been adopted, which it is believed will soon restore full rations. The ration is now reduced sometimes to one-half the usual quantity in some of the Southern armies. The supply of meat in the country is sufficient for the support of all, but transportation is so difficult, and speculators having caused the surplus in the hands of producers to be withdrawn from sale, Government has been unable to gather full supplies. The Secretary of War has prepared a plan by which people will be enabled to assist Government officers to purchase bacon, corn, pork, and beef, known to exist in large quantities in different parts of the Confederacy. The address thus concludes:—"Entertaining no fear that the people will misconstrue the motives of this address, or fail to respond to the call of patriotism, I place the facts fully and frankly before the people. There is little doubt that if the people unite in doing their duty, the sovereignty and independence of the Confederate States will be maintained."

The agitation against England is increasing; and it is directly encouraged by the Federal Government. At a public meeting held at New York on the 11th inst., Postmaster-General Blair made a speech devoted mainly to denouncing the British aristocracy, who, he declared, aided the rebels in every way short of declared war. With the exception of the World, the New York press is bitterly hostile. The New York Herald urges President Lincoln to call an extra session of Congress to consider what measures ought to be adopted in case of a collision with England, as it is essential that the Legislative branch of the Government should co-operate with the Executive to give the war all the moral force necessary for its success and thinks Congress should share with the President the responsibilities of a war with England, if such a course should be necessary to vindicate the honour or uphold the interests of America. The New York Times says it is physically certain America will exact atonement for British outrages. The only uncertain thing is the question of time. It may be next month, or next year, or ten years hence, but every dollar destroyed by English privateers will be made good by voluntary payments or reprisals; and urges the Federal Government to make no further remonstrance, but let the British rulers take their course, and America will bide her time. The same journal thinks that "the invincibility of the American seaboard is proved by the fact that the harbour obstructions can prevent the entrance into our ports of iron-clad fleets; and as the war would be entirely defensive on the part of America, with the exception that America would invade Canada and launch hundreds of privateers, there is left no room to doubt that England would get the worst of it. Seventy thousand Federal troops could march through Canada without impediment, as England could not break the blockade, as it would be protected by iron-clads, of which America has five to one of England."

The World ridicules the Times' article, and says the defences of Canada are superior to anything the Federals have met with at the South, and, backed by the greatest naval Power on earth, the conquest of Canada would not be such child's play as the Times supposes.

The correspondent of the New York World reports from Washington, that Mr. Seward's last despatch to Mr. Adams submitted to the British Government the alternative of preventing from leaving port the vessels alleged to be building in England for the Confederate service, or the rupture of diplomatic relations between the two countries. The New York Evening Post says that if it is true that Mr. Seward has sent a note to the British Government demanding that the encouragement given to the fitting out of privateers shall cease, then the honour of America will demand an immediate reply, and if the British Government hesitates the Federal Government can do no better than recall Mr. Adams and send Lord Lyons home. There should be no hesitation in doing this, and there will then be time enough to deliberate on further measures.

It is reported that in Washington the capture of the Peterhoff is considered illegal, and that Mr. Seward is in favour of her surrender. Lord Lyons has demanded the return of the mail bags unopened.

There have been several collisions between the white and coloured labourers in the North. A riot has occurred at New York. In those Northern States where the negro is admitted, he is free to starve, but not to work. A strong police force is found necessary in New York to prevent an outbreak.

The Times' correspondent, under date of March 16, gives the following account of the seizure of an "Alexandra" at San Francisco:—

The vessel seized is an American schooner, called the "J. M. Chapman," which arrived in this port several weeks ago from Valparaiso, with a cargo of beans shipped at the latter port for the San Francisco market. Her captain sold her here to the parties who had fitted her out. I am informed that for some time back gunpowder and other materials of war have been shipped privately at San Francisco and sent down the coast to a point, it is supposed, in Lower California, where the J. M. Chapman intended to take them on board, preparatory to her entering upon her alleged career of privateering. As she is a sailing vessel, and would not be likely to chase a steamer with much prospect of success, it is supposed the intention was to lie in wait for one of the Californian steamers en route to Panama with treasure, to capture the steamer, and to convert the latter into a privateer or Confederate cruiser, and then prey on the commerce of the Pacific Ocean between San Francisco, Panama, &c.

Notwithstanding the most unscrupulous espionage it is thought that the evidence is not sufficient for the condemnation of the ship. Let the Lincolnites be glad that the reputation of New England contractors is so bad, and that the Confederates will not give them any orders.

General Burnside has proclaimed the penalty of death upon all persons aiding the Confederates.

The Governor of New York has sent a message to the Legislature, recommending it to pass an amendment to the Constitution, giving the Legislature power to pass a law to enable absent soldiers to vote.

The Pennsylvania House of Representatives has agreed, by forty-four votes against forty, to instruct the Governor to direct the Attorney-General to institute criminal proceedings against ex-Secretary Cameron, for attempting to obtain a seat in the Senate by bribery.

The steamer Eagle, from Wilmington, and the steamers Margaret and Jessie, from Charleston, on the 8th, have arrived at Nassau.

The Confederate steamer Stonewall Jackson, formerly the Leopard, being closely pursued while attempting to run the Charleston blockade, was beached and burnt by the captain of the vessel. The mail was safely landed in small boats, together with crew and passengers.

The British ship Surprise, and the British schooners John Williams, Florence Nightingale, and Brothers, have been captured.

The fluctuations in the price of gold at New York have been considerable. On the 14th it was at 56½ premium. On the 18th it was 53½ premium.

ENGLAND.

The Poor-Law Returns, published last Saturday, show a diminution during the week of 5,600 in the number of paupers in the suffering cotton districts; and we may, perhaps, hope that this slow progress will continue for the rest of the summer; but more than this, until the Federal Government makes peace with the South or war with England, we dare not venture to anticipate. The condition of those who remain dependent on alms does not improve, and the Central Committee begin to entertain doubts whether their funds will hold out very much longer. In the meantime, idleness and poverty are rapidly doing their work; the people of Lancashire, hitherto among the most quiet, orderly, moral, and respectable of the working classes, are becoming discontented and demoralized; and if the present state of things endures for another winter, we must fear a repetition on an extended scale of the outrages which have brought disgrace on Stalybridge. The best portion of the operatives are looking to emigration for relief; but the means of emigration for even 50,000 are yet to be found, and the removal of so small a number would hardly affect the condition of those left behind.

The Parliamentary debates of this week have led to no practical result, but their interest is great, and their probable importance can hardly be overrated. There is a manifest disposition in both Houses to exercise a strict vigilance over the conduct of the Government towards the American belligerents, and a growing distrust of Lord Russell, whose speeches give rise to suspicions that he is inclined to turn the neutrality of England altogether to the advantage of the North, and to put up with almost any degree of insolence on the part of the Federal Government, rather than take measures for the protection of British interests which might prove of advantage to the Southern cause. He has shown, it is thought, a reluctance to assert our undeniable rights, and a willingness to remain patient under undeniable wrongs, which do not at all meet the wishes of Parliament. We do not pretend to say whether this view of his conduct is just or unjust; but it is certainly so prevalent as to beget a disposition on the part of both Houses to receive with some impatience the formal assurances of the Ministers that the honour of the country is safe in their hands.

In the House of Lords, the inviolability of the mails has been strenuously asserted, not merely by members of the Opposition, but by men like Lord Grey, who has strong leanings towards peace, and occupies a neutral position towards the political parties which divide the country, and like Lord Wodehouse, who was formerly Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and is a decided Liberal. It is urged that the Government ought not, by relieving British ships from liability to carry the mails, to encourage the idea that any act on the part of the Federal cruisers or Prize Courts, which could render the mail a source of danger to the carriers, would be tolerated by England. A ship carrying mails from neutral port to neutral port ought to be exempt from molestation, and, moreover, the American Prize Court which should open the mails with a view of finding evidence against her would commit an outrage which, in itself, would justify our demand for the surrender of the vessel. Lord Russell's endeavours to excuse himself confirm the idea that his object is simply to avoid a collision by any sacrifice of British rights which Federal arrogance may demand.

Lord Grey has done important service by reminding the House and the Foreign Secretary that ships trading between neutral ports have a right to carry what cargo they please, and that no "contraband of war" found on board can properly subject them to detention or condemnation. This fact has been systematically overlooked by Lord Russell in his speeches, and by Admiral Wilkes in his conduct, although most distinctly enunciated by Lord Stowell, and clearly admitted by

Mr. Seward, who states, without any exception, that ships really trading between neutral ports are not subject to interference. In order to put a stop to the strange perversions of law of which the Federal cruisers have been guilty, and of which Lord Russell seems almost to approve, it would be well if some independent and influential member of either House, Lord Grey or Mr. Walpole, for example, would put the two following questions to the Government:—1st, Do the Government acknowledge any right in the Federal cruisers to detain, or in the Federal courts to condemn, vessels trading to neutral ports on the ground that they are carrying contraband of war? 2nd, If not, will they take such measures as may prevent the seizure or condemnation of any vessels on that ground?

The capture of so many British vessels under circumstances of peculiar aggravation—the case of the Dolphin, seized by a Federal man-of-war which had been lying in wait for her in the neutral harbour of St. Thomas, while on her way from Liverpool to Nassau—the capture of the Peterhoff—and the opening of the mail bags by the Prize Court at New York—the refusal to give up the Adela—the detention of many ships for twelve months and more in default of evidence—the systematic character of these illegal proceedings, and the intention manifested by the appointment of Admiral Wilkes to the West Indian station—and last, not least, the astounding impertinence of Mr. Adams, have provoked a strong feeling in the country, which finds vent in the House of Commons in such speeches as those of Mr. Roebuck and Lord Robert Cecil. The latter gentleman expressed with great vigour and clearness the general feeling of the House and the public on the subject; and the favour with which his speech was received deserves the attention of the Ministry, as one symptom among many that Parliament is prepared to support them in a vigorous policy, but not to endure much longer the disgrace of a tame submission to insult and injury.

The equipment of vessels for the Confederate service has been keenly denounced by Mr. Cobden, and not vigorously defended by any one. Nevertheless, it is quite certain that every one not devoted to the Northern cause, both in and out of Parliament, feels a warm sympathy with such enterprises, and rejoices in their success. The seizure of the Alexandra was the subject of a very severe comment from the lawyers of the Opposition. Mr. Horsfall's statement of the facts, and the comments thereupon of Sir Hugh Cairns and Mr. Malins, show that any extraordinary efforts of the Treasury to put a stop to transactions of this kind will not be favourably regarded; and if a jury should decide that the case against the Alexandra is not made out, it is probable that the ultra-legal zeal of the Ministry in the Federal service will evaporate as quickly as it has arisen.

The newly-elected Conservative member for Devonport, Mr. Bousfield Ferrand, is an old and bitter enemy of the Lancashire manufacturers; and on Monday night he took occasion to make a furious onslaught upon them, quoting against them pamphlets and reports now more than thirty years old, and holding them responsible for the present distress of their people, on the ground that they had developed their trade too rapidly of late years. His denunciation was so unmeasured and absurd as to provoke frequent bursts of laughter, and it received no support from either side of the House. No one thought it necessary to offer a reply. Mr. Villiers, the President of the Poor Law Board, explained his intentions in regard to the employment of the operatives in draining lands, cleaning and improving towns, and similar works, which are much wanted in the manufacturing counties. The discussion then fell into the hands of the Lancashire members, who expressed their concurrence in the views of Mr. Villiers, and their thorough approval of his plan. Mr. Ferrand gained nothing by his intemperate harangue except the ridicule of the House.

The Church rate Abolition Bill, though supported by the Government, has been defeated on the second reading by a majority of ten—275 to 285. This result is cheering to the friends of order and religion, as evincing the great progress made by their cause during the last four or five years; but it would be unreasonable to hope that the agitation is at an end.

The infant daughter of Her Royal Highness the Princess Alice (Princess Louis of Hesse) was baptized on Monday at Windsor Castle, according to the rites of the Lutheran Church, of which her father is a member. Her Majesty was Godmother, and the child was named Victoria Alberta Elizabeth Matilda Mary.

The Prince and Princess of Wales appeared for the first time, at Covent Garden Theatre, on Tuesday night, when a "festival performance" was commanded by the Queen in honour of their marriage. They went in State, attended by their suite in five Royal carriages, with Prince Alfred and the Princess Helena. The house was filled, and the magnificence of the toilettes displayed was amazing.

EUROPE.

A volume of correspondence on the affairs of Poland was distributed last night. It contains, inter alia, the first despatch of Earl Russell, dated March 2, calling upon Russia to fulfil the treaties of 1815, the terms of which have hitherto only been known by the version published in the Courrier du Dimanche; a despatch from Lord Napier, reporting a conversation with Prince Gortschakoff, in which the Prince replied to the despatch—he declined to give a written answer—the reply being a decided rejection of all Earl Russell's argument, although professing very benevolent intentions on the part of the Emperor towards Poland; the second despatch of Earl Russell, in which the arguments of the former despatch are repeated; the drafts of the French and Austrian notes presented at the same time; and lastly, a despatch by Earl Russell to Lord Napier, in which the Foreign Secretary criticises the amnesty and the promise of liberties by which it was accompanied, and pronounces them insufficient.

The Corps Legislatif has been engaged during the past week in the discussion of the budget, and has finally passed it by 240 to 7 votes. The chapters containing the estimates for the Ministries of Foreign Affairs, Interior, and Navy have provoked debates of some little interest. In reply to M. Ollivier, who asked for some information about Mexico, M. Billault said, that news only reached France from the expedition twice a month, and that the Government at once published whatever came in the Moniteur. M. Ollivier also put a question concerning Poland, and with just as little result. M. Billault declared that the Government would give no explanation which would injure the success of the negotiations. It sympathized very cordially with the sufferings of Poland, but it was convinced that the question was not a French, but an European one; and it regretted that the public allowed itself to give way to foolish and unreasonable oscillations—one day believing in a general conflagration, and the next forgetting completely all the difficulties of the situation. The country should trust the Emperor. The debate upon the navy was only a replication of those which take place so often in the House of Commons. The deputies complained that the development of the navy was not sufficiently pressed on; and as Sir John Pakington or Mr. Bentinck would instance French progress, so the Count de la Tour insisted on the enormous increase in the strength of the English navy, and urged the necessity of the French Government keeping pace with the English. The representative of the Government regretted that the sum allotted to the navy was not larger. But what could the Administration do? It had to submit to the financial exigencies of the country.

The principal interest in the debate upon the budget of the Ministry of the Interior attached to an attack by M. Picard and other members upon the Government interference in the elections; an interference which was justified by M. Baroche, who declared that the Government had not the slightest intention of abandoning its system of recommending and assisting candidates.

This question of the elections is exciting much interest in France, and it is to be feared that it will create considerable irritation. Amongst the first fruits of the discussion, is a warning to the Journal des Debats—which is now completely at the mercy of the Minister of the Interior—for an article by M. Prevost Paradol, in which he combated the notion that the oath required from candidates offered any obstacle to the candidature of members of the "old parties." M. Paradol's interpretation of the oath was deemed by Count de Persigny an attack upon the Empire, and the Debats promptly received a warning. A notice in the Moniteur also warns the press that it must not call those candidates who oppose the Government nominees independent, as the epithet implies a want of independence in their opponents, who enjoy the confidence of the Government. Such manoeuvres, the official journal gives notice, will be severely punished.

An election to the French Academy has taken place this week, which has excited more than usual interest. There were two fautouils to be filled. For the one the candidates were M. Dufaure, the famous advocate and politician, and M. Jules Jamin, the as well known theatrical critic and feuilletonist of the Journal des Debats. This contest, which, however, was comparatively uninteresting, resulted in the signal victory of the advocate over the critic. The candidates for the second chair were M. Littré, one of the most distinguished of French men of letters—a philosophical writer of very great eminence, but still better reputed for his great philological acquirements—also a writer in the Debats, and M. De Carné, who has been represented to be a person destitute of ability, but who really is a very able writer upon French history, and has enriched the Revue des Deux Mondes with some valuable contributions. The interest of the struggle was caused by the fact that Monseigneur Dupanloup, the eloquent Bishop of Orleans, had published a pamphlet, directed, if not nominally, yet really, against the election of M. Littré. M. Littré is the great disciple of Comte, and the leading preacher of his strange philosophy. He has accepted all the doctrines of his master, and these doctrines are regarded by most people as directly subversive of Christianity, or indeed of religion altogether. M. Dupanloup's pamphlet settled the matter, and M. de Carné was elected by a large majority.

Prince Napoleon has at last set off on his journey to the East. His departure is regarded by some people as a sign of peace. He has, however, only gone as far as Florence, and may change his mind and return to Paris, to use his influence in favour of war. The Princess Clotilde accompanies him.

Official despatches from Vera Cruz announce a victory. General Mirandol has defeated Comonfort, near Cholula. Two hundred of the Mexicans were killed, eighty were taken prisoners. The French had two men killed. A French corps has occupied the road between Puebla and Mexico. This tallies with the news via Washington and New York.

Nothing certain is yet known as to the reception with which the joint intervention at St. Petersburg will meet. Meanwhile rumour is very busy. Thus—to notice the less incredible ones—we are told that the English Government has sent a despatch to Lord Napier, asking for an immediate reply, and that the French Government has applied to the Government of Italy and to the different Courts of Germany for their adhesion to its policy, obtaining from Italy a general assent and a reservation of independent action, and throwing the German Governments, which, most of them, have some connexion with Russia and are much afraid of France, into a very cruel embarrassment, in which their only refuge is to try to avoid giving any reply.

There is no intelligence of importance from Poland. According to the Russian bulletins the detachments of troops are invariably successful, and disperse the insurgent bands whenever they can meet with them, killing and taking prisoners the majority. The insurgent reports tell of nothing but insurgent victories, or of wonderful "strategic movements." The Warsaw and Cracow bulletins are equally reliable or apocryphal. When they tell of a defeat sustained by their own side they may be believed. When they claim a victory we must test their claim by the internal evidence, or wait for the story of the other side, and guess at the truth from the two versions, and as the issue of the contest is not affected by these isolated victories ce jeu ne vaut pas la chandelle. It seems, however, pretty clear that, although the Poles show no signs of surrender, and yet talk very hopefully, the immense resources of Russia are beginning to tell. Troops are steadily pouring into the ill-fated land, and the assistance from Prussian and Austrian Poland is being cut off. Sympathizers do still run the land blockade, but the watch on both sides is very strict. We learn from Prussian sources that a band of six hundred Poles, of whom one hundred were mounted, crossed the frontier between Thorn and Kulm to join the insurgents, were attacked by a Russian detachment from Lipno, and that only the horsemen escaped. According to some reports not improbable although unreliable, the insurgents in the district of Kalisz have the advantage of the services of a number of French officers. There is a considerable force of insurgents in this part of the kingdom, but they seem to make little progress. Prince Wittgenstein—the Russian prince whom the insurgents, according to their veracious telegrams, captured and wounded some time ago—a triumph which all the daily journals announced in large letters, and not one has contradicted—seems to be too clever a general for them. He has in a series of fights, most of which were reported to be insurgent victories, disposed of two of the ablest leaders. One he has killed, and the other he has driven across the frontier. A late despatch reports an engagement at Warta, to the South of Warsaw, in which the Russians were defeated with great loss. Important, if true.

An amusing illustration of the boldness with which the stories relative to the spread of the insurrection are manufactured, and the credulity or ignorance with which they are received by the English newspapers is furnished in a letter from a merchant of Mitau, in Courland, to his correspondents in the City and published in the Morning Herald.

An English daily paper, of some position—it would be unfair to name it, because it is not worse than its contemporaries—announced, apparently, on some special information, that the insurrection had assumed great dimensions in Samogitia and Courland, and that 3,000 insurgents had seized upon the railway from Tilsit to Mitau. The Mitau merchant denies that there is any considerable number of insurgents in Courland or even in Samogitia, and adds that the railway they are said to have seized exists at present only in the hopes of the people of Mitau.

The Revolutionary leaders still treat the amnesty with scorn. The insurgents will only accept it as a last resource. If they wait long, it may not be worth having, for a few months more of this barbarous war would leave Poland little better than a barren waste. The Nord Deutsche Zeitung, an organ of the Prussian Ministry, announces, however, that a majority of the Polish fugitives in Posen have declared their intention to accept it, and have applied for Russian passports accordingly. If the statement should turn out to be true, it will not so much prove that the fugitives are glad to accept the amnesty, as that they are anxious to escape Prussian surveillance. According to a telegram from Thorn, an Imperial ukase orders a general levy of 7,000 men in each of the seven Governments bordering upon the Polish provinces incorporated in the Russian Empire. The Chief of the Secret Revolutionary Government has issued an order forbidding the inhabitants to pay taxes to the Russian Government. The utility of the order is not very clear. Surely the Revolutionary Government might content itself with collecting its own taxes. The Revolution supports itself by very summary measures: a contribution is demanded from a town or an individual, and if the town does not pay, it is threatened with destruction; if the individual refuses to pay, he is, if possible, shot, or strung up on the nearest tree.

Rochebrune, the commander of the Polish Zouaves, whose gallant deeds have been so much spoken of, has written a letter, in which he severely denounces the conduct of Mieroslawski, and says that if this man should be given the supreme command he would at once abandon the cause, because certain that it must fail.

Langiewicz is said to complain very much of the proceedings of Mieroslawski. He has also taken the trouble to dispel all the romance about himself and Miss ——. According to the General, she only accompanied him in his flight because the exigencies of his passport required such a companion; and, moreover, she was not his aide-de-camp, but served in that capacity another General, with grey hairs and a large family, who loved her as his child and watched over her. This romance of the hero and his fair lieutenant is one which we cannot afford to lose, and it is to be hoped that this Austrian report of the General's declarations may be as incorrect as most statements about Polish matters.

It would really seem as if the Greeks are to have Prince William for their King. The difficulties are removed at the cost of England. We are to give up the Ionian Islands, and lend to the new King and his people a good round sum of money wherewith to begin their housekeeping. The matter is not, however, finally arranged. The Moniteur says that the English Government has proposed a conference of the three protecting Powers at London, at which, we presume, it will be declared after the fashion of the glorious revolution—Earl Russell is too good a Whig to depart from such a precedent—that Otho has abdicated—Otho protesting all the while, and the Crown will be conferred on Prince William, and guaranteed to him as it was to his luckless predecessor. The Greek deputation has arrived at Copenhagen, and has been received with considerable courtesy.

The Government of Hanover—one of the most reactionary and illiberal in Germany—has always been particularly eager to proceed to violent measures against Denmark. It has submitted to the Federal Diet some resolutions, declaring the proclamation of the 30th of March illegal, and all measures based upon it null and void; calling upon Denmark to settle the relations of Holstein and Schleswig to the Danish monarchy within six weeks, according to the views of the Diet, and instructing the Executive Committee to propose a course to be taken, in case Denmark should not comply. The Diet is also to protect the rights of the German Confederation against an incorporation of Schleswig with Denmark—a most impudent pretension, as the German Diet has no right whatever to Schleswig. The Diet may vapour as it will; it can do nothing at present, and Denmark knows it.

In the Royal speech, with which the session of the Rigsraad was opened on Wednesday, the Government admitted that the Royal proclamation of March 30 had excited the opposition of the Great Powers of Germany—the protests of Austria and Prussia have been published—and declared that it would not allow itself to be led astray by that circumstance from the intentions it had expressed.

Denmark feels that now, if ever, is her opportunity to settle once for all this question, which for fourteen years has paralysed her energies and kept her in continual apprehension of war.

The Grand Duke Michael of Russia has had a narrow escape from the Circassians. He was surprised by a large force of Circassian cavalry, and with great difficulty escaped to a fort, in which the Circassians still blockade him.

Poland and Circassia are very dear-bought possessions of Russia. They must cost her, even when nominally quiet, a great deal more than they return.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, APRIL 23.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

A Bill for the regulation of alkali manufactures went through Committee. Another Bill, to abolish the office of Secretary at War, now held by the Secretary of State for War, was read a second time.

The Marquis of Clanricarde put several questions to Lord Russell in regard to the treatment of British vessels by the naval officers of the United States. He referred to the case of the Dolphin, seized in Danish waters while on her way from Liverpool to Nassau, and also to those of the Peterhoff and the Adela. He censured, in strong terms, the behaviour of Mr. Adams, who had given a certificate to a British ship laden with arms for the Mexican Government, and attributed his subsequent letter on the subject to some remonstrance from the Foreign Office. It had come to this, that British merchants were actually advertising for French ships to load for British ports in the West Indies.—Lord Russell described the Marquis's speech as somewhat warm. The case of the Dolphin had been submitted to the law officers of the Crown. He reported that there was no prima facie case for her seizure, and that the fact of her having been watched and pursued in neutral waters by a ship which had made use of a Danish port for that purpose, and the fact that part of her crew had been taken out of her, and landed on Danish territory, afforded good ground for complaint. It was not the case that he had allowed such acts to pass with impunity. He had remonstrated in the case of the Tuscarora, and he should remonstrate in this case against the unnatural use of a neutral port. He had every reason to suppose that the Government of the United States would do justice. It had given to its naval officers instructions in accordance with international law, and if those instructions were disobeyed, he had no right to assume that reparation would be refused. We must wait to see whether any case would be alleged to justify the seizure of the Dolphin. The conduct of Mr. Adams was utterly unwarrantable, and he would bring it under the notice of the United States Government. He had declined to put a mail agent on board the Sea Queen in charge of the mail bags, but he had exempted vessels bound for Mexican ports from the liability to carry mail bags. The Government of the United States had promised not to open the mails. It might be that the officers of that Government had not always fulfilled its promises; it might be that they had seized vessels going to neutral ports without sufficient evidence that the cargo was of a contraband character; but in such case our duty was to make representations to the Federal Government, and feel sure that reparation would be made. We could not undertake to protect British ships without regard to their destination or the character of their cargo; we could not break, as neutrals, the laws we were wont to enforce, as belligerents. We must take care, whatever might happen, to have right and justice on our side.—The Earl of Carnarvon pointed out that the Federal cruisers had no more right to intercept our mails between London and Matamoros than between Dover and Calais.—Lord Russell said the fear of the shipowners was that it might be done in despite of right.—The Earl of Derby said that in such a case the Government would be bound to protect the vessel and protest against the wrong.—Lord Grey urged that the Foreign Secretary should have assured the shipowners that this Government would guarantee them against any injury from carrying the mail bags, and that any interference with those bags would be altogether illegal.—The Postmaster-General (Lord Stanley of Alderley) said there was a great distinction between an ordinary ship taking letters and a packet which took them under contract. In the former case there was no contract either expressed or implied between the captain or owner of the ship and the Post-office, the authorities of which had no means of controlling the voyage of the vessel. There was nothing in the engagement to prevent such a ship deviating from her course, as, for instance, calling at a Confederate port before she went to Matamoros. It would therefore be no advantage to the owner of a ship to have letters on board.—Lord Wodehouse (formerly Lord Russell's Under-Secretary) thought that the answer to the shipowners should have been, "I can assure you that the American Government have given instructions to their officers to respect the rule that the seals of letter bags shall not be removed; but if such bags are opened, and in consequence of the correspondence which is found in them the ship is illegally condemned, that is a proceeding to which this country will never submit (hear, hear); and any shipowner incurring such risk may be certain of the support of Her Majesty's Government." Firmness was as necessary as courtesy in dealing with the Americans, especially in their present temper.—Lord Granville urged that no damages that could be demanded would really compensate shipowners for the losses incurred by the detention of a vessel.—Lord Redesdale asked whether Lord Russell admitted the right of the Federals to open a mail bag in the hands of a Consul.—The answer was inaudible.

THURSDAY, APRIL 23.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to Mr. Cochrane, Lord Palmerston expressed his belief that the arrangements for the elevation of Prince William of Denmark to the throne of Greece would be satisfactory. On the motion for going into Committee of Supply, the noble Lord appealed to those who had motions standing on the paper to waive them, in order that the House might pass at once to the consideration of the sum to be voted for the Prince Consort's memorial.—Mr. Roebuck, however, insisted on asking a question of which he had given notice, in reference to the conduct of an admiral in the United States service with respect to English merchant ships going from one neutral port to another. At the outset of the contest in America his feelings were entirely in favour of the North; but by degrees he had arrived at the conviction that their whole course had not only proved them to be unfit to govern themselves, but had been such as to disentitle them to the courtesies and comity of civilised nations. (This remark elicited a loud shout of "oh" from the Radical benches.) Oh, yes (continued Mr. Roebuck, with a wave of the hand and a sneer on the lip), he knew there were degenerate Englishmen who took the part of the North against their own country, and whenever a matter came into dispute between America and England whose voices were always raised on the side of the former. He held that the conduct of the North American Disunited States had been humiliating to the people of England. We had been subjected to every species of violent language, not only of insinuation, but accusation and threats of war. An English vessel bound to a neutral port had been seized by an American cruiser and carried into an American port, and the just expectations of the English merchant in his honourable trade thereby utterly destroyed. Nay, more; the American minister in this country had taken upon himself to issue permits to English merchants to trade with the port of Matamoros. At this moment, therefore, Mr. Adams, the American minister, was the minister for commerce in England. He knew that if his views were carried out it might lead to war; but speaking the sense of the people of England he did not hesitate to declare that they were prepared for war. He begged to ask, therefore, whether the Government had formed any determination with regard to the proceedings of Admiral Wilkes; and if they intended making any remonstrance to the Government of America, or what other course they proposed to adopt.—Lord Palmerston admitted that the question was one of the greatest possible importance; but all he could say was that it was receiving due consideration on the part of the Government; and that he was not then prepared to state the conclusion at which they had arrived.—Mr. Bentinck directed attention to the statement recently published in the newspapers referring to the seizure of British vessels by the cruisers of the Northern States of America.—Mr. Crawford deprecated the discussion of a subject which was then under the consideration of the Government, as being equally inexpedient and indecorous. He had heard with distaste and disgust the sentiments of Mr. Roebuck, and he confessed that he has little admired the taste and discretion of Mr. Bentinck in introducing the matter to the House after the statement of the noble lord.—Mr. Peacock thought that before the House could enter upon a debate on the subject with any advantage, it ought to be put in possession of the correspondence. He then moved that the communications between Mr. Adams and the Foreign Office, relating to the capture of English vessels carrying mails to Matamoros, should be laid upon the table.—Mr. Newdegate also condemned the language used by Mr. Roebuck, as calculated to prejudice the negotiations between the two countries. Such reflections must be deeply offensive, not only to the Government of the United States, but to every American.—Mr. Layard declined to produce the papers in the then stage of the question, and assured the House that the honour and dignity of the country were perfectly safe in the hands of the Government.—Mr. Whiteside reminded Mr. Layard that he had once expressed his conviction that the want of promptness and decision displayed by the then Government of England, had brought on the Crimean war. Similar errors might now produce a similar result.—Sir H. Cairns observed that the course which had been pursued by her Majesty's Government appeared to leave it an open question whether an American ship of war stationed in the Channel might not, with impunity, arrest the vessels and correspondence passing between Dover and Calais.—Mr. Malins felt humiliated by the fact that the commerce of England was being carried on upon the suzerainty of a foreign Power, and that we were succumbing in a most disgraceful manner to an apprehension which had never influenced the country before.—The Solicitor-General denied that the Government had conceded to that of America the right of seizing English vessels conveying mails to neutral ports on the ground that they might include correspondence and letters injurious to the Federal States.—Lord R. Cecil observed that whilst her Majesty's Government were delaying and thinking about what they should do, Mr. Adams was master of the field. The trade of England was now carried on by the permit of a foreigner; and it had actually come to this, that an extra premium on the insurance of ships trading between English ports, that was, between Liverpool or London and Nassau, had to be paid against the risk of being unjustifiably overhauled by American cruisers. Thus a direct tax was exacted by the British merchant for no other reason than that Admiral Wilkes had chosen to commit piratical acts on the high seas.—Mr. Osborne said that few more mischievous debates had ever occurred in the House of Commons than that which had been raised by those two warlike lawyers, Mr. Roobuck and Mr. Malins. He disclaimed altogether the sentiments which had been uttered by the former hon. gentleman, and entreated the House at once to drop the subject, and be content with leaving it in the hands of the noble lord at the head of the Government.—The motion for papers was then withdrawn.

In Committee of Supply Lord Palmerston moved a resolution granting to her Majesty the sum of £50,000 towards the expense of erecting a suitable memorial to the late Prince Consort. The noble lord explained that the estimated cost of such a monument was £110,000; that nearly £60,000 had been raised by public subscription; and that the proposed grant of £50,000 would, he believed, be sufficient to erect a memorial that would at once be worthy of the country, do honour to the memory of the Prince Consort, and be soothing to the feelings of the Queen.—Mr. Coningham briefly criticised the proceedings of the Royal Commissioners, and the plan they had resolved upon adopting, and expressed a hope that they would reconsider their decision, with the view of erecting a memorial of a more useful character.—Mr. Disraeli thought that the course which had been adopted by the Government was on the whole well considered and judicious in a matter that was not altogether free from embarrassment. The suggestion of the hon. member was, in his opinion, a fallacious and narrow-minded one, and, if carried out, would not fulfil the wishes or be in accordance with the sentiments of the country. What was wanted was a monument in the metropolis which would represent as much as possible the character and career of the living man—something choice, direct, and significant.—In reply to observations from Mr. Gregory, Mr. Liddell, and Mr. Garnett, Lord Palmerston stated that the public subscriptions had been raised upon condition that the style and character of the proposed monument should be left to the decision of the Queen, and the sum he now asked the Committee to vote had the same condition attached to it.—After a few words from Sir Morton Peto and Admiral Dancombe, the vote was agreed to nem. con. Some further business was transacted, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, APRIL 24.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Lord Redesdale drew attention to the instructions issued by Mr. Seward to the naval officers of the United States, that no mails should be opened when seized on board any ship, but should either be given up to the consul of the nation to which the vessel belonged, or sent to the United States Government; but that any correspondence found in them should be referred to the prize court, and used in deciding the condemnation of the vessel. He wished to know if these were the instructions with which the Foreign Secretary had expressed himself satisfied.—Earl Russell was understood to reply that this order had been modified, but that the practice was in a certain degree sanctioned by the dictum of Lord Stowell.—The Earl of Derby observed that nothing could be more monstrous than this claim on the part of the American Government; but what was still more astonishing was that her Majesty's Government should in any way have acquiesced in it.—The Marquis of Clanricarde urged upon the Government the propriety of taking the subject into their serious and immediate consideration.

Lord Chelmsford inquired if there were any truth in the report that four more British vessels had been seized, as stated in the evening papers.—Earl Russell said that the Government had received information that some vessels had been seized in the act of breaking the blockade. The noble lord also stated that on the representations of Lord Lyons, Mr. Seward had written a letter to Mr. Gideon Welles modifying the instructions originally issued to the Federal naval officers, and it was to this letter he had referred as satisfactory. He would, however, consult the law officers of the Crown on the subject.—In reply to the Earl of Ellenborough, Earl Russell further stated that a consul had no right to open letters, but he was instructed to say that they might be taken before the prize court.—The Earl of Hardwicke remarked that the vacillation exhibited by the Government would, as a matter of course, be attributed by the Americans to fear. He hoped the pretensions of the Federal Government were unjustifiable.—Lord Taunton could not concur in censuring the Government, which as long as it pursued the same dignified and prudent course as heretofore would, whatever the result, be supported by all classes. He deprecated these incidental discussions without the House having full information before it on the facts of the case.—Lord Russell promised to produce the opinion of the law officers on Monday, if possible.

A bill to relieve Dissenters appointed to certain offices from the necessity of taking an oath, not to use their power to the injury of the Church of England, sent up from the Commons, was thrown out on the second reading by 69 to 52.

Some further business was transacted, and their Lordships adjourned.

FRIDAY, APRIL 24.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In reply to Lord A. Churchill, the Solicitor-General said that vessels sailing between neutral ports would not be justified in defending themselves by force from the visitation of Federal cruisers. In the case of a Swedish convoy which occurred during the French war, it was decided not only that such resistance would be sufficient ground for detention, but that, even if offered with the aid of convoying men of war, it would of itself subject the resisting vessels to condemnation.

A long debate then took place upon the conduct of Sir George Grey in reference to the reprieve of the Glasgow murderer, Jessie McLauchlan. The Home Secretary was charged with using the Royal prerogative of mercy to make himself a Court of Appeal in criminal cases, and he retorted that this was what his opponents were trying to do with the House of Commons.—After this discussion had dropped Mr. Horsfall, in calling attention to the recent seizure of the Alexandra at Liverpool, condemned the act as the deliberate infliction of a serious injury upon her respectable owners, Messrs. Fawcett, Preston, and Co. The charge was, he understood, that the Alexandra was furnished and fitted out with the intent of being employed in the service of the Confederate against the Federal States; but to this the owners replied with the solemn declaration that they entertained no intention of the sort. Her Majesty's Government professed to act strictly upon the principle of neutrality in the contest now going on in America: but if we were to have neutrality, why had they not stopped the shipment of arms to the Federals as well as the sailing of a ship which they suspected of being in the service of the Confederates? The fact was that at this moment we were not only supplying the Federals with gun barrels, percussion caps, and ammunition, but also the hands to use them, for the emigration of Irishmen from Liverpool during the present year was considerably greater than it had been during the corresponding period in any year since 1853. Now, he did not object to emigrants going to the United States; but surely we had a right to know by whom they were sent, and he was told that the passage of a large portion of these persons was paid for in America. He suggested, therefore, that it was the duty of the Government to have the Foreign Enlistment Act amended, so that the shipment of arms should be prevented as well as the despatch of vessels fitted out for warlike purposes. In conclusion, the hon. member complained that the owners of the Alexandra had not been permitted to see the evidence upon which the ship had been seized, and called upon the Government to afford facilities for enabling those gentlemen to free themselves from a charge that was utterly unfounded and had entailed upon them a great hardship and injustice.—The Attorney-General said it was impossible under the circumstances for the Government to produce the papers relating to this case. The seizure of the Alexandra had been made upon the advice of the law officers of the Crown, who were of opinion that it was justified by the evidence produced. With regard to the shipment of arms, and other munitions of war, it was not in the power of the Government to interfere; but if proof was furnished to them that persons on board ship destined for the United States or the Southern Confederacy, and called emigrants, were really enlisted to serve in the armies of either belligerents, he hesitated not to say that measures would be immediately adopted for putting in force the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act.—Mr. Whiteside pointed out that the Attorney-General had not answered the statements of the hon. member for Liverpool; when a person was accused of an offence, though he might be the meanest in the land, he had a right to a copy of the depositions, which ought not to be withheld or locked up in a red box. The case as between the Attorney-General and Mr. Horsfall was clearly in favour of the latter, and against the former.—Mr. Collier had heard with satisfaction the announcement that it was the intention of the Government to enforce the Foreign Enlistment Act whenever a case was brought before them upon proper evidence. This was necessary alike for the assertion of our own dignity, for preventing the influx of foreign belligerents in our country, and as a measure of justice to those nations with whom we were at amity. On the grounds of international law the Americans had a right to expect from us that we should not knowingly or wilfully allow our shores to be made the seat of hostile operations against them.—Sir Hugh Cairns (formerly Conservative Solicitor-General, and the first lawyer now at the bar) asked if nothing more had been done than the law of the country warranted, why was it that for upwards of a fortnight the owners of the Alexandra were left in utter ignorance of the crime which was laid to their charge? He complained that the Attorney-General had not offered one word of explanation on this point, demanded to know why, after the machinery of the law had been put in motion by the American consul, a copy of the evidence had not been furnished the parties accused. He ridiculed the notice served on the owners as indicating no offence which was known to the law.—Mr. Cobden, who had given notice that he would call the attention of the House to the necessity of enforcing the Foreign Enlistment Act, began his speech by pleading for indulgence towards the Federalists, if on one or two occasions they had seized innocent British vessels. The enormous development of our trade with the West Indies during the present war was clear evidence of its contraband character; and he was prepared, on English grounds, to justify the conduct of the Federal cruisers. Having thus aroused the passions and awakened the antagonism of his hearers, the hon. member went on to affirm that the Americans had from first to last, from the war of the French Revolution to the Canadian rebellion and the Russian war, acted with perfect good faith and loyalty towards us in passing and enforcing their Foreign Enlistment Act, and that we were bound to reciprocate their conduct; the more so, as our extended commerce would make war a most fearful calamity to us. He urged that the Alabama might be seized whenever she entered a British port, as she had never made a voyage, and was consequently still under British jurisdiction.—Mr. Horsman, speaking in regard to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, said his opinion was that they had with perfect integrity endeavoured to carry out the policy of a strict and undeviating neutrality. There was no doubt that we were bound to enforce the Foreign Enlistment Act, by a regard to our national character; he could not, therefore, be the apologist of men who were guilty of illegal proceedings, that tended to embarrass our relations with other countries. The right hon. gentleman then proceeded to review the progress of the American struggle, from the commencement to the present time, and observed that secession was now an accomplished fact, proved by the triumph in arms, the wisdom and calmness in council, and the spirit of a people determined, as one man, to die for their independence. The war on the part of the North was now not only waged against freedom, but civilization; for great as was the crime of slavery, there was yet a crime of deeper, blacker dye. And it was to be found in the proclamation of President Lincoln, which invited the negro to achieve his freedom by a carnival of crime. There was nothing more creditable in the despatch of the Foreign Secretary, than the manner in which he had laid bare the atrocious character of that proclamation, which had destroyed the last chance of English sympathy with the North. The great republic had been metamorphosed into a military tyranny. Its President was a more irresponsible despot than the Czar of Russia. Liberty of action, thought, speech, and writing had been abolished. The public press was coerced and gagged. The State prisons were filled with political suspects, as was formerly the case in Italy. In fact, the constitution of the United States was at an end. With regard to the feeling in the Northern States towards this country he did not believe that they were desirous of going to war with England; but he believed that it was the deliberate policy of the Washington Cabinet to provoke England to put an end to the blockade as the readiest means of escaping from their own domestic difficulties. Let our merchants then imitate the patience of our operatives, in the full assurance that a generous nation would not suffer them to be the martyrs of its policy. Let all parties unite and press upon the Government the solemn duty of maintaining, under every provocation, the immovable attitude of peace. Let them not by any false move—and no move could be so false as a collision at sea or a diplomatic ultimatum that might commit us to war—transfer to England the guilt of others, and associate our names in after ages with calamities prepared for generations unborn by the rash, bewildered, and desperate men in whose hands the destinies of unhappy America were now placed. Our first duty was to observe a strict neutrality, and give the North no cause of quarrel; and next, to leave no misconception with regard to the real opinion of this country with regard to the war.—The Solicitor-General said there could be no doubt that it was the duty of the Government to enforce the Foreign Enlistment Act, and that those persons who did not feel the obligation of observing the laws in their commercial or other dealings were forgetful of the duty which they owed to their country. At the same time, however, the law was not to be stretched to meet the demands of any Foreign Power.—Sir F. Kelly inquired whether the Government had adopted any measures to facilitate and protect merchant vessels and the postal communication between this country and the different ports within and near to the Gulf of Mexico.—Lord Palmerston said that the security for merchant vessels was that the American Government would, it was to be hoped, observe the law of nations, and that if any vessels were captured on suspicions which might afterwards prove groundless the owners would be entitled to adequate compensation in the American prize courts. With regard to mails seized in merchant vessels, the American Government had prescribed rules to the effect that the bags should not be opened, but should be forwarded to the Consul of the nation to which they belonged, who would have power to examine them, and to give up any correspondence which might be found of a hostile character.—Mr. Monckton Milnes protested against the idea of going to war with the United States, in their present condition, as un-English and ungenerous. It was like a strong man threatening to fight a man with one arm disabled and his eyes blinded. The discussion then dropped.

Some other business was transacted, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, APRIL 27.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Lord Russell stated that, in accordance with his promise on Friday, he had consulted the law officers of the Crown, but that it was not desirable then to mention what their opinion was with reference to the instructions issued by Mr. Seward for the guidance of the naval officers of the United States in the capture of British merchant vessels carrying her Majesty's mails from this country to neutral ports. With regard to the case of the Aries, the result of Lord Lyons's remonstrances was that Mr. Seward had written to Mr. Gideon Welles to the effect that it was not expedient that the naval officers in charge of the blockade should open the mail-bags of a friendly Power duly authenticated by an official seal, but that they should be forwarded with all convenient despatch to their destination. No question had arisen in consequence of these instructions until very recently; and it was only that morning that he had received an official account, from which it appeared that on the 4th of April Mr. Archibald, our consul at New York, received the mails which were taken on board the Peterhoff under the seal of the Postmaster-General, and directed in due form. Mr. Archibald protested against breaking the seal or disturbing the bags, and required that it should be despatched to its destination. The Federal authorities insisted that the bag should be opened, and it was opened accordingly, and found to contain several packages directed to Matamoras. They did not, however, proceed further, and Mr. Archibald reported proceedings to Lord Lyons, who at once addressed Mr. Seward, declaring that this proceeding was a violation of the instructions before referred to; and Mr. Seward had requested time to consider the matter. Subsequently Mr. Archibald was told that the prize court had decided that the letters should be opened, and he was asked to do so himself, forwarding those which were bona fide to their addresses, and handing over those which related to the cargo to the prize court. Mr. Archibald declined to be a party to any such proceedings, but said that if the prize court insisted on the letters being opened he would be present, but only as a witness. In consequence of this declaration the proceedings seemed to have been suspended; and Mr. Seward had given directions that until orders from Washington no further steps should be taken, but at the time the mail left the United States Government had not come to any decision on the subject.—The Marquis of Clanricarde observed that the merchants ought to have been informed more fully of these instructions with regard to the mails. He hoped measures would be taken to have complete reports of the proceedings before the American prize courts.—Earl Russell said he would communicate with Lord Lyons on the point. Having disposed of the business on the paper, which was entirely of a routine character, their lordships adjourned.

MONDAY, APRIL 27.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The orders of the day having been postponed, Mr. Ferrand rose and moved a resolution to the effect—"That in the opinion of the House it was the duty of the Government to take into consideration, without delay, what measures might be necessary to relieve the distress which prevailed in the cotton manufacturing districts, so that the people might no longer continue unemployed." In support of his motion the hon. member replied at some length to the statements contained in a recently published letter by Mr. Potter, the member for Carlisle, and contended, in opposition to that gentleman, that the cotton manufacturers themselves were alone responsible for the present state of affairs in the manufacturing districts; that the cotton trade had always been fluctuating and unsteady, and the occupation demoralising and degrading to the operatives and fearfully destructive of human life; and that even if a fresh supply of cotton were obtained, any attempt, as suggested by Mr. Potter, to force the manufacture into the untravelling parts of India would not only be unaccompanied by the restoration of the trade to its former prosperity, but there would be another insurrection in that country. What, in these circumstances, ought the manufacturers to do? Certainly not to come to this House for a loan to relieve them from their difficulties. Let them adopt an eight hours' bill for adults and a four hours' bill for children; and let Parliament comply with the prayer of the distressed operatives, and supply them with the means of carrying their labour elsewhere. A royal commission sent down to the cotton districts to inquire into the cause of the distress was useless. The real cause was that the mills were locked up; and the adoption of the amendment of which notice had been given would only have the effect of keeping the people idle round the mills until a sufficient supply of cotton had been found to set them to work.—Mr. Potter then proposed as an amendment, that a humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into the present state of the cotton manufacturing districts, and to report on the best mode of relieving the distress existing therein. In doing so the hon. member observed that upwards of two millions sterling had been raised by rates and voluntary contributions on behalf of Lancashire, where 437,000 persons were still subsisting on charity. Among these were nearly 80,000 able-bodied men, and he suggested that the Government should adopt measures for their employment on public works of a reproductive character. He believed that the legitimate relief of the operatives by a sufficient supply of cotton was merely a question of time, and that all that was requisite was to endeavour to tide over the interval, and keep up the morale of the workpeople. A royal commission would, in his opinion, tend to quiet the public mind, and he hoped the Government would not oppose so moderate a proposal.—The motion was seconded by Mr. Cobden.—Mr. Baillie recommended that emigration should be promoted, and the people at once employed upon the fortifications and other public works.—Mr. Villiers, commenting upon the speech of Mr. Ferrand, whose motion he opposed, declared that that hon. gentleman had not put any tangible issue to the House. With regard to the amendment, he did not think that Parliament would be in a better position to act upon the report of a Royal commission than it was at the present moment. The whole of the facts were already before the country. Upwards of 400,000 persons were now dependent upon public charity, including 72,000 able-bodied men; and to find employment for the latter would, no doubt, be most desirable. But as to emigration, he did not consider that it was the duty of the Government to expend the public money in giving facilities for the exportation of valuable labour to other countries. The Poor-law department had caused inquiries to be made, and had ascertained that in Lancashire and North Cheshire alone there would be abundant employment in drainage and other works for 100,000 men for two winters. Competent persons would at once be despatched to these districts, and he entertained the sanguine hope that, at the expiration of three weeks, means would be found to provide employment in their own country for the whole of the able-bodied poor now reluctantly dependent upon alms.—Colonel W. Patten approved neither of the motion nor the amendment. Emigration, to whatever extent it might be carried, would only apply a very small measure of relief; whilst a Royal Commission would not afford more information to the House than it already possessed. There was no doubt that the resources at the command of the relief committees would not enable them to go on maintaining 400,000 people for any lengthened period, supposing the present state of things to continue; in fact the balance in hand was such as to require the immediate attention of the House and the Government to the question how employment was to be given to prevent their utter demoralisation. The total amount of subscriptions, including £680,000 raised under the poor law, amounted to £2,735,000, of which there had been expended £1,183,319; and the balance remaining to the credit of the Central Fund, the Bridgwater House and the Liverpool Funds, and in the hands of the local committees, was £755,000. For a considerable time the relief committees had been impressed with the fact that unless some employment were found for the people they must become entirely demoralised; and he was glad to learn that the Government had resolved to do what had long been desired, and send down persons to inquire into the matter with that object in view. On the whole he ventured to express the satisfaction with which he had heard the announcement made on behalf of the Government, and he would suggest that both motion and amendment should be withdrawn.—Col. Edwards made an after-dinner speech, and the discussion fell entirely into the hands of the minor Lancashire members, who generally approved the proposition of the Government. Ultimately Col. Wilson Patten's suggestion was adopted.

Some further business was transacted, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, APRIL 28.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

No business of any public interest was transacted.

TUESDAY, APRIL 28.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

General Lindsay moved an address to her Majesty, praying that a Royal Commission might issue for an inquiry into the case of the officers raised to the rank of Colonel for distinguished services during the Crimean war.—Lord Palmerston objected to interference by the House of Commons with the details of military administration.—Mr. Disraeli thought the present subject a fit one for the attention of the House.—The motion was withdrawn.

Mr. A. Mills moved for further papers regarding the military defence of the Colonies, especially of Canada and New Zealand.—Mr. Williams, the great representative in the House of the chequesparing economists, supported the motion.—Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Under Secretary for the Colonies, said the Canadian Government had evinced a sense of the obligation that lay upon the colony to make provision for its own defence; it had raised a volunteer force, and the rural militia would in time become an efficient body of troops. On the question as to the burden of military defence it was impossible to lay down an inflexible rule. The Home Government had urged upon that of Canada a system of direct taxation, which would enable the colony to lower the duty upon imports and to put its defences upon a firmer foundation. He showed from the official correspondence the policy which had been maintained by the Colonial Secretary, and which, he said, he would continue to maintain in reference to Canada. With regard to New Zealand, he explained the position of the Imperial Government in relation to that of the colony, the responsibility which the former had acknowledged, and the policy it was pursuing. Mr. Aytoun complained of the heavy burden incurred by this country on account of its colonies, and though, considering the population and revenues of Canada, it might be expected to do a great deal for its own defence, whereas it had done little or nothing. He urged the ill effects of the present policy of the Government towards Canada.—Mr. Adelerley took a different view of the policy of the Government as disclosed in the papers. That policy was founded upon the principle that the right of self-government involved the duty of self-defence, the terms being correlative. The arguments of the Canadian Government in opposition to this policy, he maintained, were based upon fallacies. The Parliament of Canada might involve this country in a war as well as the Parliament of England involve Canada in a war. The opposition of the New Zealand Government was founded upon a similar fallacy, claiming, although in the enjoyment of complete self-government, to throw the burden of the defence of the colony upon the mother country. He hoped the House would support the Government in their present policy.—Mr. Buxton considered that it would be better for the colonies themselves that the duty of self-defence should not be taken off their hands.—The motion was withdrawn.

Sir J. Elphinstone moved an address to her Majesty to appoint a Royal commission to consider the best mode of construction and form of the iron-clad ships which are to compose the future navy of England; to report upon the ships built and building, and the dock and basin accommodation required for their use at home and abroad. He observed that we were now entering upon a third reconstruction of our navy within his recollection—a more costly one than the others, and the whole responsibility of this enormous charge was thrown upon an office too hard worked. The object of his motion was to relieve the Admiralty of labour and afford that Board the advice of a council of able scientific men in the construction of our iron ships. He specified certain points upon a due attention to which the essential qualities of such vessels depended, and was of opinion that they should be built in Government yards. He entered into other technical details in relation to the form and class of the vessels, and to dock and basin accommodation for iron-clad ships, the deficiency of which, he said, would prove a great evil.—Lord R. Montagu moved, as an amendment, a resolution that, with a view to provide for the economical construction of ships for the Royal Navy of the most suitable form and materials, the Board of Admiralty should be empowered to introduce into the public service a class of persons equal in education and position to the military cadets at Woolwich, who (subject to certain regulations and conditions) may ultimately fulfil the duties of Royal naval architects.—Mr. Lindsay made a few remarks upon the progress attributed by Lord R. Montagu to the French in shipbuilding, and dissented from some of the opinions expressed by Sir J. Elphinstone, especially his preference of Government to private yards for the building of iron ships. He hoped the motion would not be pressed, but he thought it was desirable that the Board of Admiralty should have a council of practical men.—Lord C. Paget was of opinion that the appointment of a Royal Commission, as proposed by Sir J. Elphinstone, would be anything but advisable. Changes were continually taking place, and the probability was that, if a commission or committee were appointed, their report would turn out worthless. He could not discover in the speech of Sir J. Elphinstone any real ground of complaint against the Admiralty. He defended the employment by the Government of private ship-builders; at the same time, it was not intended to throw the construction of iron ships entirely into the hands of contractors. As to dock accommodation, which he admitted was deficient, he stated the measures taken to remedy the deficiency. He made a few observations upon the object proposed by the amendment, which he hoped would not be pressed.

The motion and amendment were withdrawn. Some unimportant discussions followed, and the House adjourned a little before 2 A.M.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Sir John Trelawny moved the second reading of his bill to abolish church-rates, which he supported by the invariable arguments. Mr. Hardy moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months. The bill was defended by Sir C. Douglas, Lord A. Churchill, Mr. Walter, and Sir G. Grey (the Home Secretary). It was opposed by Mr. Whiteside, Lord J. Manners, and Mr. Newdegate; the last-named gentleman promising to introduce a compromise measure. On a division the bill was lost; ayes 275, noes 235. The announcement of the numbers was received with vociferous cheering from the opposition.

No further business of any interest was discussed, and the House adjourned at ten minutes to six.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, April 29, 1863.

The past week in the cotton markets, unlike most of its recent predecessors, has witnessed dull dragging markets from day to day with a considerable decline in prices.

At the close of our last report, under the fear of our friendly relations with America being endangered by the action of Admiral Wilkes, the market had become dull, though prices were unchanged. Till the close of the week, with a daily business of 4,000 bales, a heavy spiritless tone prevailed, and prices were rather against the seller.

On Monday, the Canada's news were to hand, reporting the complete defeat of the Federal attacking fleet at Charleston, and their abandonment of the enterprise. These accounts, taken in conjunction with the utter failure of the Vicksburg expedition, and the threatened attack on New Orleans, led to the belief, on the part of some, that the North, seeing the utter failure of their most cherished schemes, and the disastrous nature of their winter campaign, would be obliged to give in ere long in sheer disgust. This view, however, was not largely held, and it was generally thought that the same infatuation which has led them to persevere in this unhappy war, after similar defeats, would again lead them to renewed exertions to repair past disasters.

Our market, however, was adversely influenced, and the sales only reached 4,000 bales at easier prices. The receipt of India telegrams reporting a quiet market for goods and yarns in Calcutta, and accounting for an advance of one shilling per piece in Bombay by the lower range of prices previously ruling there compared with the former market, had the effect of checking business in Manchester yesterday; and to-day 4,000 bales only have been sold here, at a decline of  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. in the medium qualities of Surats, and 4d. to 1d. in long staples since our last quotations.

We quote Middlesboro 21 1/2d., Fair Egyptian 20 1/2d., Fair Dhollerah and Omrawatee 17 1/2d.

MANCHESTER, APRIL 28.

During the past week our market has been rather dull, no great amount of business having been done in either yarn or cloth, yet, upon the whole, there is very little to complain of, as spinners and manufacturers, who commenced running their mills again some time back, are well in order, and will not in most cases be again in the market for some time to come.

Quietness of demand has been most observable in Blackburn descriptions of yarns, say from Nos. 32's to 50's twist on pin-cops, whilst for Bolton's spinnings of Nos. 60's twist, and 70's and 80's wets, there has been a very steady inquiry all the week at firm prices.

Cloths of all kinds have been very steady in value, but as the demand has been rather quiet this week, we do not hear of any advance in quotations.

To-day has been the dullist day of the week, very little business having been transacted; nevertheless, home-trade yarns are the only articles which are affected in value; some few sales of the lower qualities having taken place at a reduction of fully 4d. per lb. on the prices of the Tuesday previous.

For the first time for many months past, there have been some inquiries for forty-five inch shirtings for India shipment, and orders for them at paying prices have been given out to make.

T-cloths and long cloths are still being bought up in small quantities for shipment to the Levant.

LINCOLN'S LATEST.

EXTRACT FROM A PRIVATE LETTER.

Washington, 7th April, 1863.

You, no doubt, know that President Lincoln is an inveterate joker, and that he will have his joke, no matter how it may shock his company. The anecdotes related of him would already fill volumes, and he has no doubt to father a great many with which he had nothing at all to do. His sayings are not all very classical or refined, and cannot always be repeated; but I think, I may venture to relate the following, which I know to be authentic. Chase came to the President very much excited, and showed him a caricature representing a goose swallowing gold, but parting with it behind in the shape of greenbacks. Chase indignantly declared he "would at once give $500 if he knew the author of the infamy." The President listened calmly, and then, without any change of feature, asked, "From what end would you take the Five Hundred?"

MORE CAPTURES.—CONFEDERATE STATES' STEAMER "FLORIDA."

Our St. Thomas correspondent writes, under date of 13th April:—

We have intelligence this morning from St. Croix of the arrival there yesterday of the Danish brig George, from Liverpool, with 31 men and one female taken by the Florida from the following vessels burned at sea, viz., brig Colcord, bark Lapwing, and brig Star of Peace. The crews are expected over to-night, and should I obtain any further particulars in time, will advise you.

The Hon. James B. Clay, of Kentucky, is here en route for Halifax.

FEDERAL BARBARITY IN VIRGINIA.

President Davis, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, submitted the following report in reference to the conduct of the Federal General Milroy:—

Head-quarters C.S. Troops on Shenandoah Mountains, Virginia, December 9th, 1862.

His Excellency the President:

Sir,—Day before yesterday, Mr. Job Parsons, a citizen of Tucker county, in this State, personally well known to me as a man of the highest respectability, came to this camp to enlist under my command. He was pursued by eight of the enemy's cavalry for many miles, but his superior knowledge of the mountains enabled him to elude his pursuers and escape. He handed me the enclosed original papers, which had been "served upon" him by the military authorities at St. George. A similar assessment was made on Mr. Parsons' father for $300, and on another relative for $700, and payment coerced under the same diabolical threats. The pretext of "robberies of Union men by bands of guerillas," is a falsehood. The fact is, that Union men have conspired to run off each other's horses to Pennsylvania, where they are secretly sold, the owners afterwards setting up a claim for reparation on the false ground that "guerillas" have robbed them.

I enclose this evidence of the atrocity of General Milroy, for such action as your Excellency may deem expedient in retaliation, either as a restraint upon this savage, or a punishment, should this horrible threat ever be carried into execution.

This is only one of a thousand barbarities practised here in these distant mountains, of which I have almost daily heard for the last four months. Oh, for a day of retribution!

JOHN D. IMBODEN, Colonel Commanding.

ORDERS OF GENERAL MILROY.

St. George, Tucker County, West Virginia, November 27th, 1862.

Mr. Job Parsons (son of Abraham):

You are hereby ordered to report in person or by your representative, at my head-quarters in St. George Court-house, on the 28th of November, 1862, to attend to business of vital importance to yourself. And in case of your failure to comply with the above order, you must suffer the penalty.

By order of Brigadier General R. H. Milroy.

Captain HORACE KELLOGG,
Post-Commandant.

St. George, Tucker County, Virginia,
November 28th, 1862.

Mr. Job Parsons (son of Abraham Parsons):

Sir,—In consequence of certain robberies which have been perpetrated upon Union citizens of Tucker county, Virginia, by bands of guerillas, you are hereby assessed to the amount of fourteen dollars and twenty-five cents ($14.25) to make good their losses; and upon your failure to comply with the above assessment, by paying the money over to me by the first day of December, 1862, the following order will be executed, viz:—

"If they fail to pay at the end of the time you have named, their houses will be burned and themselves shot; and their property all seized; and be sure that you carry out this threat rigidly, and show them that you are not trifling or to be trifled with."

"You will inform the inhabitants for ten or fifteen miles around your camp, on all the roads approaching the town, upon which the enemy may approach, that they must dash in and give you notice, and that upon failure of any one doing so, their houses will be burned and the men shot."

By order of Brigadier-General R. H. Milroy.

Captain HORACE KELLOGG,
Commanding Post.

MILITARY GARDENERS.—The Southern papers, during the whole planting season, have urged the question of provision corps for the current year with so much warmth as to lead the Northerners into the delusion that the South was on the eve of actual starvation. The very efforts made to avert scarcity, are the surest protection against it. Among these efforts the most interesting, and not the least creditable to Southern good sense, is that described below in a paragraph from the Mobile Register. The example there cited has been very generally followed in all stationary camps, and in the various camps of instruction:—"Colonel Wiman's 19th Regiment Louisiana Volunteers has cleared and planted a large vegetable garden, near his camp, at Pollard. The soldiers consider the working of this garden quite a recreation and relief from the eternal monotony of drill. In a few weeks this regiment will have the greatest abundance of vegetables, that cost nothing except the pleasure of growing them. Besides this garden, the Colonel is preparing to plant a large field near by with corn for roasting ears and with melons."

THE NEW MEXICAN STEAMERS.—The administration of the new French Transatlantic Steam Navigation Company has reported progress in reference to the line of steamers established last year between St. Nazaire and Mexico. It appears that eighteen outward and homeward voyages were successfully effected in 1862, the profits of which belong more especially to that year's "exercise." In these nine double voyages the speed of the company's steamers was materially exceeded, the scale of nine knots per hour originally provided for. Two of them, the Louisiana and the Florida have attained averages of eleven knots per hour, and accomplished remarkable passages. At three different periods these steamers traversed the 1,300 leagues which separate St. Nazaire and Martinique in thirteen days instead of sixteen. The Louisiana has even done more; it has gone out to Vera Cruz and returned in forty-four and a half days, showing a constant progress of eleven knots per hour over 3,800 leagues of sea. The perfect solidity and security of the vessels is also stated to have been efficiently and satisfactorily tested. Notwithstanding the inherent difficulties attending a service to a great extent experimental, the movement of passengers and goods for nine months of 1862 amounted to 2,081 of the former and 2,672 tons of the latter.

FORT M'ALLISTER.—Off the Georgia coast, and eighteen miles to the southward of the mouth of the Savannah river, is Ossabaw Sound. Into this sound flows the Ogeechee river a stream navigable some distance up—some thirty miles—its vessels of a larger class. On the Ogeechee river, four miles above the sound, is situated Fort M'Allister. The Fort stands on the main land, directly on the river bank, and commands the river for a mile and a half or two miles. The country for several miles along the Ogeechee, as is almost universally the case on the Southern coast, is but an extensive marsh, crossed and recrossed by innumerable little creeks and inlets connected with the main stream. Some of the islands formed by these creeks and inlets are large, and contain large plantations, but while there is one of these, there are hundreds of others mere marshes. To the northward of the Big Ogeechee, and connected with many numerous creeks, are two more considerable streams, called the Little Ogeechee and Vernon rivers, on each of which are said to be strong batteries.—Richmond Examiner.

FORT PEMBERTON.—A good deal of misapprehension exists in reference to the location of this post. It is so often spoken of as a barrier in the progress of the enemy to the rear of Vicksburg, that it is considered by many to be quite near the latter place. On the contrary, it is more than one hundred miles distant. Fort Pemberton is on the Yazoo river, a short distance below the confluence of the Tallahatchie and Yellobusha. The Yankees reached it through Yazoo pass, which leaves the Mississippi a few miles below Helena and Coldwater river—the latter emptying into the Yazoo, about or near the point where we suppose Fort Pemberton to be situated. Should the Yankees succeed in passing this Fort, we do not understand how they would be in the rear of Vicksburg, for they would still be in the Yazoo, which empties into the Mississippi above Vicksburg. They would, however, be able to destroy all our boats on the Yazoo and cut us off from the large extent of rich country lying between the Yazoo and Mississippi, from which our Vicksburg army is being mainly subsisted. Fort Pemberton is not more than thirty miles from the Mississippi Central Railroad, and can thus be readily reinforced from Vicksburg if necessary.—Charleston Courier.

THE FEDERAL CONSCRIPTION LAW.—It is possible that by bribery and intimidation, all resistance will be overcome. The misery of the North will be increased, not the danger of the South. We must prepare steadily and resolutely for a long war, but we need not tremble at the threat of three millions of Yankee conscripts. Not the army of Xerxes, but the army of Alexander; not the glittering horde of wealthy Persia, but the firm phalanx of Macedonia, now as thousands of years ago, conquer contested fields. God is on the side of the biggest battalions—but they must be battalions of brave and willing soldiers, not of frightened and disconcerted recruits. These laws put Lincoln into the boots of Cromwell, but these do not put Cromwell into the boots of Lincoln. The experience of this war abundantly proves the fallacy of the reliance on mere numbers. The North has tried an army of twelve hundred thousand men and found it an encumbrance; it will now find three millions only a greater encumbrance. Let the Southern ranks be filled with all the men of the nation who are not necessary to its support; let them be made to stay there and do their duty; let the Government abide by the laws and never disunite the people by usurpations of authority; and then the South can look its unwieldy adversary in the face with the resolute assurance of victory.—The Richmond Examiner.

CLERICAL ASSURANCE.—We have heard of persons being so reduced as to sell their bodies for dissection, and though such a proceeding does not hasten their decease, it must be exceedingly unpleasant. A similar verdict will be pronounced on the treatment of the Bishop of Exeter by the Rev. R. W. Shutte. It is unpleasant and disgusting. Mr. Shutte proposes to sell the Bishop's literary remains before he dies, and intimates his intention to the Bishop, thus adding vulgar impudence to unprovoked injury. From the specimen that has appeared we do not think Mr. Shutte will succeed. His ability is not at all commensurate with his unscrupulous impertinence. His work is as devoid of literary and biographical merit, as his correspondence with the Bishop is of gentlemanly feeling. The case of "The Bishop of Exeter v. Shutte," which was tried before Vice-Chancellor Wood last week, is certainly a legal, social, and literary curiosity. The defendant, who holds a parish in the diocese of Exeter, entered into a correspondence with the Bishop in 1861, in reference to a proposed memoir of his Lordship. The Bishop replied that he considered any publication without his consent of letters written by him as "an outrageous violation of all decency," and that he should forthwith apply for an injunction to restrain such a proceeding. Mr. Shutte denied any such intention, adding that it never had formed part of his plan to publish the whole or any part of his Lordship's letters, and that, if it had, he should have asked permission. With this explanation the Bishop was satisfied, but his Lordship little imagined that the deceased Chaplain's memoir was but the precursor of his own "Life." On the 20th February, 1862, Mr. Shutte again wrote to the Bishop, saying, "Some months ago I was asked by a firm of eminent publishers to undertake the preparation of a work, to be entitled 'Life, Times, and Writings' of your Lordship. Though it was most natural that such a work should record the services of one who for so many years stood in the fore-front of the Church's battle, yet that the offer should be made to me was most unexpected; but the terms were so liberal that, after careful consideration, I could not refuse to undertake the work. I have therefore entered into an engagement to produce it." What on earth the Bishop had to do with the terms being liberal, or that a large payment excuses a conduct otherwise objectionable, we cannot understand. Mr. Shutte modestly suggests in the same letter, that "it would indeed be no small gratification to myself to know that I could have the benefit of your Lordship's judgment on doubtful and difficult points." The Bishop must have an excellent temper, for instead of throwing the letter behind the fire, he answered it by his chaplain, and contented himself by stating that, "he had no right to object to the undertaking, but that he declines to give any encouragement to it, or to have anything to do with it, and requests you to abstain from applying to him for particulars." Mr. Shutte was not abashed by this reproof, but on the 11th of July, 1862, returned to the charge with renewed vigour. He now begged to inform the Bishop that, "a great number of letters written by your Lordship between 1813 and 1858 have been placed in my hands as materials for the work on which I am engaged, and that I think it possible that selections from them will be valuable as well as interesting. I shall be happy to wait on your Lordship on your return to Devonshire, to submit the extracts which I propose to use for your Lordship's approval." This was almost too much for the temper and patience of the Bishop, and he answered the letter by return of post:—"You have an undoubted right to publish such a work, but I must add that I believe you are the only person who would announce such an intention to me without at the same time asking my consent. Be that as it may, I decline altogether communicating with you on the matter. I will, however, on seeing 'the letters,' of which you say that there is 'a great number written by me between 1813 and 1858,' and 'placed in your hands' by some one not named 'as materials on which you are engaged,' tell you whether I allow the publication of them or not." On the 18th of July Mr. Shutte wrote to the Bishop:—"I beg to submit to your Lordship that it had not occurred to me, when I wrote my letter of the 11th inst., that if on the one hand I submitted to your Lordship all letters of your Lordship in my possession, but do not receive on the other your Lordship's assistance towards supplying myself with reliable matter, I shall be in a very unfavourable position with the public, because it must appear that I am writing under your Lordship's direction, while I am not receiving from your Lordship the assistance which can alone make the book valuable. May I beg your Lordship to consider the position? As I am able to look at it, it seems to me plain, that if I cannot have your Lordship's free assistance, I have no alternative but to fulfil my engagement with the publishers in the best way I can." When "The Life, Times, and Writings of the Bishop of Exeter," by the Rev. R. Shutte, was announced, the Bishop concluding from the above correspondence that his letters were to be published without his permission, applied for and obtained an injunction. Some months later Mr. Shutte made an affidavit, in which he denied emphatically that he ever expressed an intention of publishing the Bishop's letters, or selections or extracts therefrom, or that he ever intended to publish them, unless he had previously obtained his Lordship's consent; and insisted, as a matter of law, that no portion of the correspondence showed that he ever intended to publish any letter of the plaintiff, or any extract therefrom, without his consent. Upon this affidavit the Vice-Chancellor dismissed the bill, but without costs, and in terms that would be anything but agreeable to a man of gentlemanly feeling. His Honour said, "I confess that I, for one, never thought that the correspondence was susceptible of the interpretation now given to it by the defendant's affidavit." * * * No doubt, a clergyman who announced his intention of publishing the life of his diocesan, whatever might be the feelings of the diocesan on the subject, and of including in such 'Life' private letters extending over a period of forty years, was guilty of a grave offence, if not against the law, at all events against delicacy and morality. * * * It was utterly impossible to justify, either in law or in morals, any one in sending a correspondence extending over forty years to another for publication. Still less could he understand how with any feelings of delicacy or honour any one could sit down, without asking leave of the writer, to read such a correspondence. He should dismiss the bill; but he did so solely on the ground of the defendant's oath, that he never intended to publish the letters." Mr. Shutte must have been very liberally paid, indeed, if it compensates him for the remarks of Vice-Chancellor Wood, and for the way in which his conduct has been discussed by the press.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, APRIL 30, 1863.

Charleston.

A year has passed away since the publication of the first number of THE INDEX, a year of great battles, of extraordinary trials, of almost marvellous triumphs, a year rich in records of gallant deeds and enduring patriotism, and replete with events which have worthily ushered in the Southern Confederacy to the family of nations. Twelve months ago the aspect of affairs was gloomy enough for the South. The Federal armies, recovered from their disasters on the Potomac, were going southward by hundreds of thousands; great fleets of gunboats traversed the rivers of the Southern States; one strong position after another had surrendered to superior force; the outer line of the Confederate defences was penetrated; and as the Northern hordes closed slowly in from the Potomac, from the Western States, from the Mississippi, and from the Atlantic seaboard, it required all our confidence in a just cause, all our faith in the devotion of Southern patriots, all our knowledge of the high courage and determined purpose of this great people struggling for its independence, to resist a natural fear of the overwhelming forces arrayed against it, and believe in its ultimate success. The tide of war was, in fact, at its lowest ebb with the Confederates a year ago. In one town and another along the Eastern sea-coast, Federal troops had gained a footing. Forts Donnelson and Henry, the defences of the State of Tennessee, had fallen; and the Tennessee and Cumberland rivers were open to the Federal gunboats. The flotillas, which had so easily swept away the garrisons of those forts, were penetrating into the very heart of the Confederacy. The Mississippi was apparently at their mercy; Nashville was taken; Kentucky overturned. McClellan, with an army of 120,000 men, had landed on the York Town Peninsula, and had marched, fighting his way step by step, to the very walls of Richmond. Ninety days was the time allowed to the rebellion by the sanguine politicians of Washington, and the New York press was already exulting in the dream of punishment to be inflicted on the rebellious cities of the South, and the prospective doom of the leaders of secession. But the tide turned; the torrent of invasion was stemmed and beaten back. McClellan's grand Army of the Potomac, decimated by disease and battle, found safety under the fire of the gunboats on the James River. The armies of the West stopped, as if paralysed, on the borders of East Tennessee. Vicksburg defied the flotillas from Cairo and New Orleans. Then came the reaction. One after another the armies of Banks, Fremont, and Pope were assailed by the Confederate generals, and hurled back upon the Northern frontier; Maryland, and even Pennsylvania were scoured by the charge of the Virginian cavalry; Washington was for months in greater danger than Richmond. Kentucky was overrun by Confederate soldiery, and the men of Cincinnati and Indianapolis trembled lest the wrongs their armies had perpetrated on Southern soil should be expiated on their own hearths. The black frost came; but this time, instead of bringing triumph to the North, added a new disaster to the terrible list of Federal reverses in the bloody repulse of Fredericksburg. Finally, the long-awaited floods swelled the Southern water-courses, even with the margin of the river banks, and the Federal commanders started anew on their work of subjugation and devastation. And now the waters are falling, and they have achieved nothing. They have been driven back from Port Hudson. They are drawing off the wasted remnant of the beaten army from before Vicksburg. They have made their long-prepared attack upon the "doomed" Palmetto City, and have been miserably repulsed. At this moment Rosecranz holds Nashville by the most precarious of tenures, and Banks is fortifying New Orleans against an expected Confederate attack. For nearly twelve months the history of the war has been a record of uninterrupted Confederate successes. It is with gratitude to the God of battles for the past, and with renewed trust for the future that we recount the last triumph of Confederate arms, the successful defence of Charleston.

It was on the 7th inst. that the famous iron-clad squadron stood boldly in for the great duel which had been so long and anxiously expected on both sides the Atlantic. The previous day, the Federals had anchored inside the bar and buoyed out a passage almost within the range of Fort Sumter. It was ascertained that there were no obstacles in the main ship Channel to prevent them taking up positions within easy range of the Charleston batteries; and it was known on the night of the 6th throughout Charleston, and on board the Federal fleet, that the issue would be decided on the morrow. To our readers it will appear at once that only the most extravagant faith in the powers of the iron-clads could have blinded the Northern officers to the hopelessness of the contest. The number of guns which the Federal squadron could bring to bear upon the batteries could not have exceeded fifty—guns of enormous calibre, it is true, but proportionately difficult to handle. Opposed to these, Charleston could show a long succession of batteries of the most formidable construction, stretching away on either side of the bay, crowding every available point with powerful artillery, with here and there a fortress rising out of their midst armed en barbette, tier upon tier of heavy guns threatening to sweep the channel. Of the number of guns brought to bear in the engagement we cannot speak precisely. The Northern correspondents, in narrating their disaster, naturally deal in large figures. But we may state with some certainty that at a point a little beyond that reached by the Federal iron-clads, a concentric fire of 300 guns of enormous calibre, many of them rifled cannons of the newest pattern, could have been brought to bear upon the enemy. The iron-clads advanced in regular order at intervals of a cable's length; the Weehawken, protected by a kind of raft to remove and explode torpedoes, leading. After her, came in succession the Passaic, Montauk, Patapsco, the New Ironsides, bearing the flag of Admiral Dupont, the Catskill, the Nantucket, the Nahant, and the Keokuk. Slowly they steamed by Morris Island, within range of the Confederate batteries, but their orders are not to fire, and the Confederate batteries are equally silent. They are now in the straight channel for Charleston; right in front of them is Fort Sumter, and close to Fort Sumter the Confederate squadron, under Ingraham, which has steamed out to take its share in the day's struggle. They steam on and pass a second battery, Battery Bee—still the same silence; and now they are within range of the batteries on Sullivan's Island, of the guns of Fort Moultrie and Fort Sumter. Then the silence is broken, and from the latter fort a great salvo of artillery bursts forth on the Weehawken. She returns the fire, slowly, but is evidently in difficulties. She has reached the first net-work of obstructions; her screw is fouled; for a few minutes she drifts a log upon the water at the mercy of the current, but she frees herself, and heads for the passage south of Fort Sumter. The Northern channel is barred by nets and hawsers strung, say the Yankees, with torpedoes. They make for the Southern channel, but that too is stopped. Between Fort Sumter and Cumming's Point is a row of piles extending ten feet above the water—the Channel is impassable. So the fleet is signalled to commence firing, and the duel begins at a range of from 600 to 1,000 yards. For thirty minutes the thunder of artillery never ceases; from Sumter, from Moultrie, from Sullivan's and Morris Islands the Confederate batteries pour their iron hail upon the iron-clads. At the end of that time the fight is over. The great ship, the Ironsides, has taken no part in the attack upon Fort Sumter. She steers badly in the narrow channel, and her captain can only engage the guns of Fort Moultrie. The Keokuk drops down past the flag-ship in a sinking condition—she is completely riddled—her turrets shot through: she has engaged Fort Sumter at 500 yards, and received her death-blow. The Montauk suffers almost as much. She is pierced through and through close above the water line, and her turret is shattered. The Passaic meets no better fate; her iron covering affords no resistance to the steel-pointed projectiles from the Whitworth guns, and her turret ceases to work. A similar misfortune befalls the Nantucket; all are more or less seriously injured, and the Ironsides has her port shutter shot away, and her gun deck exposed. Under these circumstances the Admiral makes the signal for retiring, and the squadron, still firing, slowly falls back out of range, terribly mauled. The Keokuk sinks at her anchors the next morning. All the next day the fleet is busy with repairs, and one or two of the most shattered vessels are sent to Port Royal to refit. And the news goes up to the North that the long-delayed attack on Charleston has been made, that the redoubtable iron-clads are so many disabled hulks, that the repulse is complete, irreparable, and final.

The attack on Charleston is one more instance of the mismanagement which has illustrated the Northern conduct of the war. For two years the Confederates have been expending on the defences of the Palmetto City all the resources that the best engineering skill, and a superabundance of labour could apply. Yet the attack is made by a squadron of nine iron-clads, mounting, at the outside, fifty guns, unsupported by any land force, and apparently without any attempt at a reconnaissance. The fleet is arrested at a point where it is most exposed to the Confederate fire, and, at the end of half an hour, the contest is over, with a loss of five killed and wounded on the Confederate side, and less than 100 casualties amongst the Federals. What has become of that great army which, six weeks ago, expected to have landed at Hilton Head 60,000 strong? It is plain that the Federals have been defrauding the world and themselves, and that their numbers have been grossly exaggerated; and for their empty boasts the lives and reputation of gallant officers are sacrificed. The duel at Charleston is not without its interest, apart from the decisive influence it must exercise on the future of the war in America. It has shown clearly that stationary forts with well-placed water obstructions will always hold their own against a purely naval force. It has read a useful lesson to aggressors and invaders all over the world; for it proves the difficulties which a gallant people, relying on its own material resources, its own energy and courage, may place in the way of overwhelming fleets and armies, and the ease with which a successful defence may be organized.

Recent Parliamentary Debates.

It is impossible for a newspaper report to convey the full sense and significance of a Parliamentary debate. It can give every word, or nearly every word, that falls from the leading speakers; it can give the general substance of every speech that is made; but those who have heard an important debate feel, on reading their paper next morning, that the spirit that gave life to the whole affair cannot be reproduced in print. It is not only that we miss the tones and manner that give emphasis and force to the words, so that what the hearer feels to be eloquence seems to the reader dull and tedious prose, and what the hearer conceived to be fair blows given in a manly spirit, seem in print the expressions of malignity and ill temper. It is that we have only one side of the discussion, and that often the less important—we know what was said, but we do not know how it was received. And except in the case of a Ministerial speech, every word of which is supposed to have a meaning and to indicate an intention,—or of an Opposition harangue, intended to convey a declaration of policy, the reception of a speech which is not a statement of new facts, is more significant than the speech itself, in proportion as the feeling of Parliament is of more consequence than the opinions of any one speaker. The “cheers,” and “Hear, hear,” interspersed here and there in the reports are generally inserted with a good deal of carelessness, and however conscientious the reporter may be in this matter, it is impossible for him to convey on paper the meaning and force of those murmurs by which Parliament, and especially the House of Commons, testifies its sympathy or disapproval. This is particularly noticeable in regard to the discussions that have recently taken place on American affairs. With one or two exceptions, the speeches have been tame and certainly pacific; and those of a contrary tendency have generally provoked rebuke and remonstrance from subsequent orators. But the tone of the House of Commons is unmistakably warlike; and it is not doubtful that the news that the Ministry had determined to deal peremptorily with outrages on the British flag, or had demanded the recall of Admiral Wilkes, or had sent Mr. Adams his passports, would be received with vociferous cheering by more than three-fourths of that House. The speeches of the peace party are heard with impatient murmurs or enforced silence, except by the very few friends of the North, who sit below the gangway on the Speaker's right; the prudent language which official decorum exacts from Ministers is coldly received, and elicits cheers only from the Radical benches, except when now and then the supporters of the Government feel themselves obliged to deserve that title, and arouse themselves to a listless and perfunctory applause. On the other hand, every speech that hits the Yankees hard, or tells strongly in favour of the Confederates, is received with tumultuous cheering. Mr. Roebuck's bitter sarcasms, Mr. Horsman's cutting statement of the case against the Federal Government, Lord Robert Cecil's spirited rebukes of Ministerial supineness and indifference, are received with the same hearty sympathy, the same gratified applause, that greeted the speeches of Mr. Laird and the Solicitor-General, just before the Easter recess, on the case of the Alabama. It is beyond doubt or disguise that the Federal cause is as thoroughly unpopular in Parliament as in the country; that every argument which demands any concession to the North, whether in the name of justice or of forbearance, is obnoxious to the general sentiment; and that every plea that can be advanced to justify the equipment of the Alabama, or to aggravate the outrage involved in the capture of the Peterhoff and the Dolphin, is welcome to an audience whose feelings are enlisted on the side of the Confederates, and whose passions have been strongly excited by the unreasonableness and the insolence of the Northern States. The advocates of the Federal Government are pleading a lost cause, with the evidence, the law, and the Court against them; and their courage and resolution in that desperate situation would deserve admiration, were it possible to forget that, not in pursuance of a professional duty, but in dereliction of their duty as Englishmen, and their dignity as representatives of the English people, they have undertaken the defence of the enemies of England. Men like Mr. Bright, who have neither character nor popularity to lose, are deepening the dislike with which they are regarded; men like Mr. Cobden and Mr. Forster, with influence and credit earned by consistency and capacity, are sacrificing their authority and bringing themselves into contempt; men like Mr. Stansfeld, just entering on a political career, and men like Mr. Peter Taylor, striving hard to win the tolerance of the House, are risking their respective personal objects in the service of clients who are always embarrassing and thwarting them by indefensible conduct, and giving them the lie direct by their official language. It is wonderful to witness such devotion to the memory of a shattered idol; such touching fidelity to the first article of the demagogic creed, that a democracy can do no wrong. But no one can question the utter hopelessness of their labours; and their own tone is that of men who feel that they are speaking in vain.

The cases of the Sea Queen and of the Alexandra have respectively given rise to the most momentous discussions of this session—momentous in regard to the disclosures of Ministerial policy which they have elicited, and in regard to the effect they are likely to produce both at home and in America. The first is beyond all comparison the more important, inasmuch as it involves the whole question of the right of British merchant ships to trade unmolested between neutral ports. The owners of the Sea Queen represented to Lord Russell that their obligation to carry what is called a ship letter-bag exposed them to considerable danger. The American cruisers might seize the ship, open the bags, and finding therein correspondence of a suspicious character, might avail themselves thereof to justify the condemnation of the ship and cargo. Now, be it observed, the Sea Queen was bound from London to Matamoras—from neutral port to neutral port. There could not, therefore, be the slightest pretence for her seizure. But the piratical capture of the Peterhoff by Admiral Wilkes has destroyed the security which ought to surround all such voyages, and it was natural, therefore, that the owners of the Sea Queen should feel uneasy. They requested that Government would place a mail agent on board in charge of the bags. His presence would have had a double effect. It would have deterred the Federal cruisers from opening the bags, and it would have served as a voucher for the bonâ fide character of the ship's neutral destination. And as for the objection suggested by the Economist, that “the worst vessels would be the most likely to apply for such protection,” we hold it to be altogether unfounded. Between vessels bound for a neutral port there is no distinction of good or bad, as regards the legality of their enterprise. They are all good. And a vessel carrying mails in charge of a mail agent to a neutral port must of necessity be bound thither; she dare not go elsewhere. It follows that the protection afforded by the presence of a mail agent could not possibly be abused. But Lord Russell refused the request; and defended his refusal in person in one House, and by his under-secretary in the other. It is admitted that the mail-bags cannot lawfully be opened; and, therefore, the task of defence was not an easy one. Lord Russell was able to show that he had saved the Sea Queen from any practical danger on account of the mails, by exempting her from the liability to carry them. But it was pertinently asked why he had not asserted the right given by law to compel her to carry the mails, and the right inherent in every Government to protect its subjects from unlawful aggression; and he had no answer to give. The true reason, probably, was that, if he had done so, Admiral Wilkes would still have seized the ship, and the seizure would inevitably lead to war; but this was a reason which could not be openly stated. But in the course of debate Lord Russell said something which argues either singular carelessness, or great ignorance on his part. He said, “It may be that vessels have been seized that were really going to Matamoras, or some other neutral port, without sufficient evidence that the cargo was really of a contraband character.” Now this implies admission of the right to seize cargoes “of a contraband character” on their way to neutral ports, or it is sheer nonsense. But there can be no such thing as contraband of war between neutral ports. In the eye of the law, the trade between London and Matamoras stands in just the same position as the trade between Dover and Calais; and the seizure of a cargo of arms and munitions of war between the two former ports, is an outrage as great as would be the seizure of similar wares on board the Dover packets. It is time that Lord Russell should be called to account on this subject. It is time, too, that he should be taught that his cowardly concessions to American bluster are not merely a breach of neutrality, but are actual treason to England. He has, at the demand of Mr. Seward, given orders that the mails (probably those captured on board British ships) shall be opened by British consuls, and all treasonable correspondence (that is, correspondence between the enemies of the United States) given up to the Federal Government. This is not only not the conduct of a high-minded English statesman—it is not the conduct of an English gentleman. It is the conduct of an American spy. Further, it is clear that no British mail can lawfully fall into the hands of Federal cruisers. For they have no right to meddle with any vessel not bound directly for a Confederate port; and on board vessels so bound there are, of course, no mails. Therefore, Lord Russell's concession is not only an act of cowardice, a breach of neutrality, and an insult to England, but it also involves a permission to the Americans to seize British vessels upon a lawful voyage—a permission little less than treasonable.

Next to the feebleness of the Ministerial defence against the censures of the Opposition, the most remarkable feature in the late discussion was the passionate anxiety of the Federalizing Radicals, to prevent a war with America by putting down the building of gunboats for the Confederate States. At their urgent instigation, the Government has already taken a very extraordinary step. It has seized the Alexandra, an unarmed and unfinished screw yacht, building for a respectable Liverpool firm, on suspicion that she is intended for the Confederate service; and has refused to furnish her owners with any intimation of the nature of the evidence, or even with a formal statement of the charge against her. This is certainly a stretch of authority which it is hard for Englishmen to bear; but it does not satisfy the Radicals, whose love of freedom was never more than lip-deep, and whose love of New England is the strongest passion of their natures. Mr. Collier vehemently urged that we should give the Americans no ground of complaint—ignoring the fact that they complain of the shipment of arms and ammunition to the South, and would complain whatever we did. But Mr. Collier is known to have given professional assistance to Mr. Adams against our Government, while acting as the professional agent of the Admiralty; and no one pays much attention, in England, to men guilty of such conduct as this. Mr. Cobden's personal character is clear; and if he could feel an English indignation against the outrages offered to the English flag, his masterly pleading against the alleged wrongs offered by England to America might have had great effect. But he damaged his cause hopelessly at the beginning by an apology for “one or two captures of innocent vessels” by the Federal cruisers; a phrase under which he wished to veil the systematic interruption of our trade with the Bahamas and with Mexico. He seems to labour, like Lord Russell, under a delusion as to the rights of belligerents; and to fancy that a trade in arms and munitions of war, intended to supply a contraband trade, is itself contraband and liable to confiscation. We must remind him that the Federals have no more right to intercept, on their way to Matamoras, munitions of war intended to be smuggled thence into Texas, than our revenue cruisers have to interrupt the supply of tobacco to a French port on suspicion that it will be smuggled into England. His unfairness in this matter prejudiced against him the audience which fully appreciates the meaning conveyed by the appointment of Captain Wilkes, and the certificate of Mr. Adams; and he completed the ruin of his cause by citing as a favourite contrast with the case of the Alabama, the conduct of the American Government in regard to the Canadian rebellion. Now the fact is that that rebellion was chiefly due to American intrigues, and was sustained chiefly by aid from the United States. The Government of those States made laws against the interference of its citizens in the struggle, but that interference went on notwithstanding; they did, in fact, precisely what Mr. Adams accuses our Government of doing in the case of the Alabama. Their intention was very intelligible. They wished, by promising and pretending to do right, to keep on good terms with us, and prevent us from interfering vigorously with their means of doing wrong. Exactly in the same spirit are they now acting in regard to the seizure of British ships. Mr. Seward admits all Lord Lyons's remonstrances, founded on the acknowledged law of nations, and requests Mr. Welles to put a stop to unlawful seizures; but still those seizures go on; still Prize Courts, erected ad hoc by Mr. Lincoln, condemn vessels captured in neutral waters or on their way to neutral ports, and threaten to open our mail bags; and still the Secretary of State promises fair play, while the Secretary of the Navy countenances foul. Diplomacy may be baffled by these artifices; but national indignation outruns diplomacy, and is apt to insist on a recourse to arguments against which specious promises and legal evasions are of little value or effect. It would be well if the Peace party would cease to delude those who are forcing us to war, with the idea that we are not prepared for it; well if, while there is yet time, our Government would let that of the Northern States understand that its choice lies between obedience to law and submission to the armed force of England.

The Foreign Enlistment Act.

There is, perhaps, no law on the statute book of England of which the construction is so uncertain, and of which the interpretation varies so much according to the prejudices, interests, and idiosyncrasies of those who are called on to explain or administer it, as the Foreign Enlistment Act. Intended to provide for the more effectual observance of the rules of international law, it seems to partake of the doubtful character which attaches to most of those rules, and to be susceptible, like them, of meaning much or little according to the circumstances under which and the cases in which it is applied. It is interpreted in one way by the Opposition, and in another way by the Government; in one sense by Mr. Cobden, and in a very different sense by Mr. Laird; the friends of one belligerent strain it to the uttermost, those of another would reduce it almost to a nullity. According to Mr. Adams, it ought to prevent the exportation of arms to Charleston, and even to Nassau, while it should leave free and uninterrupted the shipment not only of munitions of war, but actually of Irish recruits for the Federal army to Boston and New York. Mr. Laird considers that it permits the building of Alabamas; and we have reason to believe that men holding a very high position in the administrative service of the country agree with him; while the Counsel for the Admiralty, accepting a fee from the American Minister, declares that the Alabama ought to have been seized long before her equipment was complete; and the law officers of the Crown, while they are understood to have given a similar opinion, stand up in their place in Parliament to vindicate the non-interference of the Ministry in that case, and their interference in the case of the Alexandria. Nay, in the latter instance it appears to be held by the Attorney-General,—who, though far from being one of the first lawyers of the day, in point of repute and authority, is still officially at the head of the bar—that the Foreign Enlistment Act is stringent enough to overrule the first principles of the common and statute law of the realm, and to justify the Treasury not merely in inflicting a grievous injury without cause stated and before trial on respectable British merchants, but actually in refusing to the accused a statement of the charge against them, and an account of the evidence on which that charge is grounded. Will our readers believe that to this day the owners of the Alexandria—who are Liverpool merchants—have received no notification of the charges on which their vessel has been seized, and the works upon her suspended; that no accusation has yet been formally recorded against her; and that the "cause of seizure" stated on the record of appraisement, is simply that the Alexandria is built and intended for the service of the Government, or assumed Government, of a foreign State—which constitutes no offence whatever, either against the law of nations or the law of England? It would really seem that the curious Act means just whatever the Treasury wishes it to mean; and there is some reason to fear that the interpretation put upon it by the Treasury varies not according to the facts of the case, the sympathies, or even the interests of England, but according to the strength and urgency of the Power which demands the application of the law, or according to the degree of alarm inspired by the Parliamentary and platform denunciations of such degenerate Englishmen as are capable of constituting themselves the advocates and apologists, against their own countrymen, and against the advisers of their Queen, of a foreign, a despised, and an unfriendly Government.

Let us look back a little, and ask ourselves how this law has been hitherto administered. It was originally enacted to prevent Englishmen and English ships from taking part in the war between Spain and her colonies. Yet those colonies owed the final completion of their deliverance in no small measure to English crews, sailing, we believe, in English built ships, and commanded by an English officer, whose terrible misfortunes and heroic achievements have seldom been rivalled—the late Earl of Dundonald, known formerly as Lord Cochrane. The Foreign Enlistment Act did not prevent him from lending his services to Chili and Peru; nor do we remember that Spain made any complaint on that score. Again, it pleased Brazil to shake off her allegiance to Portugal—"our ancient and faithful ally;" and Lord Cochrane accepted the rank of Admiral from the Emperor Pedro I., and fought under the new flag against a Power with whom England was at peace—once more with English seamen and, we suspect, with ships built in England. The Emperor's Government proved ungrateful, and the modern Viking transferred his services to the cause of Greece, and ships were built for him in English yards, and armed in English docks, and sent forth from English harbours to assist the persons exercising or claiming to exercise the powers of Government in Greece against his Britannic Majesty's ally, the Sultan. The Greek war came to an end; the freedom of Spanish America was established, and, except in Spain and Portugal, where their interference was licensed by their own Government, Englishmen had for a quarter of a century no opportunity of gratifying their pugnacious propensities in the service of a foreign Power. But then there came the war between France and Austria; and it happened that the French Government chartered an English vessel, then in an English port, as a transport. Austria complained; the Customs authorities refused to seize the vessel, and she departed. The Crown lawyers were on the side of Austria; but the official parties concerned maintained that as the vessel was not built, equipped or fitted out for the French service, but simply chartered and sent as she stood, the owner had done nothing in violation of the law. This precedent is surely worth remembering. Then came Garibaldi's expedition; and recruits by hundreds were enlisted in England to assist a private citizen of Nice, a subject of either the King of Sardinia or the Emperor of France, in waging war on his own account against the Government of Naples. These recruits were enlisted without interference; they were shipped without interference; they were not even molested when they entered the port of Gibraltar, notoriously and avowedly bound for the territories of the King of Naples, to carry on hostilities against a potentate with whom her Majesty was at peace. After this, the Papal Government also thought that it might fairly claim the right of levying recruits within the Queen's dominions; and it did so; and those recruits affirm that they fought against the troops of a Sovereign with whom her Majesty was in amity; others say that they simply surrendered to those troops; but we presume that this difference is of no importance to any other person than Major O'Reilly and his comrades. This is the manner in which we have been wont to enforce the Foreign Enlistment Act, and in which we are now enforcing it as against the agents of the Federal Government; why is a different measure to be used, and a different policy adopted, in order to serve the ends of that Government as against the Confederate States?

If we look from England to America, we find both judicial decisions and official precedents still stronger in favour of a lax interpretation of a law like this. We find that it is pronounced no offence, at least, against international law, for an American crew and captain to take an armed vessel to Buenos Ayres, and there enlist themselves and their vessel in the service of the Government of that country to wage war against Spain, with which Power the United States were at peace. We find that it is lawful for an American citizen to build a privateer, partially equip her, and send her out to a foreign port, there to take out a letter of marque and complete her equipment, in order to cruise against a Power with which the United States are not at war. Coupling these decisions of the Supreme Court with the precedent above quoted, in the case of a vessel chartered by the French Government in the Austrian war, we think that the lawfulness of the enterprise undertaken by the builders of the Alabama, the Japan, and the Florida is sufficiently vindicated. They built and equipped a vessel of a certain character; they did not arm her or send her forth to cruise against American commerce. They sold their vessels to foreigners; perhaps to a foreign Government; and still the transaction is perfectly legal. Some one else sent out arms and ammunition to the same parties; still the transaction is legal. The ships quitted British waters unarmed, and elsewhere obtained their armaments, and commenced their service under the Confederate flag. We wish to be informed at what point an infraction of British law was committed; or of what part of the transaction, looking to their own decisions, Americans could complain?

The general meaning of the Foreign Enlistment Act, as we understand it, may be comprised in two sentences. It was intended to prevent British subjects from waging war on their own account, or the account of foreigners, against a Power with which their Sovereign is at peace. It was not intended to interfere with the supply of arms and munitions of war, or other contraband goods, to a belligerent Power. Now the equipment and despatch of privateers from this country to make war on either of the American belligerents, or the enlistment of Englishmen in the service of either belligerent, is clearly a violation at once of public and of municipal law, a breach of neutrality, and of the Foreign Enlistment Act. The latter offence, however, when committed by a few individuals, is generally overlooked. But the sale of arms, or munitions of war, or ships capable of becoming ships of war, to a belligerent Power, is not a breach either of neutrality or of the Foreign Enlistment Act. And inasmuch as the seller does not know, and the Customs authorities do not know, whether a vessel so purchased is not intended to run into a Confederate port, and there to be armed and fitted out for war, we cannot see that the former can be blamed for selling or the latter for allowing her to pass.

There are two further points which seem to deserve a few words of comment. The first is Mr. Cobden's plea for favour towards the United States, on the ground that they themselves, on several occasions, and notably during the Canadian rebellion, faithfully enforced their Foreign Enlistment Act. The answer to that allegation is contained in the following confession of a Yankee "sympathizer," to which we direct our readers' attention:—

Confession of the captured American General Sutherland, made a few minutes before he attempted self-destruction:—

AFFIDAVIT.

Garrison Toronto, March 22, 1868.

While visiting the prisoner Thomas Jefferson Sutherland on the evening of the 13th, with the officers of the guard, I was requested by Sutherland to sit a short time and converse with him. Having ascertained that I did not belong to the militia, nor was connected with the court-martial then sitting for his trial, he entered freely into conversation, but chiefly on the politics of the country, and stated his own views, and, as he said, those of his Government, for the line of conduct lately pursued by them.

He said it was their determination, at all hazards, to obtain the Canadas as they had Texas, and then they would have the seaboard from the Gulf of Florida to the Northern Ocean.

I asked him, when he said "they," did he mean the people of the United States or the Government? His answer was that the people of the States were the Government, and the will of the people was the law by which their rulers must abide; that in the acts of the Americans in favour of the insurrection in this province, and in the proclamations of the President and General Scott to put down the meetings and disarm the patriots, the Government had acted with duplicity, for it was not their wish or their intention to suppress them. "In fact," said he, "it is a piece of humbug on their part, and as a proof of it, I will now tell you that none of the arsenals were robbed of the arms, but the doors were opened, and we were told to help ourselves.

WILLIAM SPRING, Lieutenant,
Adjutant, 24th Regiment.

Sworn before me this 23d of March, 1838,

GEORGE GURMET, Alderman and Justice of the Peace.

The second point is that, if we suddenly enforce with harshness against one belligerent Power an Act which hitherto we have forbore to enforce at the instance of the other belligerent, we are guilty of a virtual breach of neutrality; and that, in this case, such a display of partisanship would be peculiarly discreditable. For the sake of peace, and of our own security, we have so interpreted our neutral obligations as to confer great advantages on the stronger of the two parties to this deplorable war. It would be wrong, unseemly, and dishonourable to render any further aid; and most especially to do so in deference to menaces of present or future vengeance.

Newmarket Races.

The worship of animate and inanimate nature has prevailed, in all ages, both among civilized and barbarous nations, and the variety of objects deemed worthy of adoration has been surpassed only by the eccentricity with which the idols have been selected. To fall down before the Host of Heaven, and to praise the Sun as the life-giving element, is at least more intelligible than to curse that luminary with morning and evening imprecations, as one of the tribes of Africa, scorched with his vertical rays, is said to have done; but that nations should have venerated the bull, the dog, the ape, and even the pig, can only be comprehended by a diligent inquiry into the wants and habits of the people, or the peculiarities of the country in which they dwell. The Roman Satirist was amazed when he contemplated—

"Qualia demens
Ægyptus portenta colat, crocodilon adorat
Pars hæc, illa pavet saturam serpentibus Ibin;"

or when he assumed the perfection of his own religion, and in contempt of the madness of animal worship, exclaimed—

"Oppida tota canem venerantur, nemo Dianam."

But his own countrymen and the polished Greeks, whom the former so loved to imitate, had for centuries known, appreciated, and even more than admired the horse, and the contests in which his true excellence is developed. Alcibiades had ruined himself by the magnificence of his racing stud; kings had thought a victory in the chariot-race the highest earthly glory; and Rome, while the Satirist wrote, was rapidly developing that frantic emulation in the races of the circus which eventually split her citizens into factions and filled her streets with blood. Our enthusiastic love for the quadruped has not yet run to such madness; but it is an axiom that no nation has expended so much time, money, and talent, as the English, in attempts to make the horse perfect. That animal is our delight in the road and in the field, but on the race-course he is an object of national pride.

Now we are not of the number of those who believe that the English race-horse is degenerating; nor, again, do we pay heed to the alarmists who preach the downfall of the Turf. In our opinion the healthy condition of the latter is demonstrated by the increase of the prizes, the number of spectators, and the anxiety displayed by the authorities to remove the existing abuses, while that of the former appeals to the honest attention of a connoisseur, or the conclusive authority of Admiral Rous. To see racing to perfection, and the race-horse at his best, it is absolutely necessary to visit Newmarket. There it is not considered that the purpose of the meeting is to make a mere holiday: stern faces, such as are seen in Lombard Street and the Exchange, combined with a total absence of music, dancing bears, and raree shows, prove that the business demands the most rigid attention and absorbs the mental faculties. The Heath, too, must be seen to be appreciated; it contains innumerable courses; a round course bounded by, or rather encircling, cultivated lands for a distance of three and a half miles; a straight course of four miles divided at the second mile by an easy but decided turn, the last two miles of which form the arena of the majority of the contests. The ground is marked off with posts, and admits of any number of horses running abreast. It undulates only in a moderate degree, and is neither deformed by the narrow enclosures, the sharp turns or abrupt inclines, which render accidents probable, injure the temper and impede the sweeping action of the horse, and eminently prejudice the most accurate calculations. It would be difficult to conceive, and impossible to find, a course better adapted for securing the victory to the fastest and stoutest horse. Here six meetings are annually held, two in the Spring, one in July, and three in the Autumn, and they occupy in all twenty-nine days. On the average, eight races are run on each day, and the stakes range from £100 up to nearly £5,000. The contests principally consist of sweepstakes, in which horses carry weight according to their respective ages; sweepstakes confined to horses of a particular age, and handicaps in which weights are imposed upon the horses in a sliding scale so regulated as to give to each horse, good, bad, or indifferent, so far as any device can, an equal chance of success. These handicaps form the principal feature of the autumnal displays, while the spring is occupied mainly in testing the powers of the three-year-old colts, and the summer in trying the recruits of the age of two years.

Last week was, according to immemorial custom, signalized by two great events, the results of which are not merely of great importance from the intrinsic value of the prizes, but are justly considered to throw considerable light on the more famous races for the Derby and Oaks stakes at Epsom. These sweepstakes are commonly called, respectively, the Two Thousand and the One Thousand Guinea Stakes. The former is open to colts and fillies of the age of three years, the latter is confined to fillies of that age. Horses are entered for these races when yearlings, the contribution required is £100 for the animals who eventually start for the race, and £50 for those who decline. or from accident, or other circumstances, become incapacitated from taking part in the struggle. The subscriptions this year for the Two Thousand Guineas amounted to the enormous sum of £4,500, and those for the One Thousand Guineas to £3,600. The length of the course is, in both races, about one mile. For the former race, which took place on the 21st of April, only nine horses out of the eighty-five entered took part in the race; and the public mind was so thoroughly preoccupied with the assurance that the victory of Hospodar, the property of Count de Lagrange, was certain, that it was difficult to obtain even the smallest odds against him. Patriots were alarmed at the probability of the French adding this great prize to their former gains, and trembled when they thought with what ease the French mare Stradella had defeated the Marquis, the Pride of Yorkshire, and the winner of the Two Thousand Guineas, and Great St. Leger of 1862. Perhaps Hospodar was trained to excess, perhaps it is impossible for any horse with his fore-legs placed at an angle of nearly forty degrees, to gallop, except up hill; but whatever save the supporters of Hospodar may apply to their wounded hopes, it is certain that he was beaten at the end of half-a-mile, and finished on suzerance "a very bad fourth." The winner, Maccaroni, and the second horse, Saccharometer, are the sons of the same sire, Sweetmeat, the descendant of Diomed, Hambletonian, and Eclipse. Both are small and neat horses, but in our opinion are not quite the best of their age in England. Of the remaining competitors, two deserve notice: the Rapid Rhone as the beau ideal of a hunter; and the King of the Vale, who is sprung of a race which combines speed and size in an unparalleled degree, has placed many large stakes at the disposal of Baron Rothschild, and only needs better fore-legs to ensure universal admiration. The struggle was an exciting one, and the verdict of the Judge was three parts of a length between the first and second horse, the King of the Vale being third, one length from Saccharometer.

Two days afterwards the sporting public was interested to an inferior yet considerable degree by the contest for the One Thousand Guineas; and here again the prize was considered to be within the grasp of a foreigner—Mr. Ten Broeck, the American—though perhaps, from his long residence in this country, we may at least call that gentleman a naturalised Englishman. The fact that his mare Tornado is own sister to Avalanche and Hurricane, all daughters of the famous Wild Dayrell,—the recollection of the manner in which Hurricane galloped away with this stake last year, and a very justifiable confidence in the owner's judgment, combined to make Tornado the favourite. Certainly the mare is good-looking and has excellent action; but compared with the creature that won the race she sinks into absolute insignificance. The winner, by name Lady Augusta, the daughter of Stockwell, and boasting Touchstone for her maternal grandfather, is, without any exception, the most beautiful animal seen on Newmarket Heath within the last ten years; and it is impossible to say whether she is the most exquisite when standing, walking, or galloping. She belongs to Lord Stamford, who has about forty horses in training, and the expenses of whose racing establishment alone, exclusive of purchases, entrance fees, and travelling, amount to at least £10,000 a-year. The same nobleman, whose success is always hailed with delight, had the good fortune to be second also for this race with the Flying Fish, whose paternal grandfather is also Touchstone, and who on the mother's side is sister to the renowned Fisherman. The race is told in a few words. After the first half-mile Lord Stamford's pair took the lead, and, increasing their command at every stride, galloped in some lengths in front of the rest of the field. With regard to the remaining races, it will perhaps be sufficient to state that forty-three prizes were won during the five days, and that the total sum gained by the successful owners was £14,370. We must confess to a disappointment in not witnessing the race for the whip between Asteroid and Tim Whiffler. The course for that race is four miles in length, and the weight to be carried is 10 stone. These two horses are undeniably the best in England. The former, now five years old, is a son of Stockwell, and was bequeathed by the late Duke of Bedford to his friend Admiral Rous, who sold the horse to the well-known Sir Joseph Hawley, his present owner. Tim Whiffler is a grandson of Van Tromp, and last year won the Chester, Goodwood, and Doncaster Cup. The extreme hardness of the ground, arising from the present drought, alone prevented the meeting of these mighty antagonists, who, doubtless, however, will, in the course of the summer, join in a struggle as interesting as the great match between Voligeur and the Flying Dutchman.

It would, perhaps, be difficult to imagine any piece of sight-seeing that would more amply repay a foreigner than a visit to Newmarket. At least 400 race-horses are at all times to be found there, under the care of twenty-four trainers, many of whom are most courteous in displaying to strangers the various marvels of their establishments. The stranger will see there the noblest specimens of nature's finest work in the brute creation. He will gaze at that wonderful combination of beauty, symmetry, and vast strength exhibited in the English race-horse. He will learn that all these animals boast a pedigree more pure than the proudest families in Europe, and are valued by their owners at fabulous sums. He will call to mind that he is in the town where James I., and where the "Merry Monarch" held high holiday, hunting, racing, and gambling; and he will dwell on the tensity with which Englishmen cling to, and increase their love for the old amusements and institutions of their forefathers.

The poet Pindar had a peculiar method of celebrating the victories of his great contemporaries in the chariot race; and his system differed widely from that which we have pursued. It never struck him that the horse, who at least might be considered the principal agent in achieving victory, deserved particular mention; he reserved all his eulogies for the owner, and instead of declaring the pedigree of the animals, he invariably dilated at immense length on the lineage of the gentlemen who pocketed the prize. Probably this plan was highly agreeable to the munificent patrons to whom he dedicated his triumphal ode; but we are not sure that we should in all cases equally delight the present owners of race-horses if we were to adopt Pindar's plan, and accurately explain who gentlemen are, and whence they are sprung. But we think it right to remark that, perhaps, at no time have English noblemen and gentlemen of high rank taken more interest in or expended larger sums upon horse-racing, and we are convinced that if the Turf is to flourish, it must not lose its aristocratic character. On the other hand, the amusement is by far the most popular yet known to modern civilization, and its best hopes and interests lie in a successful combination of those two elements.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEWS.*

The quarterly representatives of the two great parties in the State have each, in their current issues, essays on "Kinglake's Invasion of the Crimea," "British India," and the "Colenso Controversy." With regard to the first there is complete unanimity; the second is treated from different points of view, and in the third there is a marked diversity of opinion. That the same topics should simultaneously engage the attention of the Edinburgh and Quarterly is an evidence of their importance, and of the interest they excite in the public mind.

When Mr. Kinglake's "Invasion of the Crimea" appeared we did not hesitate to denounce it in terms that happily are seldom necessary in literary criticism. We did not wait to compare the author's assertions with authenticated facts, but we judged him from the character of his own evidence, and from the manner in which that evidence is given. When the English Ministry were portrayed as dupes and sots, our French allies as inferior soldiers, and the French Emperor and his Ministers as a set of cowardly, half-witted reprobates, it was evident that Mr. Kinglake, under pretence of writing history, was giving vent to personal spite, or perhaps, manifesting one great talent he possesses, that of throwing large quantities of mud, that will stick to nobody but himself. Since we reviewed this book Mr. Kinglake has been confronted with a multitude of witnesses who have convicted him of misrepresentation. The verdict we pronounced has been confirmed. Only one respectable journal has defended Mr. Kinglake, and now the leading quarterlies add their condemnation to that of the rest of the press. If Mr. Kinglake had produced such a work soon after the war, and on his own account, we might have called him "the English Bazancourt," and that would have sufficiently excused his folly to the French nation. But Mr. Kinglake has, in reference to this book, occupied a public position and betrayed a public trust. He was permitted to use the papers of Lord Raglan, and, as far as possible, the archives of the country were placed at his disposal. Englishmen are no more responsible for Mr. Kinglake's conduct, than they were for the conduct of those who used the asylum of this country for the purpose of hatching infamous plots against the life of a foreign prince. Since Mr. Kinglake has been so generally exposed and condemned, no one can care much for his offence. He is venomous, but toothless. Like a bad marksman, he hits nobody, hurts nobody, though he himself suffers from the recoil and bursting of his overcharged piece. Most unintentionally, he has done good unto those whom he hates. Instead of weakening, he has strengthened the alliance between England and France. He has given us an opportunity of frankly telling the French people that, hidden beneath our insular coldness and prejudice, is a sentiment of profound respect for their valour and military genius. The vulgar and stupid attacks upon the wise Prince who now sits upon the throne of France, have done much to increase the popularity of Napoleon III. in England. The Emperor will not heed the ludicrously untrue charges. "On a hundred occasions," says the Edinburgh, "Louis Napoleon has shown courage of a high order, and courage of a higher order than that 'fiery quality' which Mr. Kinglake mistakes for it. He has stood unmoved by the assassins who have sought to take away his life with violence, and against the writers who have sought to destroy his name by invective. Fortunately for France and for Europe, his temperament is so cool and collected, that things which would have excited his uncle to frenzy, leave him calm; and his dignified composure has served him so well, that not long ago a philosopher, who is certainly no Imperialist, observed in Paris, 'Perhaps, after all, it was not the First Napoleon who was Napoleon the Great!'" We presume that, sooner or later, a fair history of the Crimean war will be written; and it is the bounden duty of those to whom the reputation of the late Lord Raglan is dear to see that he is vindicated from Mr. Kinglake's scandals. Such a book would be less attractive to novel readers, but it would be infinitely more valuable than Mr. Kinglake's highly-flavoured sensation story.

The Edinburgh reviews at some length the Indian Administration of Lord Canning, and gives a fair and lucid explanation of the rise and progress of that mutiny, which seemed at the time to threaten the loss of our dominion. Yet then we knew not how dangerous and wide-spread was the disaffection. It seems now that the mutineers were sincere in their plea of religion, and that they believed, although there was not the slightest ground for such belief, that the English intended to interfere with their religious rites, and to force them to embrace Christianity. Since the mutineers were animated by such a motive, it is wonderful that we should have so quickly triumphed over them, and much credit is due to the firmness of Lord Canning, the heroism of our officers, and, above all, to our general rule in India, for it was to the respect inspired by that we owe it that the whole of the native people did not rise against us. Lord Canning was our Viceroy at a grand and momentous crisis, and he was equal to the exigencies of the occasion.

The article in the Quarterly relates to the industrial resources of British India. Tea, coffee, sugar, silk, jute, opium, indigo, and a long list of commodities can be produced profitably; and under a liberal and wise administration we may expect to see British India exceedingly rich and prosperous. What about cotton? Many experiments have been made under the most favourable circumstances, but hitherto India has not been able to compete with America. The Quarterly Reviewer observes: "But if we insist that the possibility of cotton being profitably grown by Englishmen in India is not disproved by anything that experience has recorded, we must also admit that there is little to advance in favour of the other side of the question. Further experiment is absolutely indispensable before it can be considered as determined what varieties of the plant are best suited to each soil and climate." Still the Reviewer has "perfect confidence that India can very soon (say in the second year) send abundance of cotton to Liverpool of the required quality." At present, we are not aware of any system of cultivation that will be an equivalent for the peculiar climate of the cotton States of America. But, putting aside the quality, it is necessary that the American competition should be permanently at an end, and that the now abnormal high price should rule, if India is to supply Manchester with the cotton formerly obtained from America. Any one can judge how likely or not it is that these conditions will be complied with. Better for us to endeavour to develop the natural resources of India, than to attempt to favour any particular industry.

We may be sure that if cotton pays it will be grown, and if it does not pay the planter to grow it, it will not pay us to foster its production.

The Edinburgh treats the "Colenso Controversy" cautiously and with hesitation. The defence of the Bishop of Natal is not openly avowed, but it is urged that Christianity does not depend upon the verbal inspiration of the Bible. How the Reviewer reconciles his theory with the concluding paragraph of his essay, we cannot understand. He says, "The Bible and the Church then mutually support and bear witness to each other,—the one, as the living agent, thankfully recognising as God's gift what His living Spirit within her has shaped and His providence preserved; the other, like some vital organism, bearing unconscious testimony to a long foreseen design, and revealing the history of a gradually accomplished plan. Together they must stand or fall, or rather, together they will stand for ever, unshaken by the worst assaults which either scepticism or dogmatism may inflict upon them." Does the Church bear witness to a book that is partly false and that was written by impostors? Or, who is to tell us what is truth and what is error? Dr. Colenso? We prefer the testimony of the Christian Church. The Quarterly is thoroughly explicit. It considers the objections of Dr. Colenso, and refutes many of them by the internal evidence of the authorship of the Pentateuch. If we believe the Bishop of Natal, we are in a difficulty that is eloquently set forth by the Reviewer:—

Across the gloom of near three thousand years one beam from the first fountain of light has been transmitted to us through the great lawgiver of the Jews. But for that single ray of light, all history, until a very late period of the world, would be a perfect blank. That ray of light has revealed to us the origin of man and his religious training under the hand of God. The book in which this record of our race is kept contains a series of documents which close almost before profane history begins. There is a unity in the history which cannot escape our notice—it is the history throughout of God's dealings with man. There is nothing besides like it in the world. That history has been the moral and religious teaching of the world; it has been the source of the national life of the most remarkable people on the face of the earth—a people which has maintained an existence, separate from all nations, for upwards of three thousand years, and which still dwells in mysterious isolation, awaiting some final act of God's providence commensurate with such a career. The history of that people, traced for eighteen centuries before the birth of Christ, is one harmonious message to the world. Amidst the sickening impurity of the heathen world, that volume taught the utmost purity of morals; amidst polytheism and idolatry, it taught the Unity and the Majesty of God. And yet this is the volume which modern illumination would teach us to regard as the production of rank impostors and obscure compilers! The very statement of such a theory would seem sufficient to condemn it; but its advocates perpetually complain that their arguments are never met, and raise a cry of victory and triumph to which they really possess no claim.

We agree with the Quarterly, that the answer of Dr. Colenso to the remonstrance of forty of his brethren, in which he states they are all wrong, and he is right, is not only very impudent, but manifests an arrogant assumption of infallibility that fully accounts for the dogmatism and errors of his work. We also quite concur with the Quarterly, that the Bishop of Natal cannot honestly retain his office. "He acknowledges that he has abandoned the principles which he 'voluntarily professed to believe, as the indispensable condition of his being intrusted with his present office,' but he refuses to resign that office! * * * * For the present he can only be regarded as one eminently lacking wisdom and knowledge, one whom no formularies can bind, and in whose sight the most solemn vows may be broken with impunity."

The Quarterly contains an able paper on the American war. It directs attention to some general and grave mistakes as to the extent of Southern resources, and gives a well-digested and readable summary of warlike operations from the fall of Fort Sumter to the battle of Fredericksburg. The writer of this article has carefully studied the authorities within his reach, and the result is an effective and instructive narrative. The differences between the constitution of the contending armies are explained. The differences between the Governments of Richmond and Washington are not less conspicuous:—

And as with her generals, so also with her statesmen, the irresistible force of national character gave the advantage to the South. The military genius of Lee and Johnson, and Jackson and Beauregard, does not more conspicuously transcend that of McClellan and Burnside, and McDowell and Pope, than does the administrative talent of President Davis and the Southern Cabinet the pettifoggery and incapacity of President Lincoln and the attorney Ministers of the North. The Southern leaders were not the mere mediocre tools and puppets of trading politicians; they were men selected for those very qualities of talent and command most dreaded and disliked by the "wirepullers" of the North. And when the crisis came the difference was felt. It was felt in economized resources and energies exerted to the full; in an unity of design and action by which every element of power was made to tell with multiplied force.

The Quarterly does not think the termination of the present contest will lead to the return of peace. "The South, indeed, has nobly conquered her freedom, and may fairly look to a period of rest," but the North is likely to be torn by dissension. "We have," says the Reviewer, "traced out the story of a nation's birth. It is a story full of interest and instruction; and whilst it may perhaps lessen in some degree the marvel with which our ignorance of her resources has hitherto invested her success, it will assuredly not diminish our respect for her valour and her constancy."

The Quarterly also contains essays on the history of Cyclopælias, on Poland, on Sensation Novels, and on Salmon rearing, fishing, and protection. Respecting Poland, the Quarterly is of opinion that national independence is impossible, because the Polish leaders are divided. "A nation which, even in its deepest woe, is still torn by factions is not likely to make head against the forces of the largest empire in the world." Is it not possible that the present fiery ordeal may put an end to faction? May not the extent of the Russian Empire prove a source of weakness to her?

Amongst the articles in the Edinburgh is one on "Tithe Impropropriation." A certain portion of the fruits of the earth are set apart for the use of the Church, but they have been diverted from their original destination, and are in the hands of laymen, colleges, and Church dignitaries. Nearly 40 per cent. of the rent-charge collected throughout the country never reaches the incumbents. The Edinburgh advocates the restitution of the tithes to the use of the Church in the parish from which they are derived; but this can only be done by slow degrees and at a considerable cost.

"The Black Country" is a well-considered paper, on our mining population, and suggests many important reforms and improvements. This article will also do good by reminding those who read it, that the rough exterior of the miner conceals from the casual observer many noble qualities.

* THIS pamphlet gives an excellent resumé of the case of the Peterhoff. It includes a statement of the facts, the reason of the outrage, the law applicable to it, and the consequences of tolerating such violation of neutral rights. The following conclusions are, we think, indisputable:—

Once admit the act to be a wrong—an illegal seizure, barely excused even momentarily by a pretended suspicion—an act which could only have been committed to obtain, by the unfair straining of a questionable discretionary power, an advantage to which the law gives no claim—once admit that no amount of good faith could protect against such pretended suspicion—and it is no longer a mere question of £70,000 to be restored to English owners, with such damages as may be obtainable, but an insult and an outrage on our national flag, and a blow at that power which is supposed to shield us and our fellow-subjects from wrong and injustice.

This is not an isolated case: we have had twenty such, equally illegal, equally insulting, and showing an equal disregard of right and authority.

If we consent to leave in the hands of belligerents the right of capture and detention on mere alleged suspicion until the decision of its Prize Courts on neutral vessels going to neutral ports, we give them the power to dictate to us what commerce we shall and shall not carry on while their quarrel lasts; and it is easy to imagine cases in which this power could be exerted so to harass and disturb any particular trade, to deprive the neutral of any profit in its pursuit, and thus to obtain for the subjects of the belligerent a monopoly of such trade. It would be quite worth the while of a belligerent to pay damages for the few adventurous vessels willing to incur the risk of capture, and the delay of months, or even years, before the wrong might be atoned for, only to obtain a chance, if successful, of competing with the merchants instead of the cruisers of the belligerent, and at almost as great a disadvantage.

Since vessels are daily advertised in the New York papers for Matamoros, while British ships are intercepted and detained, it is just possible some such notion as that suggested may not have been quite foreign to the proceedings of the Federal cruisers, in respect of British vessels proceeding to the Gulf of Mexico.

† THIS is a reprint of an Address of the Hon. W. B. Reed, of Pennsylvania, to the Democratic Central Committee at Philadelphia. Those who read the pamphlet by that gentleman which, some time since, appeared in THE INDEX, will not need any assurance that the speech which has just been published is an able document, and worthy of an attentive perusal. This address in "A Northern Plea for Peace" is introduced by a brief but vigorous exposition of Northern brutality, and is followed by an appendix in reference to the production of food in the South. Amongst other actions of the Lincoln Government denounced by Mr. Reed is the raising of negro regiments. On this head he observes:—

I left America for the far East in the summer of 1857, and returned in 1859. When I left my own country, the whole world, except one spot in China, was at peace; but as I reached that continent about whose breed the fanatics of our day care so much (for I heard of it at the Cape of Good Hope), there came up a wall of agony from the Eastern world of white men and women, murdered and mutilated and ravished by black men in uniforms—from Cawnpore and Delhi, that lingers yet in my ears and haunts my dreams. And such is, or will be, the negro army, which is to supersede our regular soldiers, and to aid to conquer the South. This is the army which Mr. Lincoln's Secretary of State and his major-general thinks is to subjugate our brethren. I saw a printed letter a day or two ago from Mr. W. D. Kelley to a Blockley negro, in which he says:—

"The field of operations for this class of troops (negroes) will be chiefly in the Gulf States, where they will in a few months constitute the great bulk, if not the whole of our army."

And this is conquest—this is the deadly nightshade that is to bind our soldiers' brows—this is the awful success which the Administration promise us, if we will only give them money and men enough to carry on this war.

But I am mistaken. They don't ask us to give them money and men. They find the good old rule more convenient,—

— The simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can.

Such is the testimony of a Northern Statesman.

THE LATE GENERAL J. K. DUNCAN, C.S.A.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

NEW ORLEANS, March 13.

Sir,—In the Belfast News Letter of the 27th December last, there was published an anonymous letter, dated "New Orleans, — 1862," which contained slanderous and absurd aspersions on the character of the late Brigadier General J. K. Duncan. The writer asserts that he was present at a Court Martial, held in Richmond, on General Duncan, on the charge of allowing the passage of the United States' fleet by Forts Jackson and St. Philip without resistance, for a bribe of $475,000. The General was not tried by Court Martial, and no such charge was ever made against him, except in the Belfast News Letter.

General Duncan was never out of the Confederacy, or out of the Confederate service. Immediately on his exchange he was appointed to General Bragg's army in Tennessee. He made the advance into Kentucky, was present at the victory of Perryville, and performed a conspicuous part in conducting the subsequent retreat into Tennessee. His great personal exposure and exertions in that campaign, acting on a constitution previously debilitated by frequent attacks of typhoid fever, put an end to his career. He died at Knoxville, after a few weeks' illness, to the deep regret of all who knew him.

I trust, sir, you will find space for these few lines to vindicate the memory of a brave soldier. It is true that few will give any heed to such a ridiculous calumny; but the friends of General Duncan are very jealous of his good name, and wish to place on record a denial and refutation of an infamous slander.

I am, &c.,

"ONE WHO MOURNS."

MR. FERNANDO WOOD ON PEACE.

At the peace demonstration, held on the 7th of April, at the Cooper Institute, New York, resolutions denouncing the Administration having been passed, Mr. Fernando Wood was introduced to the meeting, and spoke as follows:—

The public man who fails to meet the responsibilities which the crisis demands is either too timid for his position, or recreant to the people. He is either a coward or something worse, and in either case unfit for public confidence. In ordinary times non-committalism may serve the purpose of politicians, but not now. We are in the midst of a revolution—a revolution the object of which is to overthrow the Government. Indeed, at this moment there are two revolutions against the Government, one at the South with the sword, and the other at the North by executive and legislative usurpations. Thus, two great powers are at work. That in military array is open and defiant, whilst the other, equally dangerous, aims at the same object by a more stealthy process. This latter enemy is unfortunately in possession of the Government. This possession has given it great power. It creates its own means of continuance. Like Shakespeare's jealousy, "it makes the meat it feeds on." It gains in strength the power to do injury as the power of resistance in the people becomes lessened. Taking advantage of the popular enthusiasm in behalf of the Union, it has, under the pretext of furthering this holy object, gradually fastened the chains of slavery upon the people. The most influential interests known to the country have thus become its aiders and abettors.

These are many and powerful, comprising nearly all the various elements which, in peaceful times, govern the country. Let us refer to them in detail. The war is supported by—

1. The whole banking interest of the country. The Administration first borrowed their capital, and then, by legislation and the subversion of State banking authority, it has since monopolized the currency by substituting its credits for the constitutional legal standard. Thus the banks, to secure their own capitals, mostly now invested in Government credits, and in apprehension of further encroachments, are bound to sustain the Administration in any policy it may adopt, right or wrong.

2. New England favours the war, because, having lost a valuable customer in the South, she finds a profitable substitute in army contracts and government disbursements.

3. The railroad interests are materially advantaged by its continuance. The great central roads of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New York have had unexampled prosperity in consequence. The closing of the Mississippi and tributary arteries has forced western products into an unnatural channel to find a market in the East. To meet this market, these roads offer the chief avenue.

4. The debtor class add their mighty voice for a vigorous prosecution of the war. War makes expenditures—these create public debts and promote private speculations. These causes inflation—which in turn operates as a commercial stimulant, and produces imaginary wealth. In the general consequent intoxications, the [debtor class hope to liquidate their liabilities.

5. The Abolition fanatics, who think they see in the war an opportunity to free the slaves and punish the slaveholders.

6. The many hundred thousand office-holders, contractors, and Government employés, of all grades and classes, who, of themselves, compose a greater army than has yet been in the field.

7. The members of the Administration themselves, who hope, by the continuance of the war and the excuse it offers for an assumption of power which overrides all other departments, interests, and classes, to perpetuate their authority for another term, if not for life.

8. The Republican partisans, who love political dominion, and who sustain the Administration as partisans in all things—especially to crush out a section of the country to which they have always been hostile.

9. The War Democrats, who, tired of waiting for the spoils under a Democratic Administration, are willing to avail themselves of any pretence by which to join a party in possession of the "sinews of war."

10. Some honest and patriotic men, who really believe that by fighting we can restore the Union.

11. The army, as a branch of the Executive power, with its thousands of retainers. The chief officers of this now ruling element are appointed by the Administration, and being under military discipline, have no resource but to become its instruments.

These are the interests which unite for the war, and in a support of the policy of the Administration as a consequence. Though differing in motive, they converge to the same object. Is it not an immense auxiliary?—and is it not a terrific combination to confront? But great as it is, the power of the people is greater. So long as the ballot shall be permitted, let us fear not. In that palladium of our liberties rest all our hopes. We must bear calumny and reproach—hazard life, liberty, and property. But let us go forth in the discharge of our duties with manly hearts and a determined spirit. We must stand ready to give up everything but the cause—with that we must live or perish.

We are for the maintenance of the Constitution, and the full enjoyment of the reserved rights of the States and the people. We stand immovably on this rock. It is the last hope of the Republic. We are this day the only men who firmly occupy this position. We resist every sophistry and subterfuge to draw us from it. The selfish aims of party leaders, whose history teaches that they can alter their principles to suit their interests, cannot move us; nor shall the party in power, who find pretexts for all required authority in the public necessities, swerve us from our allegiance to the Constitution. We are familiar with American liberty since its establishment on this Continent. Through the various phases which Government has ever assumed here, self-control has always been vouchsafed to the people. In the several leagues, Confederacies, and Unions which, at different periods, have existed in America, this home spirit of fireside rule has never been given up. Even England granted this to her dependent colonies. Let me refer to the several compacts which have existed, in none of which even the sovereignty of the colonies yielded.

In 1643, the colonies of Massachusetts, Plymouth, Connecticut, and New Haven, formed a league, offensive and defensive, which they declared should be perpetual, and distinguished by the name of the United Colonies of New England. This Confederacy subsisted for forty years under a regular form of government in which the principle of a delegated Congress was a prominent feature. The people of these colonies retained and exercised all their home rights.

In 1754, a Congress of Commissioners, representing New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, was held at Albany, in this State. This convention unanimously resolved that a union of the colonies was absolutely necessary for their protection. Protection from what?—not from themselves nor from each other, but protection from external danger. The plan proposed for a Federal Government, however, was not adopted. In October, 1765, a Congress of Delegates from nine States assembled in this city, and digested a bill of rights on the subject of taxation by the English Government, which began to be oppressive and unjust. In September, 1774, an association of twelve States was formed, and delegates authorised to meet and consult for the common welfare. In May, 1775, the first Congress of the Thirteen States assembled at Philadelphia, and in July, 1776, issued the Declaration of Independence. In this declaration and in the antecedent Conferences and Congresses, no State, and, indeed, no public man or party suggested the thought or intention of a parting with State sovereignty. In November, 1777, Congress agreed upon the articles of Confederation, which was during the Revolution, and answered the public emergencies at the moment. We had war then, yet State rights and the independence of the people were not infringed. This was the first formation of a general government of all the States. It continued until 1788. A different condition of public affairs now existed, and a convention was called, not to make a consolidated national government, but to make "a more perfect Union." The articles of Confederation were found to be defective, as applicable to the existence and magnitude of a new State among the powers of the earth, and it became necessary to remedy these defects by the incorporation of additional authority for the "general welfare."

This convention met in Philadelphia in 1787—Washington President. It was the most august assemblage of men which ever met together for any purpose, civil or religious. It formed the present Constitution of the United States. This Constitution was submitted to the people of the States for ratification. Though the instrument itself did not impair the personal liberty of the people, nor infringe upon the rights of the States to the enjoyment of their ancient sovereignty, yet so jealous were the people of these inherent powers, that they insisted upon certain amendments before they would yield their sanction to it.

In these several conventions of delegates, as well as in the articles of Confederation, and in the Constitution, neither colony, province, nor State yielded a particle of local self-government. However great the external danger and the necessity of compact for defence, everything of a domestic political character was expressly reserved. Though coming together for certain specified purposes, they possess all the powers belonging to separate and distinctive political communities. They have parted with nothing not "set down in the bond."

There is no difficulty in ascertaining what these reservations are. It is only necessary to ascertain whether they are to be found among the enumerated or not. If not found, they are, of course, reserved.

But it is not necessary to leave anything to inference. The amendments insisted on by the States and the people as conditions precedent to the adoption of the Constitution, are plain and unequivocal. I quote from these amendments so much of their substance as bears directly upon the present condition of the States and the people, in their relations to the Federal Government:—

Article I.—Congress shall make no law "abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble," &c.

Art. II.—A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

Art. IV.—"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized."

Art. IX.—"The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

Art. X.—"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Now, we demand the exercise of all these rights. They have been shamefully violated.—With the administration "might has made right." In the possession of the physical power, each of these conditions precedent to the existence of a central power, has been taken from us. But I am assured that these restrictions have been necessary for the maintenance of the Government itself—that the war must be prosecuted—and that every interest must be subdued, which offers opposition to the Administration which prosecutes the war. Without stopping to show the fallacy of such an absurd position, which require the annihilation of the system itself in order to maintain it, I go on to consider the great question whether the war, even if desirable, can be successfully prosecuted by the present Administration, and whether it will secure the return of the Southern States, even if successful, and if not, how the Union can be restored. And do not let me be misunderstood. I do not sympathize with the attitude of the South. Her conduct is, in my opinion, indefensible.

She was not justifiable in her attempts at withdrawal from the Union. Admitting, as she claims, that the Constitutional or legal right was on her side, she had no moral right, at that time, on the grounds she assumed. She had participated in the election for President, and hence could not repudiate it or refuse to remain in the Union because Lincoln was elected. Her representatives remained in both Houses of Congress until after that election. In my judgment, these acts bound her as an honourable people. She had taken her share in the national lottery, and it became too late to back out because she had drawn a blank. Every principle of honour should have held her to have been bound by the result. We are now in the midst of a fearful war. It has been waged with unprecedented fury and inhumanity on both sides. We are convulsed by a threatened upheaval of every form of government, general or local.

When it commenced, the Administration met it at the threshold. It was met boldly and promptly. The whole of the American people, not in revolt, sustained this action. No government ever received such a support. It came up with such unanimity and enthusiasm, that if the Administration before doubted the correctness of its aggressive position or its ability to sustain it, it could not after this unprecedented exhibition of sympathy and practical co-operation. Thus emboldened by the popular voice, the Administration prepared for the conflict—a conflict as was supposed to sustain the national integrity. Two-thirds of the whole people of the Union thus committed itself to coercion. I will not stop here to inquire whether two-thirds, or indeed nineteen-twentieths of the States are authorized, under the Constitution, to forcibly retain the dissenting one-third or one-twentieth in the Union. It is not necessary, nor is it indeed just, to stop now to discuss the abstract right of States to secede at pleasure. The Administration did not take its position of military force until the universal sentiment of the country demanded it. It was not until, in the wild enthusiasm of an indignant people, they rushed to the rescue of their country's honour and their country's existence, that the agents of the people prepared for the conflict which has ensued. I hold, therefore, that the people committed themselves, not to the war as it has been waged, nor for the objects now avowed by the Government, but to a war for the Union.

In this spirit and with these great and patriotic purposes, the people gave up their lives and treasure to the cause. No Government ever had lavished upon it such popular confidence and such enormous resources of men and money. Historians will refer with wonder to the stupendous power conferred upon a ruler, who, either unconscious of, or indifferent to, its possession, has frittered it away before a far inferior opposition. I leave to others to say whether this surprise of future generations will be the greater because of its voluntary gift, or because of its shameful abuse and dissipation without equivalent return. It is not necessary to refer in detail to the armies raised—the expeditions fitted out—the power conferred, or the hundreds of millions lavished. They are all so recent that they must be familiar as household words. Nor is it necessary to refer to the conceded fact that the war is prosecuted for unwarrantable and unconstitutional purposes. I will take the position, for the argument, that the war is for reunion and to whip the Southern States into submission, leaving them all their rights, if they will yield.

Well, the war has gone on! It has been prosecuted with variable success. It has been bloody, devastating, often barbarous, and at times inhuman. Who can describe its horrors? Where is the tongue that can recount the wails and lamentations, the groans and sighs of bereaved and broken hearts ascending from almost every village and hamlet in the Union? Family altars have been desecrated, their hearthstones reddened with the life-blood of mothers, innocent children and old men. Whole regions of country, but yesterday smiling with a joyous and thriving population, have been laid desolate and waste. In short, whole States and communities of American citizens, breaking all the ties that bind men together, have been carrying on a relentless, destructive, and devastating war against each other. Should not this be enough to satisfy the vengeance of those who have cried out for more blood! And should it not satisfy the whole American people, South and North, that a continuation of such a war cannot restore the Union of these States?

Now, shall this continue? and if continued, will it accomplish the object? I answer, that it will not. Sooner or later there must be an end of it. Mere exhaustion will of itself produce a final quiet. Somebody has recently said that he was for "a vigorous prosecution of peace; but the uncharitable world immediately concluded that he was for a vigorous prosecution of peace, even unto separation,

I am not of this opinion. I am for a vigorous prosecution of peace, even unto restoration; and I believe that it is not even now too late to accomplish it. I believe that now is the time to make the effort to accomplish this great necessity. For two years we have waged a relentless war without proposing or listening to terms or quarter. Fighting has not produced the desired result. Let us try some other method. What shall that be?

As strong as was this sentiment in favour of a vigorous military effort, it is to me now apparent that an equally universal sentiment will soon exist in favour of some other mode of accomplishing the same end. Nor should we be surprised at the change. It has been produced by the many causes existing among ourselves, and with those intrusted with the management of public affairs, rather than by any fear of our entire ability to sustain ourselves in arms against the South. Admitting this change of sentiment, therefore, which of itself is gradually impairing our power of aggression, is it not wise to look in time for some other mode of success than that which relies solely upon military force? I hold that no Republican Government founded upon our theory can ever sustain itself without popular sympathy. Indeed, no Government can be Republican which maintains itself against the prejudices of the people. When it can, it ceases to be Republican. Now, if the Administration cannot even sustain itself, it certainly cannot wage war when the armies and the means of supporting them are to be procured from the people themselves. Nor will Conscription Acts supply the deficiency of popular fervour.

I do not know that it is possible to restore the Union at all, but I do know that it is worthy of every effort and the adoption of every conceivable course, whether of force, stratagem, or negotiation. I would do any and everything to bring back the South. Nor would I interfere with this sole object by the inquiry what caused the estrangement—who was right in the origin—whether our arms had failed, and if so, the causes of the failure. Criminations and recriminations among ourselves should be ignored, and all of us, men of all parties, the civilian and the warrior, should combine in one common effort to re-unite the Confederacy. And my friends, do not suppose that peace by other methods than fighting is not attainable. It is true, it may cost some self-esteem. But what of that? If this Union is worth anything, it is worth the sacrifice of a little national dignity. Better suffer in self-pride than hazard national dismemberment.

Let us avoid the example of the South American Republics, which become the more inflated, pretentious and jealous in proportion as their real greatness and power become diminished by internal feud. I am asked whether a reunion by peaceful efforts is attainable, and what should be done to accomplish it. This is a proper question. I do not believe in the doctrine that the Democratic party shall reach power merely by appeals to the people in opposition to the existing rulers. Those in power may be wicked and incompetent, but when we ask for their places, it seems to me some policy different from the present policy must be developed. If the so-called War Democrats should succeed this Administration, of course, so far as the war is concerned, there would be no change. It would simply be the exchange of one set of men for another with like policies, purposes, and principles. Therefore, when I am asked what a Democratic President would do, if such an one should succeed Mr. Lincoln, I answer that it depends upon the kind of Democrat. If he should be of the timid, weak-backed kind, great on paper or on the stump in finding fault, but vacillating or faint-hearted in execution, there would be no change—certainly not for the better. But if he should be an independent man, with nerve and brain, and the principles of peace in his heart, a very different state of things would soon be produced. Such a man would restore the Union without further loss of blood, if such a blessing were within the range of possibilities. And I am asked what he would do. I answer that, whilst for others I cannot speak, I can say what, in my opinion, he should do. He should cease hostilities, and take a step towards the ascertainment whether a conference could be obtained. This could be done either openly and officially, or privately and unofficially. I do not say that there should be a convention. What shape or form the procedure should assume would be a matter of argument after a conference had been agreed upon. Negotiations thus obtained might lead to a convention of all the States, or to some action of Congress, or to some other mode of arrangement. The details, of course, would be matters of easy determination after the principle was amicably determined. If, however, I am told that the South would not listen to negotiations looking to re-union, but would insist upon a negotiation for her independence, I answer, who can say what the South would or would not do under the then existing circumstances? With the Federal Government in the hands of men who had come into power upon the principles of peace and declared opposition to the abolitionists and other enemies of the South—and with an approach under the aegis of the olive-branch and not of the sword—with the language of love and not of hate—why should we conclude that profers so merciful and liberal, coming from such a spirit, should be met by refusal and scorn? God, in the infinitude of His wisdom, has His own way of working out great national ends. Who dare say that the calamities which have befallen these two peoples, the last two years, are not the punishment for national sins? We have been unmindful and unappreciative of the blessings He has dispensed; and might it not have been deemed necessary for our future good that the sore afflictions with which we have been visited should have fallen upon us? That we have deserved punishment, none will deny; that we have received it, all will admit; and that the same Almighty Power which originally established us as a great, happy, and prosperous people, will extend His mercy to us, we have a right to expect.

But I am asked what would be proposed in case of an absolute refusal of the South to treat on other terms than unconditional independence? I am ready to answer:—In such a contingency, the President should ask Congress or the States to submit the question directly to the people whether the war should be resumed, or whether a final separation, looking to a future reconstruction, should be granted. And that decision should govern the conduct of the Administration. The people are the source of all authority. Their decision must govern. Under our system, they are the final arbiters of all political questions. Against their will, no war should be, or could be, successfully prosecuted. Sooner or later, they must adjudicate upon this momentous question, finally and for ever.

CONFEDERATE AGENTS IN ENGLAND.

A correspondence has been issued with regard to the remonstrances of Mr. Adams, on the subject of Confederate agents in England.

Mr. Adams, on the 9th of February, 1863, sends a copy of the "intercepted correspondence," emanating from persons well known to be high officers of the "so-called Confederate States," and says:—

Taken as a whole, these papers serve most conclusively to show that no respect whatever has been paid in her own realm by these parties, to the neutrality declared by her Majesty at the outset of these hostilities, and that so far as may be in their power, they are bent on making her kingdom subservient to their purpose of conducting hostilities against a nation with which she is at peace. I trust I may be permitted to add, that if my Government could have been induced in any way to initiate similar operations within the limits of this kingdom, I should have regarded it as very justly subject to the remonstrances which your Lordship has been pleased to address to me on account of acts of incomparably smaller significance.

On March 9, 1863, Earl Russell replies to Mr. Adams, that the intercepted correspondence had been considered by the law officers of the Crown, and adds:—

I have now to state to you that this correspondence does not appear to her Majesty's Government to contain any sufficient evidence, of "a system of action in direct hostility to the United States," on the part of any of her Majesty's subjects. It goes merely to show that agents of the so-called Confederate States, resident in this country, have received instructions from their own Government to endeavour to raise money on securities of that Government in England, and to enter into contracts for the purchase of munitions of war and for the building of iron-clad vessels. But there is no proof in these papers that the agents referred to have as yet brought themselves within the reach of any criminal law of the United Kingdom. For even supposing that they have acted on their instructions, it is not contrary to law for her Majesty's subjects to lend money on securities, or otherwise, to "the persons administering the Government of the Confederate States," nor to sell to that Government ordinary munitions of war. With respect to the building of iron-clad steamers for either belligerent Government, although this is clearly prohibited by the Foreign Enlistment Act, her Majesty's Government do not find, in this correspondence, sufficient information that anything of that kind has actually been done within this country which could form matter for criminal prosecution.

Mr. Adams, on March 14, expresses his profound regret at having to transmit to Mr. Seward Earl Russell's reply, maintaining that the acts referred to in the correspondence, the appointment of agents in this country to fit out ships and raise money for the purpose, with the appointment of officers to superintend the construction, showed a "deliberate attempt to establish within the limits of the kingdom a system of action in direct hostility to the Government of the United States."

Earl Russell, in reply, on April 2, refers to American precedents:—

No longer ago than the 20th of last November, in answer to the remonstrances of Mexico against an alleged organised system in the United States of aiding France in the war in which she is engaged with that Republic, but in which the United States are neutral, Mr. Seward replied by this among other citations (Mr. Webster to Mr. Thompson):—"As to advances, loans, or donations of money to the Government of Texas, or its citizens, the Mexican Government hardly needs to be informed that there is nothing unlawful in this, so long as Texas is at peace with the United States, and these are things which no Government undertakes to restrain."

You are, without doubt, perfectly aware that many decisions of tribunals in the United States fully establish that a like exposition of the law as to munitions of war and the sale of armed vessels has been always maintained in the United States when they were neutrals.

You do not state that the information which you have communicated to me as to alleged contracts for constructing war steamers, or the proposed establishment of naval officers to superintend them, would be sufficient to found a criminal prosecution in the United States; you are probably aware that it would not suffice for that purpose, and there is, therefore, no reason why you should complain of my statement that the information which you had furnished would not suffice for the like purpose in England.

You are not ignorant that agents have been employed, and munitions of war have been purchased, and that it is now again asserted that her Majesty's subjects are being recruited for the purpose of aiding the United States against the so-called Confederate States. And so far, it might be urged, in vague and popular language, by the Confederate States, as well as by the United States as the other belligerent, as it was substantially urged by Mexico against the United States last year, "that there is evidence of a deliberate attempt to establish within the limits of this kingdom a system of action in direct hostility to their Government;" but the question really is, has there been any act done in England both contrary to the obligations of neutrality as recognised by Great Britain and the United States, and capable of being made the subject of a criminal prosecution? I can only repeat that, in the opinion of her Majesty's Government, no such act is specified in the papers which you have submitted to me.

Other precedents are also cited by Earl Russell in the above despatch.

Mr. Adams replies on April 6th, also enters into the subject, and admits that the sale of arms by the subjects of a neutral is not unlawful, but maintains that the cases go not a step further:—

The case is changed when a belligerent is shown to be taking measures to establish a system of operations in a neutral country, with the intent to carry on a war from its ports, much in the same way that it would do, if it could, from its own territory; when it appoints agents, residing in that country, for the purpose of borrowing money to be applied to the fitting out of hostile armaments in those very ports; and when it appoints and sends out agents to superintend in those ports, the constructing, equipping, and arming ships of war, as well as the enlisting of the subjects of the neutral country, to issue forth for the purpose of carrying on hostilities on the ocean.

These are the points to which I desire to call your Lordship's attention in the intercepted despatches. I affirmed that they went to show a system of operations to the extent thus designated. I did not affirm that they absolutely proved the facts; but I did mean to be understood as affirming them to furnish strong corroborative evidence to sustain all the other proof which I have been in the practice of laying before your Lordship for a long time past of the abuses made of her Majesty's neutral territory for the conduct of the war directly from her ports, without the intervention of time even for the vessels to gain the semblance of a national character.

Earl Russell replies, on April 22, that he was unable to perceive that the principles maintained by Mr. Adams applied to facts within the cognizance of Her Majesty's Government; and on April 20 he writes as follows on a collateral subject:—

Foreign Office, April 20, 1863.

Sir,—With regard to the complaints which you have made from time to time of British sailors who have entered the Confederate service, I have to remark that no steps have hitherto been taken by the United States' authorities to prevent British subjects from entering the military or naval service of the United States.

Mr. Seward has, on the contrary, justified the means used, provided they were not bribery or intimidation, to induce British sailors to enter the Federal service.

You will readily perceive the justice of the request I am about to make, namely, that before you repeat your complaints that British sailors have entered the service of the so-called Confederate States, you will furnish me with proofs that all British subjects serving in the Federal army or navy have been discharged, and that orders have been given not to enlist or engage such persons to serve in arms contrary to the tenor of Her Majesty's Proclamation."

TAXES.

(From the Richmond Enquirer, March 24.)

Did ever nation before crave and pray to be heavily and immediately taxed as this people is craving now? The newspapers from all parts of the Confederacy bring us the same cry every morning. For God's sake tax us! Here is the money ready. We never were so well able to pay as now. Never had nation such need of creating and strengthening the great sinew of war—a full national treasury. You have got our fighting men, they say, now take our money. Take all—only get us through and out of this blinding, throttling war, out again into the fresh air and daylight of blessed peace, where we can breathe once more and see our way, and go on with our quiet work.

Though this outcry to be taxed may, for the present, harry and worry Congress a little, it is a sound and healthy symptom because it indicates these several things:

1st. It shows that our people have the good sense to perceive that this enormous flood of engraved paper is not money in itself, is not even the representative of money or value, save in so far as it is in some measure limited within the amount needful for exchanging the commodities of the country.—That the immense indebtedness of the Confederacy is itself a tax, and the heaviest of taxes; and that no time should be lost in contracting its amount (or at any rate arresting its further expansion) and in placing it upon the only sound basis of a large and just taxation.

2nd. It shows that the people have not only apprehended and laid to heart that principle of political economy, but also the higher and greater principle, that our debts must be paid and our national honour kept untarnished. This cry to be taxed, then, means no repudiation! It means that, albeit some wretches may have gone about whispering the base word, the heart of the country would revolt at it, and is even now filled with an eager and honourable anxiety to provide at all events against that last and worst disgrace.

3rd. It means, not only no repudiation, but also, no compromise! Those who loudly call on Congress to tax them in order to enable the President to carry on the war, are evidently not those same poor creatures who ask the President to make peace; not the same who plot for a reconstruction with the North-west, which would end in a general hotchpot of debts (debt of war for union, and debt of war against it,) and thus lead to a grand brotherly bankruptcy, and a noble participation in the infamy, share and share alike. And thus—

4th. It proves the confidence of the Confederate people in the future of the Confederacy; and by proving that confidence it assures that future, indeed. When a nation of our breed and blood has got to that point where it will offer freely both life and land, both blood and treasure, in vindication of its sovereignty and its self-respect, then it cannot be conquered; cannot be even seriously and permanently hurt. It is sure, with a rational and quiet certainty, of a glorious destiny, and has only to provide the means to pay the price of that inestimable blessing.

5th. It proves a very general confidence in the government of the country, by seeking to furnish that government with the means to carry on the great common business of defence. Whatever partial discontents, or personal or State grudges may exist here and there, amongst people who have stayed at home from the war—(for in the army there is nothing of all this)—evidently the mass is but little tainted by that canker of suspicion and disaffection. It is a reasonable and tractable people, on the whole, as well as proud, self-reliant, and jealous of power. Once convinced that those whom it has set over it, as the representatives of its sovereignty and depositories of its power, are diligently and honestly endeavouring to do their high duties, with life and honour pledged to success, and covetous of nothing but an honest fame, it will trust to all lengths, and the clamour of the disappointed and the serpent whispers of the traitor will pass unheeded.

Therefore, upon all these grounds we are glad to observe the anxious desire to be taxed. Congress has a tax bill before it; and the House is labouring upon its details each day in secret session. Why in secret session? We can understand why the plans now under discussion to arrange the currency question may require to be debated with closed doors; because to reveal the embarrassment of our finance would be useful information to the enemy. But the reason of laying and apportioning taxes in private is not so obvious. We care not who knows how heavy a taxation we are willing to submit to rather than touch the Yankees again; and on the other hand, the Confederate public is deeply interested in seeing how its representatives approach that subject, and how they deal with it. They even wish to know how individual members and Senators may vote upon the various items of taxation. We wish to see whether those who represent, or are interested in the great staples of the country are willing to take cheerfully their own large share of the burden—a burden, be it remembered, created and undergone mainly and especially to vindicate and confirm those great interests and the industrial system and social policy on which they depend.

In short, while the people are honest, patriotic and resolute in this matter of taxation, one would like to know and see that the Congress is fully abreast of the people, equal to the occasion and up to the mark. We shall return to this tomorrow.

THE CONFEDERATE TAX BILL.

We copy from the Charleston Courier of the 31st March, a synopsis of the Tax Bill now before the Confederate Congress. The Bill may be altered and amended in various ways before becoming a law, but as an evidence of the resolute earnestness with which the Southerners, in this, as in all other cases, meet their difficulties, it is not without considerable interest:—

The Bill, as reported from the Committee, proposes a tax of one per centum on the value of all real and personal property, moneys and credits, held on the 11th day of January, 1863, and on the 11th day of January of each succeeding year thereafter, except on such property, money or credit, as may be employed in a licensed business, or the profits of which are by the Bill especially taxed; prescribes the mode of taking out licenses, and taxes businesses as follows:

Bankers, $3,000 for each license, and ten per centum upon the gross amount of profits realised during the year ending on the 31st of December, 1863.

Auctioneers, $25 for each license, and one per centum on the gross amount of sales.

Wholesale dealers in liquors, $100 for each license, and one per centum on the gross amount of sales.

Retail dealers in liquors, fifty dollars for each license, and one per centum on the gross amount of sales.

Retail dealers (in groceries, merchandise, &c.) twenty-five dollars for each license, and one per centum on the gross amount of sales.

Wholesale dealers, one hundred dollars and one per centum on the gross amount of sales.

Pawnbrokers, one hundred dollars for each license and ten per centum on the gross amount of profits.

Distillers, one hundred dollars for each license and ten per centum on the gross amount of sales.

Brewers, fifty dollars for each license and one per centum on the gross amount of sales.

Commercial brokers, one hundred dollars for each license, and one per centum upon all sales.

Tobaccoists, twenty-five dollars for each license, and one per centum on gross amount of sales.

Any person whose business it is to retail cigars, snuff, and tobacco, in any form, shall be deemed a tobaccoist under this act, but wholesale and retail dealers, having taken out a license therefor, shall not be required to take out a license as a tobaccoist, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Theatres, three hundred dollars for each license. Every edifice used for the purpose of dramatic or operatic representations, plays, or performances, and not including halls rented or used occasionally for concerts or theatrical representations, shall be regarded as theatres under this act.

Circuses, one hundred dollars for each circus.

Jugglers and other persons exhibiting shows, twenty-five dollars.

Bowling alleys and billiard rooms, twenty dollars for each alley or billiard table.

Livery stable keepers, twenty-five dollars for each license, and one per centum on gross profits.

Cattle brokers, twenty-five dollars for each license, and one per centum on gross amount of sales.

Butchers and bakers, twenty-five dollars for each license, and one per centum on the gross amount of sales.

Pollars, fifty dollars for each license, and one per centum on the gross sales.

Apothecaries, twenty-five dollars for each license, and one per centum on the gross amount of sales.

Photographers, the same.

Lawyers, physicians, surgeons, and dentists, twenty-five dollars for each license, and one per centum on the gross amount of receipts from practice.

Confectioners, twenty-five dollars for each license, and one per centum on gross amount of sales.

Salaries not exceeding fifteen hundred dollars, taxed one per centum, and any excess of that amount, two per centum.

There are also provisions proposing to tax railroad and steam navigation companies; banks, trust companies, savings institutions, gas companies, insurance companies, and telegraph and manufacturing companies. It further proposes to levy a tax of one per centum upon any person or persons, firm or company, publishing any newspaper, magazine, review, or other literary, scientific, or news publication, issued periodically on the gross receipts for all advertisements, or all matters for the insertion of which in said newspaper or other publication, as aforesaid, or in extras, supplements, sheets, or fly leaves, accompanying the same, pay is required or received.

Q. Who is Jeff Davis?

A. The Devil.

THE KEOKUK.—The Keokuk was designed by Mr. C. W. Whitney, of New York, and was built at the yard of J. S. Underhill and Co., Dry Dock Iron Works.

She was launched in the early part of last winter, and sailed from New York on the 11th of March, arriving at Port Royal on the 26th. The following is a description of the vessel:—The Keokuk was not only a two-turreted vessel, but was also a ram.

She was smaller than the Ericsson Monitors, being 139ft. 6in. over all, including the ram, which was 5 feet long. She had a beam of 36ft., with a depth of hold of 13ft. 6in., and drew 9ft. of water.

Her sides sloped inward at an angle of 37 degrees, to shed the enemy's shot. She was built of iron, and her armour extended nearly 4ft. below the water line.

The horizontal deck was 5ft. above the water line. Her propulsive power was furnished by two propellers and two engines of 300-horse power.

The hull of the vessel was constructed of half-inch rolled iron. She had three keelsons running the whole length of the vessel, and two fore and aft bulkheads, leaving on each side a space and forming an inner skin, which would probably keep out the water in the event of the outer skin being pierced by shot.

In addition to these she had two bulkheads—one forward and one aft—which could be filled with water so as to settle the vessel down while in action.

These could be filled in fifteen minutes and pumped out in forty minutes. In using the ram, should the vessel be wrenched so as to cause leakage, the compartment alluded to was to preserve the vessel from sinking.

The vessel was submerged one foot by the appliance of these water tanks. The turrets were immovable, the gun revolving to the three ports pierced in each turret.

They weighed each forty tons, and were built of a groundwork of half-inch rolled plates, like the hull, covered with bars of iron four inches thick, standing edgewise, placed one and a quarter inch apart, the interstices being filled with yellow pine.

Over all this were three plates, each five-eighths of an inch thick—the whole structure bolted together with one and one-eighth inch bolts, with countersunk heads one foot apart.

The turrets, therefore, were 6½ inches thick. Each turret had three ports, with heavy shutters working in two halves—one port on each side, and one forward and aft.

Each turret contained an 11-inch gun, carrying 180lb shot. These guns moved on revolving slides, which were placed on a floor 20 inches below the level of the deck, thus giving a greater height to the turrets, which were 20 feet in diameter at the base, 14 feet at the top—being cone shaped—and 8 feet 8 inches high.

The turrets were additionally supported within by bars of 5-inch by 1-inch iron set edgewise 15 inches apart, and the ports were made sufficiently large to give the guns ten degrees vertical and eight degrees lateral range.

The rudder and propeller were guarded by an overhanging structure, and a wrought guard on the after part. This little vessel carried 100 men all told, and had capacity in her two magazines for 200 11-inch shot, 150 11-inch shell, with shrapnel and canister, small ammunition, and powder in proportion.

She appeared admirably calculated for river work, her light draught and easy guidance by means of two propellers fitting her especially for intricate navigation.

Her builder was confident that, though in some respects novel in construction, she would be found as shot-proof and serviceable as any; and the care and completeness with which he applied every precaution and multiplied means for offence and defence gave hopes of a most efficient boat.

Mr. Whitney was one of the earliest to urge the propriety of building a shotproof fleet, and his studies in the question as well as his knowledge of the qualities of iron gave his opinions weight.

The ventilation of the vessel had been carefully attended to, and the accommodations for the officers and crew were of an excellent character.

In many points the details of this vessel were new and interesting. For instance, the entire lower portion of the sides of the turrets could be thrown open to admit light and air, and of course to effect the expulsion of foul air; and, there being a passage on each side of the vessel communicating from one turret to the other, a constant circulation of air was kept up without artificial means, although such means were provided, and which would, in the opinion of many, have rendered the vessel in point of ventilation second to none.—Times.

The first number of the Mirror, a weekly newspaper, was published last Saturday. The object of this journal is twofold. It is intended to give a full account of the home and foreign news of the week, and also leaders, essays, and reviews.

It aims to combine the features of the modern review, with the information of the newspaper. The parliamentary summary is very well executed, and the getting up of the "news" part of the paper is altogether creditable, although in some of the articles there are too many words for the matter; and prolixity in a narrative of facts is very objectionable.

The Mirror assumes an air of judicial impartiality on the American question, but its neutrality is of the kind Mr. Bright approves of—exceedingly pro-Northern.

It remarks, for example, that the battles have not been decisive for peace and war, and for "such a result both sides have exhausted their strength and strained their credit in the vast preparations which have astonished this generation."

The writer does not take into account that the North is the invading power, and that the South has been fighting for independence and "to be let alone." Our contemporary is evidently suffering from the colour blindness that afflicts all the partisans of New England.

LA BATAILLE DES MOUCHOIRS.

Our readers will remember that on the occasion of 382 paroled prisoners leaving New Orleans, there was a farewell demonstration which greatly irritated the authorities. The ladies of New Orleans assembled in great numbers, insisted upon waving their handkerchiefs, and, at last, were charged and dispersed by the Union soldiers under the command of the "gallant" General Banks. About 400 women and children had stationed themselves on a river boat (the Laura Hill) to witness the departure. The boat was pushed off from the wharf, and these "contumacious females" and "infant rebels" were kept, without food or change of raiment, the whole night on the river. This was done by the direction of Admiral Farragut. The following lines have been published in the Confederacy to celebrate "this Union Victory:"—

"LA BATAILLE DES MOUCHOIRS," FOUGHT FRIDAY, 20TH OF FEBRUARY, 1863.

Of all the battles, modern or old,
By Poet sung or historian told;
Of all the routs that ever were seen
From the days of Saladin to Marshal Turenne,
Or all the victories later yet won,
From Waterloo's field to that of Bull Run;
All, all must hide their fading light,
In the radiant glow of the handkerchief fight;
And a Pean of joy must thrill the land,
When they hear of the deeds of Banks's band.

'Twas on the Levee, where the tide
Of "Father Mississippi" flows;
Our gallant lads, their country's pride,
Won this great victory o'er her foes.
Four hundred Rebels were to leave
That morning for Secessia's shades,
When down there came (you'd scarce believe),
A troop of children, wives and maids,
To wave farewells, to bid God speed,
To shed for them the parting tear,
To waft them kisses as the meed
Of praise to soldiers' hearts most dear.
They came in hundreds—thousands lined
The streets, the roofs, the shipping too,
Their ribbons dancing in the wind,
Their bright eyes flashing love's adieu.

'Twas then to danger we awoke,
But nobly faced the unarmed throng,
And beat them back with hearty stroke,
Till reinforcements came along.
We waited long, our aching sight
Was strained in eager, anxious gaze;
At last we saw the bayonets bright
Flash in the sun-light's welcome blaze.
The cannon's dull and heavy roll
Fell greeting on our gladdened ear;
'Then fired each eye, then glowed each soul,
For well we knew the strife was near.

Charge! rang the cry, and on we dashed
Upon our female foes,
As seas in stormy fury lashed,
Where'er the tempest blows:
Like chaff their parasols went down,
As on our gallants rushed;
And many a bonnet, robe, and gown
Was torn to shreds or crushed.
Though well we pled the bayonet,
Still some our efforts braved;
Defiant both of blow and threat,
Their handkerchiefs still waved.
Thick grew the fight, loud rolled the din,
When Charge! rang out again,
And then the cannon thundered in,
And scoured o'er the plain.
Down, 'neath th' unyielding iron heels
Of horses children sank,
While through the crowd the cannon wheels
Mowed roads on either flank;
One startled shriek, one hollow groan,
One headlong rush, and then
Huzza! the field was all our own,
For we were Banks's men.

That night, released from all our toils,
Our dangers past and gone,
We gladly gathered up the spoils
Our chivalry had won!
Five hundred 'kerchiefs we had snatched
From rebel ladies' hands,
Ten parasols, two shoes (not matched),
Some ribbons, belts and bands,
And other things that I forgot;
But then you'll find them all
As trophies in that hallowed spot—
The credle—Fanieul Hall!

And long on Massachusetts' shore,
And on Green Mountains' side,
Or where Long Island's breakers roar,
And by the Hudson's tide,
In times to come, when lamps are lit,
And fires brightly blaze,
While round the knees of heroes sit
The young of happier days,
Who listen to their storied deeds,
To them sublimely grand—
Then glory shall award its meed
Of praise to Banks's band,
And fame proclaim that they alone
(In triumph's loudest note)
May wear henceforth, for valour shown,
A woman's petticoat!

MONSTER FEDERAL LOAN.—We understand that Mr. Walker, a confidential agent of Mr. Chase, has arrived in this country from Washington with full powers to negotiate a sterling loan for £50,000,000, on behalf of the Federal Government. The stock is to bear 7 per cent. interest, payable half yearly in sterling in London. Possibly, as a further inducement and security to British capitalists, the confiscated cotton plantations and other property of the Southern rebels may be hypothecated to the loan contractors. Mr. Waller has proceeded to Manchester, where his proposals are more likely to be entertained than in Lombard-street.—Standard.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

ACCORDING to the advices from New York, seven gunboats, one ram, and three transports, from Admiral Porter's fleet, essayed on the 16th of April to run the Vicksburg blockade, and to join Admiral Farragut. The operation, so far as the gunboats and rams were concerned, was completely successful; the only damage reported being a shot through the hull of the Benton, the flag-ship of Admiral Porter. Of the transports, one, the Henry Clay, was burnt, and another, the Forest Queen, was disabled, and had to return. The Federal report says:—"The 'rebel' fire was far less effective than was anticipated." The movement of the Federal fleet was not a surprise, for the same account states that some houses were fired in order that "the artillerists might get a good view of our steamers as they went down within range of their guns." We may be sure the transports were not placed in the most exposed situation, and yet out of three one was burnt and one disabled, whilst the seven gunboats and the ram passed with one casualty. It would appear that the Confederates directed their fire on the transports and not on the war vessels. It would be useless to speculate on the reason of the Federal fleet passing so easily, or what is likely to be the effect of the movement. All we know at present is that eleven Federal gunboats, including three under Admiral Farragut, are between Vicksburg and Port Hudson.

It is rumoured that the Confederate battery at Warrenton was destroyed by the Federal gunboats on the 17th of April, that five transports had run the blockade of the Yazoo and were above Haines's Bluff, and that the siege of Vicksburg will immediately be recommenced. It is also said that another attempt is being made to turn the obstinate Mississippi, and to capture Vicksburg by digging a canal.

The accounts from Washington, North Carolina, are not very clear. It appears that General Foster left his army and arrived at Newbern on the 16th of April, making his escape in the vessel which brought him supplies and reinforcements on the 14th. Next we hear that the siege is given up, that the Confederates have abandoned their batteries on the Tar River, and that the Federals are in "hot pursuit." Finally we are informed that "the pursuit of the Confederates, who retired from Washington, North Carolina, is abandoned." It is curious that the Federals should have been in such difficulty that General Foster should have deemed it prudent to leave his command, and that immediately afterwards the siege should have been abandoned. We are evidently not in possession of all the facts.

The Confederate ram Queen of the West has been destroyed. She was aground in Grand Lake, and in that condition blown up by a shell from the gunboat Calhoun, belonging to the expedition of General Banks. Her crew, consisting of 113 officers and men, was captured. The steamer Diana, lately captured from the Federals, has been burnt in the Archafalaya River, to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy.

The Confederate movements in Missouri are causing considerable anxiety in the North. The number of the Confederate forces under Generals Sterling Price and Marmaduke are variously estimated from 20,000 to 40,000. There was a report, since contradicted, that the Confederates had captured the town of Cape Girardeau, and that they were in a position to blockade the Mississippi at that point. It is now stated that they have taken possession of Fredericktown in that State.

The Federal General Blunt has issued a savage order to his forces, in which he tells them that "guerillas" in uniform are, if captured, to suffer death. He recommends that, as far as possible, the Confederates should be killed and not taken prisoners; and when they are captured they are to be hung or shot without delay. Does General Blunt think that he can carry on war in such an inhuman fashion with impunity? Does he not know that there is such a thing as retribution?

The special despatch of the Tribune, announcing that the Federals, under General Stoneman, had crossed the Rappahannock and occupied Gordonsville, was not quite correct. Gordonsville has not been captured. Five attempts to cross the river were repulsed; and then General Stoneman discovered that the condition of the roads rendered it impossible for him to proceed.

The Federal gunboats have captured a Confederate battery of six guns, on the Nasemond River, Virginia. It is reported that the Federals made 200 prisoners, but the loss in killed and wounded on either side is not stated.

It is asserted that General Banks has advanced into the Bayou Teché country, and that he is opposed by a Confederate force of 8,000, under General Sibley. A special despatch to the New York Herald reports that the Confederates have abandoned their works near Brashear City. The special despatches of the New York press are so often wrong, that without denying this report, we may observe that it requires confirmation.

The news from Tennessee is still made up of rumours of preparations for a great battle. The rapid falling of the Cumberland River, by which General Rosecranz receives his supplies, will, it is supposed, induce him to risk an engagement. It is again said that he has been reinforced by a portion of Grant's army. If all the accounts of what has become of General Grant's army are true, it must have been divided into very small bodies.

Nashville, or rather the Federal authorities at Nashville, were alarmed by a rumour that General Van Dorn was advancing to attack that city.

The Federals have taken the town of Minnville, Tennessee. They are reported to have captured 300 prisoners, and to have destroyed a cotton factory, two mills, and a large quantity of stores.

Severe fighting has taken place in the neighbourhood of Corinth. "The Confederates were driven from Bear Creek to Crane Creek."

"A Federal expedition has destroyed Celina, Kentucky, with immense quantities of Confederate stores."

We must remind our readers that all the above items are derived exclusively from Northern information.

At Norfolk the Federal authorities have been considerably agitated. On the 11th of April, a railroad bridge was accidentally damaged, and a Federal captain was ordered to remove some planks from it, but mistaking his instructions he destroyed the bridge, and a train came to grief. Upon this a cry was raised that the enemy was coming. Stores were collected and carried to the boats, and the following order, which we copy from the Norfolk Union of the 15th of April, was issued:—

Head-quarters, Department of Virginia, Norfolk, Virginia, April 12.

The proximity of the Confederate forces, renders it proper, by virtue of the military and naval authority of the United States, to give the following notice:—

All foreign consuls and their families; all women and children, and all other persons not in the service of the United States, who prefer safety to the conflicts of war, are notified that on the approach of the enemy to any town or village, within this department, and the range of the Union guns, such town or village will be fired on without further consideration.

E. D. KERS,
Major-General Commanding Department of Virginia.

Amongst the other war intelligence there is a report that the Federals, numbering 4,000, have been repulsed upon Coldwater River, and that the Confederates were pursuing them. The correspondent of the New York Times asserts that a Federal force has gone from Greenville, Mississippi, up Deer Creek, and "during six days destroyed property on various plantations estimated at three million dollars, consisting of cotton-mills, cotton-gins, and 700,000 bushels of corn, and that they brought away immense quantities of stores."

The case of the Peterhoff has been brought before Judge Betts, in the United States District Court. The first point raised was in reference to the mail bag. An application was made by Mr. E. D. Smith, the United States District Attorney, for the delivery of the mail unopened to the British authorities. He said that an external view of the sealed packages revealed no ground to suspect that they were spurious or simulated. Are we to understand from this that the mail bag has been opened, and the several letters critically examined? He declares that he has examined "all the authorities," and that he can find no precedent to justify the violation of a public mail in order to secure a chance to discover evidence against a vessel. This is equivalent to an admission that the detention of the mail was unlawful. He concluded his address by saying: "Representing the Government, as I do, I ask that my consent may be entered upon the minutes of the Court, and that an order may be granted to release this mail and put it on its way to its original destination." Mr. Upton, on behalf of the captors contended that the mail might be searched for evidence, and though the District Attorney might, of his own motion, discontinue a prize proceeding (which Mr. Upton did not admit), still it did not follow that the District Attorney had the further right, after announcing his determination, to proceed with the adjudication, to determine capriciously and arbitrarily what evidence should be admitted and what should be excluded, what should be filed on the registry of the Court, and what should be abandoned or destroyed, or surrendered to the possession of the claimants. In his reply, Mr. E. D. Smith said the application was insisted on as a matter of "public law and international comity." He also observed that "suspicious attaching to the vessel or cargo cannot be extended to a public mail which is thrown on board. It must be judged by itself, and if it presents nothing to impeach its integrity it must be released, unless there exists independent and positive testimony to impeach it. The evidence here is quite the other way." We confess we do not understand how the integrity of a mail is to be judged unless it is opened; or what evidence Mr. Smith could have about the mail, unless it had been tampered with. The learned gentleman concluded by reading "an extract from a communication to some officer of the Government, written by the Secretary of State, and approved by the President." After this we are not surprised that, when a few days afterwards the case was resumed, "the Court decided, in compliance with the obvious wish of the Government, to deliver up the mails unopened." This manifestation of Government influence proves the correctness of an observation that appeared in our issue of the 2nd of April, in an article on the capture of the Peterhoff—that the decisions of the United States' Prize Courts "will not be based upon evidence, but will be framed to suit the views of the United States' Government." The mail of the Peterhoff was not given up because it was unlawful to detain it, but because it did not suit the Government to instruct the Prize Court to act unlawfully.

The New Yorkers are pleased with Earl Russell's letter of April 3, concerning the right of British vessels to trade with Matamoros, presuming, no doubt, that it will give them a monopoly of that trade. The action of the British Government with respect to the Alexandra has also given satisfaction. The satisfaction arises from the conviction that we are afraid of the North. The New York Herald says, "We do not know that we have any great reason to be grateful for this change of policy on the part of the English Government. It has been dictated by its fears rather than its sense of justice."

There are many indications that the North is anything but a "united, happy family." James L. Addison, chief clerk in the Adjutant-General's office, and his brother, Anthony Addison, chief clerk in the Pension Bureau at Washington, have been arrested on the charge of corresponding with the enemy. They have since been released. The Rev. John Martin and his daughter had previously been arrested upon the same charge, and ordered to be sent beyond the Federal lines. This is a strange proceeding on the part of the Government professing to be engaged in putting down "a rebellion."

On the 18th April the towns of Danville and Martinsville, Indiana, were the scenes of serious riots between the Knights of the Golden Circle and the Unionists. Pistols and rifles were freely used. One man was killed and several wounded.

A serious disturbance occurred in Cincinnati in consequence of a negro knocking down a crippled soldier in the street. Several negroes were severely beaten in retaliation.

Two of the members of the assembly at Albany have been arrested upon charges of bribery and corruption.

"A loyal monster mass meeting" has been held, at which General Scott presided, wrapped up "in a United States' flag." After the "usual war speeches," an ode was recited, in which the following stanza was introduced in honour of General Scott:—

Keep step with the music of Union!
So Scott, the great lion-souled, cries,
The flames of the patriot flashing,
Like lightning of Heaven from his eyes.
Red wrath on all Copperhead villains
Who dare trail their blasphemous slime
On Loyalty's thrice sacred flowers
That Washington sowed in our clime.

We expect the "Copperhead villains" will not care much for the threatened "red wrath" of the "great lion-souled."

The cruel murder of Colonel Kimball excites much attention. General Corcoran asserts that the murdered man insulted him. Dead men tell no tales, and it is thought that General Corcoran will escape punishment, as he is useful with the Irish Brigade.

President Lincoln has proclaimed that Western Virginia will become a State of the Union in sixty days from the present date.

The Governor of New York vetoed the bill allowing soldiers and sailors to vote by proxy. The Senate passed the bill over the Governor's veto, but it failed in the House.

The Alabama is reported to have chased two vessels ashore in Turk's Island Passage on March 26th. A Danish brig has landed at St. Croix the crews of the Lapwing and the Concord, captured by the Florida on the 27th and 28th March, as well as the crew of the Star of Peace, also captured by the Florida.

The Confederate steamer Barrose, loaded with cotton, from St. Mary's to Nassau, has been abandoned at sea. The British prize steamer Gertrude, captured off Harbour Island by the Vanderbilt, has arrived at New York. She was returning after an ineffectual attempt to enter Charleston harbour, and was caught whilst attempting to run the Federal blockade of Nassau.

The British gunboat Cygnet was fired at, on April 4, in the Bahama Channel, by the Federal steamer Connecticut. The captain of the Cygnet went on board the Connecticut, and the Federal captain said he had mistaken the British gunboat for the Alabama, and the excuse was accepted. The captain of the Connecticut may be glad he was mistaken, for the Alabama would have given him a warm reply.

The fluctuations in the price of gold at New York continue. On the 21st April it was 43 per cent. prem.; on the 25th April it was 53½ per cent.

ENGLAND.

The Poor-law returns of last week report a diminution of 4,780 in the number of paupers in the cotton manufacturing districts. It is probable that this sort of reduction in the pauperism of those districts may go on during the whole summer; and it is necessary that we should not misconceive its significance. It does not necessarily imply a proportionate diminution of distress; for many of those who have ceased to be paupers are as ill off as while they were dependent on parochial relief. It does not imply a corresponding improvement in trade. Very few mills have been re-opened, and in these there are scant wages to be earned by the operatives, and no profits for the masters. Many of those who have disappeared from the pauper-roll have gone "on the tramp" into other districts, to find work how and where they can, and with the approach of winter it is probable that they will come back, without work, and no better off than when they started. Some few have emigrated; and these, with all the hardships and difficulties of a life for which they are wholly unfitted before them, are the most fortunate of all. Some have been assisted to temporary work by the kindness of their wealthier neighbours, or have found employment on the works undertaken, expressly for their benefit, by neighbouring landowners. But these resources are eminently precarious, because they are artificial; and only Government can furnish artificial employment for any length of time to a population of half a million.

A correspondence has taken place between the Foreign-office and Mr. Grazebrook, the owner of the Dolphin, in which Mr. Hammond announces that Lord Russell will endeavour to obtain the rendition of the ship, unless some cause for taking her before a Prize Court be alleged; and refuses to give any protection to another ship which Mr. Grazebrook is about to send out; concluding with a meaningless flourish about the protection always extended by Government to legitimate British commerce. Inasmuch as legitimate British commerce has been systematically plundered by American cruisers, and left without redress by her Majesty's Government, this is only adding insult to injury.

A deputation of Trades' Unionists, under the patronage of Mr. Bright, and of one Professor Bessly, of the University College, waited upon the American Minister, on Saturday, to assure him of their profound devotion to the Federal cause, their intense admiration of Mr. Lincoln and General Butler, and their determination not to allow any foolish indignation against Federal outrages on our flag, or any regard for the rights of neutral commerce, to embroil this country in war with the United States. Mr. Bessly, who is notorious for the violence of his sentiments and the abusiveness of his language, took up his parable, after the Trades' delegates had had their say, and prophesied judgments against Southern sympathisers in high places. Mr. Adams kept his countenance, and neither laughed nor yawned as these men—not one of whom has either character, influence, or authority, and several of whom are very well known in connection with divers disgraceful strikes and other proceedings in which the folly of workmen has been turned to the profits of professional incendiaries—delivered their respective messages of mischief and nonsense; and made them a reply better suited to the consequence which he would like to attribute to them than to their real and utter insignificance.

On Saturday the Royal Academy held its annual dinner, in the rooms in which the pictures are hung for exhibition. The meeting possessed peculiar attractions, in the presence of their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge, and of his Serene Highness Prince Louis of Hesse. In responding to his own health, drunk after that of the Queen, and the "Memory of the great and good Prince Consort," the Prince of Wales said:—

Sir Charles Eastlake, your Royal Highnesses, my Lords, and Gentlemen,—It is with the most contending feelings of pleasure, pride and sorrow that I rise to return you thanks in the name of myself and the Royal Family for the kind terms in which you, Sir Charles, have proposed our health, and for the very cordial way in which this distinguished assembly has received it. (Cheers.) I cannot on this occasion divest my mind of the associations connected with my beloved and lamented father. His bright example cannot fail to stimulate my efforts to tread in his footsteps (loud cheers); and, whatever my shortcomings may be, I may at least presume to participate in the interest which he took in every institution which tended to encourage art and science in this country (cheers), but more especially in the prosperity of the Royal Academy. (Loud cheers.) Adverting to my marriage, I beg you to believe how grateful I feel for, and I may be permitted to add how sincerely I appreciate, the sentiments you have expressed with reference to the Princess. (Loud cheers.) I know that I am only speaking her mind in joining her thoughts to mine on this occasion. (Loud cheers.) We neither of us can ever forget the manner in which our union has been celebrated throughout the nation (cheers); and I should be more than ungrateful if I did not retain the most lasting as well as most pleasing recollection of the kind expressions and reception which my attendance at your anniversary meeting has evoked this evening. (Loud and continued cheering.)

Subsequent toasts called up Prince Louis of Hesse, the Duke of Cambridge, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Palmerston, and other gentlemen of note. The speech of the Prime Minister was, as usual, the happiest and most apposite of all.

The chief, we might say the sole political event of the week, has been the withdrawal of the Ministerial proposal to extend the income tax to the revenues of charitable corporations, arising out of property—not of course including their receipts from voluntary contributions. The measure would have brought in only about £100,000 a year, and it would have been exceedingly unpopular throughout the country. Mr. Gladstone was assailed on Monday afternoon by a deputation which, though composed almost entirely either of men of the highest social standing, or of the permanent officers (Secretaries, Treasurers, and so forth) of London charities, occupied the whole of the room in which he received it, and overflowed into the passages and waiting rooms of the Treasury Department. This deputation was introduced by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Duke of Cambridge. Such a pressure, on a point of so little moment, to the Exchequer and of so much interest to the country was practically decisive. But Mr. Gladstone could not allow his measure to fall to the ground in silence; he went down to the House that evening, and defended it in one of the most telling speeches he ever delivered. The arguments in favour of the proposed tax were, as stated by him:—1st. That charitable endowments were chiefly created by death-bed bequests, which hardly deserve the name of charity, and which the State ought not to encourage. 2nd. That many charities, so called by law, are either useless, noxious, or scandalous—particularly those which provide small doles for the poor of particular parishes, and thereby attract into those parishes a population of paupers seeking a share in these doles. 3rd. That all charitable estates have benefited greatly by the commercial legislation which has been rendered possible by the imposition of the income-tax and that therefore they should share the burden. 4th. That an exemption from taxation is a virtual grant of State money, which these charitable institutions ought not promiscuously to receive. In answer, it was urged that this last reason was altogether fallacious; that to abstain from taking away money is not to bestow it; that the exemption of charities from the income-tax had no tendency to encourage death-bed bequests to charities; that the badness of some existing charities, so far as it proved anything, proved not that they should be taxed, but that they should be confiscated; that the recipients of charities were almost invariably persons having less than £100 a year, and therefore entitled to exemption; and finally—and this was the argument which proved most conclusive—it was shown most clearly that the effect of the tax on many most deserving charities would be to compel the reduction of pensions already miserably small, or the dismissal of pensioners to absolute starvation; that it would force orphan schools to reduce the number of their scholars, almshouses to turn out poor widows destitute upon the world, and hospitals to close their doors on hundreds of patients every year. The feeling of the House was evident; not a single member rose to support Mr. Gladstone, and he reluctantly withdrew the clauses of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, by which the income-tax was to be imposed on charities.

EUROPE.

The Moniteur has published the replies of Prince Gortschakoff to the French and English notes, introducing them with the comment, that "they open a path to projects of conciliation, and contain the bases of negotiations likely to lead to a common understanding between the different Courts now seeking the means of upholding the legitimate interests of Poland." As the Moniteur may be presumed to speak for the French Government, it is very satisfactory to have this assurance that the Russian notes open the way for an understanding. The ordinary public, which does not read between the lines, and must take the plain words of the documents as the materials for its judgment, would hardly arrive at the conclusion. Prince Gortschakoff is, no doubt, conciliatory enough, and as he had much provocation to a sharp answer, and a sharp answer might have led to war, his courtesy is a matter for great satisfaction. Further, he practically, if not in terms, admits the right of France and England to interfere between the Czar and the Poles with counsel and warning, and that is a concession which may be used for the profit of Poland. Perhaps it is this admission which the Moniteur takes as the basis of negotiations.

The Czar has derived from the French despatch the conviction that the views of the Emperor Napoleon are entirely in accordance with his own. He admits the just interest which the bordering Powers and those concerned in the regulation of the fate of Europe must naturally devote to complications which may tend to trouble its peace. But the interest of Russia cannot, surely, be less profound; and her desire to bring back tranquillity cannot be less sincere. The Czar appreciates the feelings of the French Government when it points out the opportuneness of considering the means of placing Poland in the condition of permanent peace. Nothing could better respond to the views of the Czar, but it is precisely on the choice of the means which can produce this result that it is desirable to come to an understanding. The French Minister points out the powerlessness of the combinations hitherto imagined to reconcile Poland to the position assigned to her. That is an additional reason for not recommencing experiments which have been a source of misfortune for Poland and for Russia, a cause of trouble for Europe, and, in all probability, will end again by producing the same results. The evil from which the kingdom at present suffers, is not an isolated fact. Revolutionary tendencies, the scourge of our epoch, concentrate in that country. But the Czar has undertaken the mission to make all parts of his empire enter on the path of regular progress. The French Minister will find in the despatch to the Russian Ambassador at London, what part the Emperor Napoleon can take, according to the Russian idea, to accelerate the realization of the wish which he expresses to us in the name of humanity and the permanent interests of Europe. The Russian Government feels authorized to hope that the Emperor Napoleon will not refuse the moral concurrence which may depend upon himself to facilitate to the Czar the task traced out by his solicitude for the kingdom of Poland, his duties towards Russia, and his international relations with his neighbours and the great Powers of Europe. Thus, Prince Gortschakoff to Baron Budberg.

What is it that the Emperor Napoleon is to do? We turn with eagerness to the despatch to Baron Brunnow. It is much longer, as courteous, although not quite so friendly, and rather more indefinite. After devoting some paragraphs to the question of the treaty rights of Poland, and vindicating the former contentions of the Russian Government, the Prince observes that a prolongation of the discussion on this ground would be sterile labour, declares that the intention of the Czar is to arrive at a practical solution, and presumes that such is the desire of the British Government. As the common aim is the repose and wellbeing of the kingdom of Poland, it is difficult not to arrive at an understanding. The difference of appreciation arises from the apparent belief of the English Government, that the constitution of 1815 is the sole panacea for the present agitation in Poland. But the British Government and the British nation, with their practical good sense will not pretend that there is only one form of Government for all peoples, whatever their history and development. The Czar has entered resolutely on the path of reform, he has accomplished a social transformation. The national institutions, for the most part elective, with which Poland has been endowed, have not been understood in Europe. The system inaugurated by the Czar contains a germ which time and experience must develop. It is destined to end in an administrative autonomy on the basis of the provincial and municipal institutions, which in England were the point of departure and the foundation of the grandeur and prosperity of the country. But the party of disorder, which understood that the peaceable majority of the kingdom would enter on the path of regular progress, has not permitted the execution of the new institutions. The Manifesto of March 31st, Russian style, indicates the views of the Czar. He has determined to maintain the institutions already granted; the future depends upon the confidence which his intention meets with in the kingdom. Lord Russell invites Russia to fulfil the duties of propriety towards other States. Russia is but too anxious to do so. But she has not been fairly treated herself. The conspiracy is armed from abroad. It has the direct concurrence of foreigners. The British Government asks us to cause the kingdom to return into the conditions of a desirable peace, and justifies the expression of its desire by the stipulations of 1815. These wishes are entirely in accord with those of the Government. His Majesty admits that the troubles of Poland may affect the tranquillity of the border states, and that these may interest the Powers who signed the general treaty. The Emperor believes that some explanation on these bases would, and in the spirit of the communications which have been addressed to us may, conduce to a result consonant to the general interests. The Prince then draws the earnest attention of the English Government to the true cause of the present situation in the persistent instigations of the party of universal revolution, and to the true remedy, an effort of the governments who desire the return of Poland to durable peace, to appease the disorders, moral and material, which these parties labour to propagate over Europe, and thus far stop the principal source of those agitations by which their foresight is alarmed. It would seem from this that the part the Emperor Napoleon is to take—to give Poland durable peace—is to enter into a crusade against the revolution. The passage we have italicised is, however, the important one. Prince Gortschakoff seems to invite England and France to discuss with him the measures to be taken to pacify Poland.

The war news from Poland this week is fuller, but not a whit clearer than usual. It would serve no good purpose to give a list of victories claimed by the Russians and the Poles respectively, the actual value of which can only be ascertained some three weeks after the telegraph has done its work. It would appear, however, that for the moment, the insurgents have rather the advantage. The Russians seem to be waiting until the 13th inst., when the offer of the amnesty expires, before taking any very active steps. At present they seem to be acting upon the defensive. General Von Berg is an able man, and is not disposed to begin his work until he is quite ready to carry it through. He has discovered what has been the great error of the Russians throughout—the attempt to suppress the insurrection with an insufficient number of troops, and is waiting for the reinforcements promised him. Then the struggle will begin in earnest, and we fear that the tendency of the news will then be continually unfavourable to the cause of Poland. The Central Revolutionary Government has, it is said, ordered all the functionaries in the Russian service to resign, and General Von Berg, for better reasons, has adopted the same measures. He has found out that the Polish officials have played into the hands of their countrymen. The General is also credited with a plan for the suppression of the rebellion, likely enough to be efficacious, if only he can get the means to carry it out. Poland is to be divided into some 200 military districts, in each of which the troops are to go systematically to work, to root out the rebels. Another scheme attributed to the Government is, the confiscation of the property of insurgent landowners; but this would only be an extension to Congress Poland of a measure already adopted in Lithuania, and announced about the same time as the amnesty.

Meanwhile the spirit of nationality is rising in Russia. The birth-day of the Emperor was the occasion for numerous manifestoes of patriotic feeling, and of a passionate determination to submit to no curtailment of the territory of Russia. Some of these addresses have a very warlike and enthusiastic character. In his reply to an address from St. Petersburg, the Czar said, "The only object of my life is the welfare of our dear Fatherland, and the gradual development of its civic institutions." The official journal which records this expression, publishes a fitting accompaniment in a ukase, directing that for the future corporal punishment shall only be employed in exceptional cases.

Langiewicz has been removed from Tischnowitz to the Bohemian fortress of Josephstadt. The cause of his removal was an attempt to escape. He had withdrawn his parole, and was consequently closely guarded. The guards he attempted to bribe, they took his money and carried it to their commandant, and the result was the removal of the General to a safer place.

An anecdote is given by some of the German papers of the Chief Rabbi of the Polish Jews, of which it may certainly be said, se non è vero è ben trovato. The Grand Duke Constantine asked the Rabbi how it was that the Jews did not give their aid to the Government of the Czar, who had been a father to them—Alexander II. has relieved the Jews of the degrading inferiority which, as well under the old Polish system as under the Russian rule, has attached to them.—"True, your Royal Highness," replied the Rabbi, "the Czar Alexander is our father; but Poland is our mother; and if the father beats the mother the children always take the mother's part."

There is great agitation in Posen, and, indeed, in Prussian Poland generally. In spite of the vigilant watch of the frontiers large parties of sympathizers join the insurgents, and supplies of arms and provisions are carried to them. In fact, a frontier of 500 miles can hardly be guarded when the population on both sides is hostile to the guards. The Prussian Government is, therefore, compelled to adopt very severe measures to prevent the emigration, and indeed to prevent an outbreak in Posen itself. According to the Prussian semi-official journal, the police seized in the palace of Count Dziulinski the plan of an intended revolution in Posen. The Count, who is one of the members for Posen in the Prussian Parliament, escaped and has joined the insurgents. The Prussian Government has a very difficult part to play in its Polish provinces; it has to deal with a mixed population of Germans and Poles, and the measures which may be absolutely necessary to keep the Poles in order cannot fail to affect and irritate the Germans, who are conscious of their own loyalty.

A Committee of the Prussian House of Deputies has unanimously adopted a resolution, declaring the cartel Convention of the 8th of May, 1857, invalid, inasmuch as it was entered into without the assent of the Landtag, as required—according to the Committee—by the Constitution. The Committee would, no doubt, have declared the Convention of the 8th of February of this year equally invalid; but at present, it has no certain knowledge of the terms of that agreement. The resolution, of which Herr von Ronne, formerly Prussian Ambassador at Washington, was the author, will doubtless be adopted by the House, and be completely disregarded by the Ministry. The reply given on Monday by Count von Eulenbergh, Minister of the Interior, to a question of Von Carlowitz shows how the convention works. Russian troops, defeated by the insurgents, took refuge on Prussian territory, and were billeted on the inhabitants. They were not disarmed, inasmuch as the law did not require it, and there was nothing extraordinary, according to the Minister, in the whole proceeding.

The Swedish Diet has passed resolutions, expressing sympathy with Poland, and confidence in the Swedish Government. Two of the four Chambers—those of the nobles and clergy—expressed the hope that the Government, whilst doing all in its power for Poland, would have regard to the maintenance of peace; but the citizens and peasants made no reference to peace, and left everything to the Government. In the debate Count Manderstrom, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, announced that the Government had twice appealed to the Russian Government on behalf of Poland. The Nord announces that the relations between the Cabinets of Stockholm and St. Petersburg are most satisfactory. The source is a somewhat tainted one, but, in the main, the statement is probably correct. Sweden will not commit herself to a hostile position towards Russia until well assured that hostilities are intended by France.

The approaching elections to the Corps Legislatif continue to divide with Poland the interest of Frenchmen, and the nearer the event approaches—La France assigns the 31st of May to it—the greater, we regret to say, is the bitterness of feeling evinced on both sides.

The Moniteur publishes a notice which is calculated to seriously embarrass the opposition candidates. It says: Several journals announce that the representatives of the sub-electoral committees will shortly assemble in order to elect a central committee.

The Government reminds the public that the law forbids associations of more than twenty persons meeting without the consent of the public authorities, even should those associations be subdivided into sections comprising a less number; and further, that the journals would expose themselves to legal penalties, if they published the resolutions or manifestoes of such associations.

The "opposition," however, is not disposed to accept these threats of the Moniteur as law. An opinion has been published, signed by M. Dufaure and many other eminent lawyers, declaring that the articles of the law cited by the Moniteur do not apply to election meetings. The Government will, therefore, in all probability, be defied, and compelled to maintain its opinion in the law courts. M. de Montalembert is one of the "Independent" candidates; his device is "political and religious liberty." Indeed, a Belgian newspaper announces that the Committees have already met, and have not been molested by the police.

Father Passaglia—the well-known Jesuit, author who may term him of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, the great achievement in a religious sense of the Pontificate of Pio Nono, and at the same time the chief rebel against the Papal authority—has brought a bill into the Italian Chamber of Deputies, of which he has lately been elected a member, to compel all priests to take an oath of allegiance to the civil power, and has been refuted in the name of liberty by Pisanelli, the Minister of Justice. Passaglia is on the wrong track. Penalties will not produce the reformation which he desires.

King Victor Emmanuel has returned to Turin. Whilst in Tuscany he visited Ricasoli, and the rumour has spread of a return to power of the proud Florentine patriot, whose unbending integrity and independence were found by the King so much in the way of his menus plaisirs. There may be some foundation for the report, especially if the statement that the King has contracted a morganatic marriage with a lady who has long reigned sovereign over his heart be correct. For years the pleasure-loving King, whose curious fortune it is to be elevated, in spite of all the protests of his life to the contrary, to the title of re galantuomo, has been anxious to marry this favourite mistress, but his Ministers, Cavour, Ricasoli, and even Rattazzi have prevented him. The present Government possessing no man of influence have had to yield. In that case, as the mischief is done, and the King has attained his end, Ricasoli may, perhaps, return to power.

Farini, whose case was considered hopeless, has revived. When the Italian Parliament passed the bill granting him a pension, it was assumed that he would not live to enjoy it. Now, there seems to be some chance of his recovery. It is proverbial that there is no elixir vite like an annuity.

The acceptance of the throne of Greece by Prince William cannot yet be announced. The Dagbladet declares the statement of the Berlingske Tidende, that the difficulties had been removed, incorrect, and asserts that there is a difference of opinion upon the subject between the King of Denmark and Prince Christian. The Moniteur, however, announces that the representatives of the protecting Powers will assemble in Conference at London on the 25th of May. Some foreign journals assert that the Conference has already commenced, and we may therefore assume that the English Government, which has summoned the meeting, has good reasons to believe that it can propose a king for its confirmation. We shall believe in the kingship of king George I. when we hear that he has been crowned at Athens—which, by the way, seems to sadly need a King, or some stable government. The latest telegrams report that everything was at sixes-and-sevens; the Ministers were resigning, whilst an agitation was being got up against the election of any king.

The Sultan has returned to Constantinople, and the city has been illuminated in honour of the event. A budget, showing very favourable features, is to be published, to smoothe the way for another loan. The Turkish Ministers really take too much trouble. English and French capitalists are only too happy to lend their money to the Sultan, whether his purpose be to build barracks or replenish his harem; and if any doubts should present themselves, Mr. Layard is at hand to dispel them.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, APRIL 30.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

In a voice almost inaudible—Lord Russell was understood to say:—As the question of the Peterhoff and the detention of Her Majesty's mails was recently the subject of discussion in this House, it may be convenient to your lordships that I should state the substance of the information I have received this day from Lord Lyons. In his despatches Lord Lyons states that in answer to his application with respect to the Peterhoff and the mail-bags, Mr. Seward informed him that the Executive Committee of America had decided not to release the vessel, but to send her before the Prize Court. As for the mails, the American Government had determined, in conformity with the letter of the 31st of October, to send them to their destination; and the same procedure is to be adopted in all similar cases. Mr. Seward also expressed the hope that some satisfactory arrangement might be arrived at between the two Governments. The law of nations, he said, did not lay down any precise or clear rule with respect to the practice, which is somewhat novel, of sending so many mail-bags by private ships, and, therefore, he wished to make a communication to Her Majesty's Government on the subject. He did not state what the nature of the communication would be, and, of course, it will be matter for subsequent consideration.—Shortly afterwards his lordship moved the second reading of a bill, sent up from the Commons, to combine and amend the law against bribery in Parliamentary elections.—Lord Lyveden (formerly Mr. Vernon Smith) objected to the clause which throws the cost of a Commission of Inquiry upon the Constituency in which bribery is alleged to have occurred.—Earl Grey supported the objection; and further stated his general disbelief in the possibility of putting down bribery by measures of this sort so long as it was not severely condemned by public opinion.—Earl Russell recommended that discussion of the clauses should be postponed till the bill went into Committee, and it was accordingly read a second time.

The Earl of Hardwicke questioned the Government concerning the construction of the promised fort at Spithead, saying that forts had in all times had the advantage over ships, and that the recent occurrences at Charleston showed that modern science had not altered that relation.—The Duke of Somerset explained that Parliament had not yet voted the funds required for the construction of the forts; but a sum of money would, before long, be asked for on that account. In regard to what had occurred at Charleston it was a curious thing that if the American Government had intended to carry out an experiment for our benefit in connexion with this subject they could not have done anything more to the point. The distance between our forts on the mainland and the sand-bank was exactly two thousand yards, and measuring on the charts the distance between Fort Sumter and Fort Moultrie it would be found to be two thousand yards also. In both cases there was a strong current, and in both cases certain facilities in approaching. In both cases the same means of obstructing the attack by means of fishing nets and other similar contrivances were talked of. Therefore, if we had asked them to try the experiment they could not have selected a place more suitable than Charleston for that purpose. With regard to the vessels employed in the attack it might be remembered that fourteen months ago we were told that they had built the Monitor by way of warning to the British Admiralty. It certainly was a great warning, for the first moment she met with a gale she went to the bottom. (Hear, hear.) They built more Monitors, and had they built them more strongly and of a better class we should have had a more interesting experiment, and should have known better what iron-plated vessels could do against forts. The experiment, therefore, was not quite satisfactory. We did not know exactly the sort of guns that were used—a very important thing in forming an opinion upon that experiment. It was quite clear, however, that those vessels were completely defeated, and that another Monitor was sunk. So far it had been very decidedly in favour of the forts.—The Earl of Derby said he understood the noble Duke to say that the circumstances at Charleston and Spithead were precisely similar, and to speak of the distance as 2,000 yards. But he (the Earl of Derby) thought the injury which had been inflicted on the iron-plated vessels was inflicted after they entered the harbour at a distance from the forts, varying from 300 to 500 yards. That was an important element in considering the subject.—The Duke of Somerset said as far as the charts went, and as far as he could make out, the vessels at the nearest point must have been very nearly 600 yards from Fort Sumter, and the other forts must have been at a much greater distance. When he spoke of 2,000 yards he meant the distance from one fort to another.—Earl Grey said he believed the iron-plated ships employed at Charleston were by all accounts inferior vessels, and yet they so far protected the men that scarcely any one on board was injured by the tremendous fire. Was not that the case? Was it not true that Charleston was six or seven miles from the place where the action took place; and, if the iron-plated vessels had been at Portsmouth instead of Charleston, would they not have been quite within range of the dockyard, so as to shell it while allowing the forts to play on them?—The Duke of Somerset said he did not know exactly the amount of damage that had been done. His impression was that the ships were too far from the town to enable them to do much harm. Any one who looked at the chart would see that the town was six or seven miles distant. The position of the ships with regard to the forts would, he thought, make it very disagreeable for any vessels to have stayed to shell the town.

The subject dropped, and the House adjourned a little before six.

THURSDAY, APRIL 30.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. W. Forster inquired if the rumour were true that the Foreign Office had that afternoon received a satisfactory despatch from America relative to the seizure of mail-bags.—Mr. Layard had the pleasure of being able to state that by a despatch from Lord Lyons the Government were informed that the mail-bags taken from the Peterhoff had been ordered by the Government of the United States to be forwarded to their destination without being opened. (The announcement was received with cheers from all parts of the House.)

On the order for reading the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill a second time, Lord R. Cecil directed attention to the fact that the third section of the bill imposed a new charge upon the people in the shape of an income tax upon charities, and that such proposal had not been referred to a committee of the whole House as the custom and order of the House required.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer, alluding to the observations of Lord R. Cecil, said that the income upon which St. Bartholomew's Hospital would be taxed was £36,000 a year, and that the sum it would have to pay was about £700 a year more than at present. He denied that in the course he had adopted he was departing from the custom and order of the House and the general form of proceeding. The ground upon which the Government were prepared to stand in regard to the proposals to which objections had been urged was simply the ground of justice. If they were just to the community at large let the House adopt them; if they were not just let them be rejected. The right hon. gentleman also went into a variety of explanations relative to the operation of the income tax upon the several interests concerned.

FRIDAY, MAY 1.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The Speaker took the chair at a quarter to four. At four o'clock, there not being forty members present, he declared the House adjourned.

MONDAY, MAY 4.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The Princess of Wales, with the ladies in attendance upon her, took their places in the glazed apartment called the Ladies' Gallery, immediately behind and above the reporters. H. R. H. the Prince of Wales, with Lord Alfred Paget, took his seat in the diplomatic gallery opposite.

Lord R. Montagu called the attention of the House to the fact that no House had been made on Friday. There were 37 members inside; there were upwards of 50 in the lobby; but by "gentle pressure" Ministers prevented their coming in, and the House was counted out. Some other members held similar language. Lord Palmerston denied that the Ministry had done anything to prevent members coming in, and promised that the thing should not recur.—Mr. Disraeli expressed a hope that Ministers would, in future, observe the understanding which they had admitted to exist; and the subject dropped.

The Speaker then left the chair; and the House went into Committee on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill.

On the third and fourth clauses, imposing the income tax on charities, Mr. Gladstone rose to make the explanatory statement he had promised. After referring in no very respectful terms to the great deputation which had waited upon him that afternoon, he proceeded to remark that he did not propose to tax subscriptions to charities, but merely charitable endowments. Now, nineteen-twentieths of our charitable endowments were provided by death-bed bequests, which could not properly be called charity. There was no charity in giving away what a man could no longer keep. Death-bed bequests to charitable uses were made from a variety of unworthy motives; from ostentation, from a morbid desire of posthumous notoriety, or from hatred to a man's relatives. Such bequests should not be encouraged by the State, as they were now encouraged, by an exemption from taxation, which amounted to a virtual gift of public money. No one would dare formally to propose such a gift. A vast multitude of the institutions which the law considered as charities were entitled to no favour whatever. There were the local charities—of which he cited several instances—which pauperised and demoralized the neighbourhood for whose benefit they were intended, attracting the idle and dissipated from the neighbouring localities, that they might have a share in the doles. There were other charities like the Clergy Orphan Society, which were generally beneficial—but the classes whom these were intended to relieve had benefited too much by the commercial and fiscal legislation of late years that they need not complain of the very light taxation he proposed to inflict upon them. He applied the same reasoning to the great London Hospitals, which he admitted to be the best of all charities. Finally, he declared that he considered the measure just and salutary, and that it would have approved itself, as it had approved itself to his other colleagues, to him whom they had recently lost.

Qui fuit in Teucris et servatissimus equi.

Sir Stafford Northcote said that if Mr. Gladstone's inventive against large classes of charities proved anything, it proved not that their incomes should be taxed, but that they should be confiscated. He denied altogether that an exemption from a tax was equivalent to a grant of public money. Mr. Gladstone seemed to think that if he met a man with £100, and took from him by taxation only £5, he had made him a present of £95. He went into a multitude of details to prove the extremely unfair and oppressive character of the measure, and strongly counselled its withdrawal.—The Chairman having put the question,—The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose and said it was not his intention to take the sense of the Committee upon the clause.—The remaining clauses, with a few alterations, were then passed.—Some further business was transacted, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 5.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

No discussion of public interest took place.

TUESDAY, MAY 5.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to Colonel Sykes, Lord C. Paget said that strict orders had been issued that no officer of her Majesty's ships should, under any circumstances, be employed beyond the thirty mile radius from any treaty port in China.

Colonel Dunne inquired what steps had been taken to obtain redress for the cruelties inflicted by the Peruvian Government on Captain White Nutville, a British subject.—Mr. Layard replied that there was no doubt Captain White Nutville had been treated with great brutality, and that the course adopted in the Peruvian courts of justice had been a disgrace to them. The law officers of the Crown having taken the matter into their consideration, had recommended that the sum of £4,500 be demanded as compensation for the injuries this gentleman had sustained; but it appeared that he was not satisfied with this amount, and had sent in a claim for £292,104 to the Foreign Office. The Government had made an offer to submit the matter to arbitration, and it was to be hoped that a result would be arrived at which would be satisfactory to him and his friends.

Mr. Walter moved two resolutions to the effect that the sums voted by Parliament for education ought to be applicable to all poorer schools, not private schools, or carried on for profit, in which the attendance and examination exhibit the results required under the revised code; and that to require the employment of certificated or of pupil-teachers by school managers as indispensable to their participation in the capitation grant is inexpedient, and unjust to the managers of such schools. Stated in few words, the proposition of the hon. member was in substance to extend the grant of 8s. to all children in the schools referred to in his motion who should pass an examination to the satisfaction of the inspectors.—The motion was seconded by Mr. Buxton.—Mr. Lowe said he did not intend to raise any objection to the proposal on the ground of the vested rights of the certificated teachers, but because he believed that if it were agreed to the whole system of national education would degenerate into a mere scramble for public money. He argued that the Government ought not to make a grant to any school where it had not tested the capacity and qualifications of the teacher, and that the advantage of supplying schools with efficient teachers was proved by the experience of the ten years during which the practice had been followed. Moreover, the new revised code was as yet untried; and the employment of uncertificated, that was unknown, teachers would be a premium upon ignorance, and an injustice at once to the public and to the children themselves. In conclusion, the right hon. gentleman called upon the House to give the educational department a period of rest and tranquillity; to wait and see the result of the changes already made, and not to unsettle the minds of men upon this important question.—Mr. Dutton supported the motion.—Mr. F. Powell opposed it, but admitted that the standard of education would have to be lowered.—Mr. Salt, as the manager of a school, was prepared notwithstanding the specious arguments of Mr. Walter, to give the revised code a fair trial, and not to hamper the Government in dealing with that which at present was an experimental system.—Mr. Adderley also contended that the existing system should be adhered to, and that no school which did not submit to the three tests now in force, namely, the elementary instruction test, the inspection test, and the test of certified tutorship, ought to receive aid in the shape of a grant of public money. He objected to the motion that it would abolish altogether the two latter tests, and open the Treasury to all schools on the single test of their giving elementary education. It would be the introduction of an exception, and any such exception in the distribution of public grants would prove most mischievous. The right hon. gentleman moved as an amendment that the votes for education ought to be made applicable to schools only of the working classes, but to all of them alike, in the way of proportionate aid to voluntary support, subject to the favourable report of the inspector, and to tests of at least elementary instruction being given in them by teachers in all respects qualified. The amendment was seconded by Mr. Cochrane.—Mr. Henley declared his intention to vote for the motion, believing it to be a simple act of justice that the districts in which the poorer class of schools existed, and which had for the last sixteen or seventeen years contributed their quota to the education grant without complaining, should be allowed to participate in the advantages of that grant. After some observations from Mr. Fuller, Sir M. Farquhar, and Mr. D. Griffith, and explanations by Mr. Walter and Mr. Lowe, the amendment of Mr. Adderley and the first resolution proposed by Mr. Walter were withdrawn. The House then divided on the second resolution, which was negatived by 152 to 117.

Mr. E. P. Bouvier moved for a committee of the whole House upon that portion of the Act of Uniformity which required deans, canons, and prebendaries of chapters, professors and masters of colleges, and others to make a declaration of conformity to the Liturgy of the Church of England. (Measures relating to religion, trade, or finance must be dealt with first in Committee of the whole House.) His object was to propose a resolution on which to found a bill for the repeal of that requirement in the case of fellowships, and he asked the House to concur in his motion at the instance of the resident fellows of the University of Cambridge.—Mr. Walpole urged as objections to the proposal of Mr. Bouverie that if it were sanctioned by Parliament the government of the colleges and their endowments might be acquired by those who were not members of the Church of England. Already the Legislature had on two occasions in recent years determined that for the purposes of education the universities should be opened, but that the government of the colleges and the right of receiving endowments ought to be confined to those who professed the religion of the founders; and he hoped the House would not now depart from that principle.—Lord Stanley supported the motion, which he observed not only recognised, but extended the right of self-government on the part of the colleges. It was not likely that the larger colleges would make any change in their regulations for a considerable time, but cases might arise in which men of great ability and eminence would be unable to subscribe the declaration required of them, and it might be very desirable that the smaller colleges should have the power of making an alteration.—Mr. G. Duff supported the motion, which was opposed by Lord R. Cecil, who declared that its effect would be to reduce the discipline and theology of the English universities to the level of that of the universities of Germany.—Lord Palmerston gave his support to the motion, reserving to himself the right of dealing with the proposed bill as might hereafter appear to him expedient. He added that there was a fundamental distinction between admitting persons to the educational advantage of a university and admitting them to form a part of the governing body.—Mr. Bouverie said the bill was intended to deal only with fellowships—not headships.—On a division the motion for going into committee was carried by 157 to 135. The House then went into committee, and leave was given to bring in a bill.

The other business was also disposed of, and the House adjourned at two o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 6.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Newdegate moved the second reading of the compromise measure of which he had given notice—a Bill for the Commutation of Church rates. It was opposed by the Dissenting faction, and numbers of the Conservatives walked out of the House to avoid the vote. It was therefore lost—56 to 94. A Bill, of which the second reading was moved by Mr. Alcock, to permit the redemption of Church rates, was lost by 72 to 81.

The Bill for flogging garroters was considered in committee, and several divisions took place, in all of which the opponents of the measure were beaten by great majorities. The bill passed through committee, and the House soon afterwards adjourned.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, May 6, 1863.

Our last report closed on a very stagnant market, with much pressure to sell: Fair Dholleras 17½d.

On Thursday, the lowering of the Bank rate to 3 per cent. produced a more cheerful feeling; the sales reached 5,000 bales, and Egyptian, which had been forced off at very low prices the previous day, improved ½d. per lb.

On Friday a more hopeful view was taken of the relations at present existing between this country and the Northern States, and the conviction became stronger that danger of a rupture had passed for the present. Our market accordingly began again to show tokens of life, and the sales reached 7,000 bales, at hardening prices.

On Saturday, with an excellent trade demand, the business reached 10,000 bales, at ½d. advance, and on Monday, with a little excitement, all classes again buying very freely, the sales were run up to 15,000 bales at higher prices.

Yesterday and to-day the demand has continued on a liberal scale, the sales each day 10,000 bales, at steady prices. The nature and extent of the business done in Manchester yesterday was, however, sufficient to prevent a further rise here, and we close steady, at ½d. to ¾d. advance on the depressed sales of last week, except Egyptian, which are 1½d. dearer. We quote Middling Orleans, 22d.; Fair Egyptian, 21½d.; Fair Dhollera and Omrawatte, 17½d. to 17¾d.

In cotton to arrive, a considerable business has been done, and 17½d. has been paid for April and May Dhollera and Omrawattees.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, May 5, 1863.

Business has been a little more cheerful, and of a more satisfactory character during the past week than has been the case during the two previous weeks. The Indian demand continues to increase for cloth more especially, and, as a consequence, more manufacturers are commencing work again and to order.

Home trade yarns have been in steady demand, and those qualities suitable for the manufacture of India shirtings, jaconets, and mulls, have been most in request.

There is no alteration to quote in the prices of Nos. 40s, 50s, and 60s mule for India shipment, spinners being well under contract, and delivering from day to day, as the yarn comes off the spindles.

For cloth there has also been a steady demand, and where such makes as 5½s, 6½s, and 7½s. shirting, also Jaconets and Mulls could be met with in stock, extreme prices were offered.

To-day there has been a good demand for all kinds of Indian fabrics, and an advance of 3d. per piece has been obtained for the lighter makes of India shirtings. 39 in. and 44 in. Jaconets have realized an advance of 1½d. per piece, whilst 44 in. green end Mulls have fetched 3d. per piece advance on last week's quotations.

Madapollams are inquired for, and orders are placed with manufacturers to make at 2s. 3d. per lb., a price that will just about pay.

T-cloths and some particular description of printers are also being bought up in small quantities at full rates.

Home trade yarns, from Nos. 32s to 60s twist and pincoys, have been sold at an advance of ½d. per lb. on last Friday's quotations; but, as many spinners held out for a greater advance, not quite so much business has resulted as might have, had their pretensions been not quite so extreme.

The Continental shippers continue to buy small quantities of water twist, in Nos. 16s to 24s bundles; throstle warps, from 24s to 28s; also No. 30s pincoys in casks; but in most cases their clients still limit them in price to such a degree, that it is difficult for them to place the orders in hand.

SOUTHERN WAR NEWS.

MOBILE, March 21.—The schooner Relief, from Havana, grounded on the South shore, under the guns of Fort Morgan, on Saturday last. Her cargo will be saved.

VICKSBURG, March 25.—At 5 o'clock this morning four boats were seen advancing towards the upper batteries. A vigorous fire was opened upon them, driving back two, when the other two passed under a raking fire, almost every shot taking effect. One received a shot in the steam chest, compelling the crew to desert her; in fifteen minutes she filled and sank. Part of her crew escaped to the opposite shore. The boat that escaped is supposed to be the Benton. She was badly disabled—one shot penetrating her steam-drum and disabling her so badly that the Albatross came up to tow her out of danger of our gunboats.

PANOLA, March 24.—A copy of the Memphis Bulletin has been received. Louisville is to be fortified, and the citizens sympathising with the Confederacy paroled.

The steamer Hetty Gilmore and crew was captured by the Confederates on Green river. The Confederates had occupied Oretion, Kentucky.

A despatch states that Fort Pemberton cannot be attacked by infantry. The Confederate force is estimated at 6,000. It is stated that if the fort was once passed, no danger is apprehended between there and Yazoo City. The next news, it was supposed, would be flattering.

The sale of fire-arms has been prohibited in Indianapolis.

Five small boats have arrived in the Cold Water with reinforcements. The position of the enemy is unknown. The Mississippi is falling at Memphis. The Appeal says the intelligence that the enemy has appeared again in front of Fort Pemberton is confirmed. On Monday afternoon firing took place; the result is unknown.

CHATTANOOGA, March 26.—Passengers from Wartrace report that the enemy has burned the railroad and turnpike bridges across the Tennessee River, three and a-half miles this side of Murfreesboro'. It is now evident the enemy intends making a flank movement, extending his line from Columbia towards the Tennessee River.

CHATTANOOGA, March 27.—The Daily Rebel has received the following despatch:—"Columbia, Tennessee, March 26.—General Forrest captured yesterday at Brentwood, nine miles in the rear of Franklin, 800 prisoners, arms, ammunition, &c., destroying a large house filled with commissary stores, burnt the railroad bridge, tore up the track, and captured seventeen loaded wagons."

The official report of General Morgan of his late fight states that it lasted six hours, and that he drove the enemy two miles. The enemy were afterwards heavily reinforced and held their position. General Morgan says his loss in officers was heavy.

A special to the Register from Wartrace, March 27, says: "Daily skirmishing takes place on the Shelbyville turnpike between the enemy's videttes, four and a-half miles from Murfreesboro', and our pickets at Stone's River. It is believed that the enemy is moving a heavy force on our left flank in the direction of Columbia. His object is doubtless to form a junction with Grant, and cause the Confederates to fall back to Bridgeport."

The enemy are devastating the country, burning fences, killing stock, forcing off negroes, and stealing generally.

RICHMOND, March 28.—The following official despatch was received by the War Department this morning:

TULLAHOMA, Tennessee, March 27.—To General S. Cooper:—General Van Dorn reports that General Forrest made a successful visit to Brentwood with his division, burnt the bridge, destroyed and took all the property and arms, and captured 800 prisoners, including thirty-five officers. He lost three killed and five wounded. (Signed) BRAXTON BRAGG.

M'INNIVILLE, March 28.—Captain Lawrence Jones, of General Morgan's command, last week crossed the Cumberland river, and captured a train of cars near Bowling Green, Kentucky, with a large number of Federal officers. He also succeeded in getting $25,000 in funds.

MOBILE, March 28.—Despatches from Ponchatula, the 28th, state that our forces fell back on the 26th, and the enemy entered the town. On the 27th we drove them out three miles. The Yankees burnt the depot, and fired several houses. The flames were extinguished to-day. Our pickets are drawn in, and a fight is imminent.

A special despatch to the Appeal, from Panola, the 26th, says that a gentleman just from Memphis brings information of the permanent occupation of North-Western Mississippi, and the erection of fortifications at Hernando has been determined upon by the enemy. They are repairing the railroad, and their purpose may be considered fixed. Fifteen boats, carrying reinforcements, met the retreating fleet in the Tallahatchie River, near Leopolis, when both fleets together descended the river. The reinforcing boats have ambulances, field artillery, and other appliances, indicating a purpose to attempt land operations. One gunboat is at the mouth of the Coldwater, repairing damages. The weather is becoming settled.

Major Blythe has just sent in a batch of prisoners. MOBILE, March 30.—Advices from Okalona say the enemy are marching south in Tennessee, devastating farms—their supposed aim to be on Northern Alabama.

PANOLA, MISSISSIPPI, March 30.—Hurst's Yankee cavalry continue their depredations near Ripley, Mississippi. The report of the burning of a portion of the town has been confirmed.

VICKSBURG, April 2.—The enemy made a reconnaissance up the Yazoo River yesterday, and threw a few shells at Snyder's Bluff.

There is nothing in sight below.

In the storm of Saturday night last, March 29th, the steamer Vicksburg, lying at the Vicksburg landing, broke from her moorings, and fell into the hands of the enemy. The Vicksburg was one of the finest boats on the river, although her machinery had been taken out, and she will consequently be of but little use to the Yankees.

It is reported that the disabled Yankee boat Monarch, which passed our batteries and got below, had up steam yesterday, but nothing certain is known, though it is believed that the enemy is trying to work in behind the levee. She unfortunately happens to lie beyond the reach of our guns.

CHATTANOOGA, April 4.—Nothing additional has been received from the front this evening. Skirmishers with the enemy's pickets are of daily occurrence, but a general engagement is not considered imminent. The enemy's freight train ran off the track near Cumberland Mountain, on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, to-day. No lives were lost. Bob Johnson, son of Andrew Johnson, is reported captured by our cavalry.

PORT HUDSON, April 4.—Banks's army has fallen back. One division is at Bat in Rouge; the rest have gone down the river.

Chicago dates of the 27th state that great consternation prevails in Kentucky, in consequence of the reported advance of the Confederates on Lexington, Kentucky. Troops were reaching Cincinnati freely. Burnside is commanding, but is too sick to take the field.

SENATORIA, April 4.—Richardson's guerrillas fought a regiment of Yankees at Summerville, killing and wounding eighty. Five thousand troops were shipped from Memphis, ostensibly to Vicksburg. After nightfall, however, they went North.

VICKSBURG, April 4.—Everything is quiet to-day; but few boats are in sight. There is nothing new from Yazoo. A flag of truce was sent down to-day by the enemy. Its mission has not yet been published.

CHATTANOOGA, April 5.—The enemy's column of 15,000, that was approaching M'Innville, has fallen back; our troops having outflanked them. Another column of the enemy is reported approaching Columbia. Our sick and baggage have been ordered to the rear, preparatory for a battle. A battle is considered imminent before the week closes.

RICHMOND, April 5.—Captain Mosby, with fifty men, was attacked by 150 Yankees at Dranesville, Virginia, on the 1st of April. Captain Mosby's first fire brought down some thirty of the enemy. The rest fled. Mosby pursued and captured seventy-nine, who arrived here last evening. They belong to the 1st Vermont Cavalry.

CHATTANOOGA, April 6.—General John H. Morgan was attacked by the Federals at Liberty, on Friday, and driven back to Snow's Hill, where he held his position and the enemy retired. Our troops, under Colonel Smith, were repulsed at Woodbury, on Saturday, and fell back to within twelve miles of M'Innville, with a loss of one killed and eight wounded.

KNOXVILLE, April 6.—Parties from Kentucky report that Pegram's command was attacked two miles beyond Somerset, on Monday, 23d ult., by an overwhelming force of infantry and cavalry. After a desperate hand-to-hand fight Pegram fell back six miles, the enemy not pursuing. The Confederate Government agents brought out a large lot of cattle.

JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI, April 6.—General Chalmers, on Friday last, drove the enemy's pickets within five miles of Memphis, killing two and capturing one.

FORT PEMBERTON, April 5.—The enemy commenced embarking last night, and this morning are in rapid retreat. We shelled their camps and transports, and made a reconnaissance in force from the left flank, alarming them much. We also fired into a transport crowded with troops, and disabled the boat.

SENATORIA, MISSISSIPPI, April 6.—The enemy was out in strong force yesterday, but all have gone back.

New Orleans reports of the 1st inst. say that Banks crossed with ten thousand men at Donaldsonville, and has gone down Bayou Plaquemine to reinforce Weitzel in an attack on the Tchec country.

OKALONA, MISSISSIPPI, April 6.—The Yankees at Corinth are preparing for a movement of some kind, either a raid or an evacuation. Sutlers are selling their entire stock to Southern men and leaving.

YANKEE GUNBOATS REPULSED ON THE TENNESSEE.

CHATTANOOGA, April 2.—The Yankee gunboats on the Tennessee River have been driven back by our sharpshooters. Two iron-clads endeavoured to land at Tusculum this morning at daylight, and were attacked by our cavalry outposts. Heavy cannonading ensued, but it was ineffectual, and the effort to land the party was unsuccessful. The iron-clads then backed down the river and retired.

No battle in front. Heavy skirmishing at Unionville to-day. Passengers by the afternoon train report the capture of several wagons and prisoners on Wednesday.

Seven hundred and fifty-two prisoners, captured by Forrest at Brentwood, reached here this evening.

CHATTANOOGA, April 3, 5 P.M.—Major Dick M'Cann, with 100 men, attacked a Federal train on the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad, within nine miles of Nashville, and killed forty-two, and wounded sixty-seven of the enemy. The loss on our side was one killed and three wounded. The party also captured a number of wagons, &c., and returned in safety.

CAPTURE OF THE YANKEE GUNBOAT DIANA.

RICHMOND, April 4.—The following official despatch was received here this morning:—

Head-quarters near Berwick Bay,

March 28th, via Natchez, April 31st.

To General Cooper,—I have the honour to report the capture of the Federal gunboat Diana, at this point, to-day. She mounts five heavy guns. The boat is not seriously injured, and will be immediately put in service. The enemy's loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners, is 150.

(Signed) R. TAYLOR, Brigadier-General.

GENERAL BEAUREGARD'S ORDERS BEFORE THE BATTLE.

Head-quarters Department of South Carolina, Georgia and Florida.

Charleston, South Carolina, April 5.

General Orders, No. 53.

I. Field and company officers are specially enjoined to instruct their men, under all circumstances, to fire with deliberation at the feet of the enemy; they will thus avoid over-shooting, and besides, wounded men give more trouble to our adversary than his dead, as they have to be taken from the field.

II. Officers in command must be cool and collected, in action hold their men in hand, and caution them against useless, aimless firing. The men must be instructed and required each one to single out his mark. It was the deliberate sharp-shooting of our forefathers in the Revolution of 1776, and at New Orleans in 1815, which made them so formidable against the odds with which they were engaged.

III. In the beginning of a battle, except by troops deployed as skirmishers, the fire by file will be avoided; it excites the men, and renders their subsequent control difficult; fire by wing or company should be resorted to instead. During the battle the officers and non-commissioned officers must keep the men in the ranks, enforce obedience, and encourage and stimulate them if necessary.

IV. Soldiers must not be permitted to quit the ranks to strip or rob the dead, nor even to assist in removing our own dead, unless by special permission, which shall only be given when the action has been decided. The surest way to protect our wounded is to drive the enemy from the field; the most pressing, highest duty is to win the victory.

V. Before the battle, the quarter-master of the division will make all the necessary arrangements for the immediate transportation of the wounded from the field. After consultation with the medical officers, he will establish the Ambulance Depot in the rear, and give his assistants the necessary instructions for the efficient service of the ambulance waggon and other means of transportation.

VI. The ambulance depot, to which the wounded are to be carried or directed for immediate treatment, should be established at the most convenient building nearest the field of battle. A red flag marks the place and way to it.

VII. Before and immediately after the battle the roll of each company will be called, and absentees must strictly account for their absence from the ranks. To quit their standard on the battlefield, under fire, under the pretence of removing or aiding the wounded, will not be permitted; any one persisting in it will be shot on the spot, and whosoever shall be found to have quitted the field, or his regiment or company, without authority, will be regarded and proclaimed as a coward, and dealt with accordingly.

VIII. The active ambulances will follow the troops to succour the wounded, and to remove them to the depots. Before the engagement Infantry detachments will also be detailed and organised of three men (the least effective under arms,) from each Company, whose duties will be hereinafter prescribed.—These men must not loiter about the depots, but will return promptly to the field as soon as possible.

IX. The Infantry detachments will be under the immediate orders of the medical officers on the field. This corps is to go upon the field unarmed, except the non-commissioned officers, who are to protect the corps against stragglers and marauders. The members will be provided with one litter to every two men, and each with a badge by which he can be easily distinguished from the rest of the command; also with leather shoulder straps, a canteen of water, a tin cup, a haversack—containing one half pound of lint, twenty-four bandages, two long and two short splints of wood, sponges and tourniquets, and a pint bottle of alcoholic stimulants.

X. It shall be the duty of this corps, under the immediate direction of the Assistant-Surgeon of the Regiment, accompanied by the ambulances or waggons, to follow up promptly the action, administering to the immediate wants of the wounded, by giving stimulants, checking hemorrhage, and the temporary splinting of fractures.

XI. Those who are too much disabled to walk will be removed to some ambulance depots, previously agreed upon, where they will be left in charge of the Surgeon of the Regiment. The removal of the wounded from the field will devolve upon the Infantry Corps, and all men straggling from the ranks under pretext of aiding this corps will be summarily dealt with; to which end, the medical officers, in charge, and the non-commissioned officers are specially required to report to the regimental commanders of the stragglers—their names, and the company to which they may belong.

XII. The Assistant-Surgeon in charge of the Infantry Corps should provide himself with a pocket case, ligatures, needles, pins, chloroform, morphia, brandy or whisky, tourniquets, bandages, lint, and splints. To obviate the shock to the nervous system, to suppress hemorrhage, to put fractures in some temporary apparatus, so as to facilitate the removal of the wounded, should be his first care. This last is best accomplished by placing under the fractured limb a piece of old linen or cotton, of the form of a pocket-handkerchief, on the opposite and outer edges of this are placed the splints, which are rolled up in it, towards the limb, on each side, until the fracture is snugly supported in the intervening space; the whole to be secured by two or three bands of tape or of bandage.

XIII. The Regimental Surgeon should, before an action, satisfy himself, by personal inspection, that all the means and appliances for carrying the wounded are at hand; give instruction to the Infantry Corps as to the application of a tourniquet to restrain dangerous hemorrhage; establish depots for the wounded, under the supervision of the Medical Director, and render to the men of his regiment all necessary surgical aid—performing there all operations that are required; and he will be held responsible that he has at his disposition all the means, supplies, and appliances for the proper performance of the service enjoined, or has taken all proper measures to secure them. He will instruct all detailed to assist him; not to allow ambulances to be monopolized by wounded officers, to the exclusion of others. He will forbid any of the Infantry Corps to hold officers' horses on the field, or to do anything but what strictly appertains to their duty. The Surgeon should not devote himself exclusively to a wounded officer, nor leave his post to accompany him to the rear.

XIV. Wounds will be dressed and operations performed, as far as practicable, on the field, and patients made as comfortable as circumstances will admit, for transportation to hospitals in the interior.

XV. Surgeons will supply themselves with hospital flags, and will have them attached to their ambulances and placed conspicuously over the field infirmaries and hospitals.

XVI. As soon as possible after an action, Surgeons will transmit to the Medical Director a return of casualties.

XVII. The material for the badges and for the ambulance flags, prescribed in Paragraph VI. of this order, will be provided by the Quartermaster's Department.

By Command of General Beauregard.

THOMAS JORDAN,

Chief of Staff.

April 6.

SOUTHERN ACCOUNT OF THE BATTLE OF CHARLESTON.

(From the Charleston Courier, April 8.)

The day of trial for Charleston has at length arrived. The battle, so long threatened, was begun on Tuesday afternoon. The result of that conflict has increased the confidence felt in our ability to frustrate the devices of the foe, and protect our fair city from the pollution of his presence. As no mind was disquieted with apprehension by the boastful threats and formidable preparations of the enemy, so now, after the repulse of his first attempt, every heart is sanguine of complete and brilliant success.

We have so often been disappointed—the enemy has so often and persistently failed to redeem his promise concerning the nest of the rebellion—that the booming of the signal gun, and the announcement that the battle had actually begun, was a relief to the suspense under which our community had so long suffered. The cheerful manner in which the military had uniformly spoken of the conflict between our batteries and the turreted monsters, had emboldened the hearts of the people to such a degree that, when it was positively known that the engagement was opened, there came a thrill of joy to every heart, and the countenance of all declared plainly that a signal victory over the mailed vessels was reckoned upon without doubt or misgiving.

Information received from mysterious sources caused the General in command of this district to expect an attack at an early day. And that intelligence received confirmation on Sunday morning. On that day four Monitors, the Ironsides, and thirty vessels of various sizes, were seen off the bar. Four Monitors and thirty-five wooden vessels were added to the fleet on the following day; thirty-five vessels, for the most part transports, appeared in the Stono, and the enemy landed a force of about 6,000 men on Coles' and Battery Islands. These facts, with other indications, led General Beauregard to count upon an attack on Tuesday, and the expectations of that sagacious and watchful General were realised.

The atmosphere early on Tuesday morning was misty, but as the day advanced the haze lightened, and the Monitors and the Ironsides were seen lying off Morris' Island. Between two and three o'clock in the afternoon a despatch from Colonel Rhett, commandant of Fort Sumter, informed General Beauregard that five Monitors and the Ironsides were approaching the Fort. The fleet were seen rounding the point of Morris' Island, the Keokuk in the advance. When the double-turreted monster, the most formidable of its class, came within range, Fort Sumter opened upon her with a broadside. They kept on their way and formed in line of battle off the Fort, at a distance of about 2,000 yards.

At three p.m. the action was opened by Fort Moultrie firing the first gun. Fort Sumter opened ten minutes later. Battery Bee, Forts Wagner and Beauregard, and the Battery at Cummins' Point, also opened, firing by battery. The fleet fired with great rapidity; our forts and batteries replied with spirit and singular accuracy. The Ironsides took position to the left of Fort Sumter, directing all her guns at that fort, and throwing shells exclusively.

It was manifest that the Ironsides was appointed to test the strength of the fort, whose reduction was the inauguration of the terrific contest now going on. Fort Sumter acknowledged the compliment of the preference by pouring the contents of her biggest guns into the sides of that pride of the Yankee navy, and she was not treated with contempt by the other forts and batteries.

About forty-five minutes after the engagement began, steam was seen issuing, in dense volumes, from the Ironsides, and she withdrew from the action, taking position to the south of Fort Sumter, but remaining a silent spectator of the exciting scene. It is believed she was seriously damaged.

The firing from our forts became more and more accurate as the engagement proceeded. The shot and shell fell thickly in the midst of the hostile fleet, and the smoke stacks of every one of them were struck several times. Fort Sumter now appeared to be the chief aim of all the enemy's iron-clads.

The Keokuk, a double-turreted iron-clad, and considered by the Yankees the most formidable of their terrible monsters, received a large share of attention from our gallant gunners. She occupied the post of honour, and in accordance with the custom of war it was made the post of danger. She paid dearly for her reputation, having been hit several times. At about five o'clock she followed the example of the Ironsides, and withdrew, evidently seriously crippled.

The other Monitors continued the fight, till forty-five minutes past five o'clock, when they steamed away, and came to anchor off Morris' Island.

During the battle a drummer boy, named Ahrens, was killed at Fort Sumter, and five men wounded, two severely in the head, the others slightly. One man came to his death from the falling of the flag-staff of Fort Moultrie. Two houses on Sullivan's Island, on the back beach, were struck, one of which was demolished. A shot passed through Fort Sumter's flag.

Colonel Rhett was in command of Fort Sumter, Colonel Butler of Fort Moultrie, Captain Sitgraves of Fort Beauregard, Lieut.-Colonel Sinkins of Battery Bee, Major Huger of Battery Wagner, and Lieutenant Lesene, with a detachment from Fort Sumter, of the Battery on Cummins' Point.

Fort Sumter was hit thirty-four times, but received no damage.

We learn that six men belonging to Captain Mathews' Artillery Company, stationed at Battery Wagner, were wounded. Two of these have since died. Two were very seriously wounded, and it was thought one would die before morning. The other two, including an officer, were but slightly wounded.

The last gun was fired by the enemy at half-past five p.m. Three iron-clads, one supposed to be the Keokuk, were seen about six o'clock going South, apparently in tow of a large steamer. The others were all outside the bar. The Ironsides was struck in the stern by a rifled shot from Battery Wagner.

There were no casualties at Cummins' Point Battery.

The practice was admirable, and reflects great credit upon officers and men. All who took part in the battle performed their duties with ardour, skill, and fidelity. Their behaviour and the accuracy with which they used their guns, assure us that they are sufficient for the important work assigned them, and furnish us with strong grounds upon which to bottom our hope of a decisive and glorious victory. When they come again, and nearer, the iron-sheathed vessels will fare worse.

It is expected the enemy will renew the attack to-day.

(From the Charleston Mercury, April 8th.)

At last the long period of doubt and delay is at an end, and this goodly city, girdled with the fiery circle of its batteries, stands confronting the most formidable Armada that the hands of men have ever put afloat.

The first scene in the novel drama of the war, which we trust is to add new lustre to the fame of Charleston, has closed. Let us render thanks to the Lord of Hosts that the result thus far has been one of proud triumph to our country. As yet, however, we have but entered upon the ordeal. It will be for the next few days to tell the tale of our sad disaster or complete success.

In view of the reticence which (for reasons of military policy) have heretofore marked our allusions to the presence of the iron-clad fleet, a brief review of the events of the week will not be out of place. About noon on Sunday last the first intelligence was flashed to the city from Fort Sumter, that the turrets of the far-famed Monitor gunboats were looming up against the south-eastern horizon. During the afternoon the entire fleet hove in sight. Eight Monitors, besides the frigate Ironsides, and twenty-seven wooden war vessels took up their position just beyond the bar. As the news became bruited about the city very many of our non-combatant population (previously incredulous of danger) made hasty preparations to depart, and every train that has left the city has gone heavily laden with the eleventh hour refugees and their effects.

Sunday night passed quietly by. Monday morning brought us reports of the movements of transports on the Stono river, and the debarkation of a considerable force of Yankee troops on Coles' Island. But throughout Monday and Monday night the armoured fleet held its position beyond the bar. On Tuesday morning it was observed that another Monitor had arrived, making a force of no less than ten iron-clad vessels, including the Ironsides.

At 2 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, a despatch from Fort Sumter announced that these ten vessels had crossed the bar, and were cautiously steaming inward—the foremost one having at that time reached a point about 3,000 yards from the Fort. The next news was brought to us, an hour later, by the dull detonation of the first gun from Fort Moultrie, which was immediately answered by a heavy report and a cloud of white smoke from the turret of one of the Monitors. At ten minutes after 3, the enemy having come within range, Fort Sumter opened her batteries, and, almost simultaneously, the white smoke could be seen puffing from the low sand-hills of Morris and Sullivan's Islands, indicating that the Beauregard Battery on the left, and Battery Wagner on the extreme right, had become engaged. Five of the iron-clads, forming in line of battle in front of Fort Sumter, maintained a very rapid return fire, occasionally hurling their 15-inch shot and shell against Fort Moultrie and the minor batteries, but all directing their chief efforts against the east face of Fort Sumter. Gradually, but visibly, the distance between the attacking vessels and the Fort was lessened, and as the enemy drew nearer the firing became hot and almost continuous.

About half-past 4 o'clock the battle became fierce and general. The scene at that hour, as viewed from the battery promenade, was truly grand. Battery Bee had now mingled the hoarse thunder of its guns in the universal din, and the whole expanse of the harbour entrance, from Sullivan's Island to Cummings' Point, became enveloped in the smoke and constant flashes of the conflict. The iron-clads kept constantly shifting their position; but, whichever way they went, their ports, always turned towards the battlements of Sumter, poured forth their terrible projectiles against the walls of that famous stronghold. Ever and anon, as the huge shot went ricocheting towards the mark, the water was dashed up in vast sheets of spray, towering far above the parapet of the fort, while the wreaths of smoke constantly ascending from the barbette guns showed how actively the artillerymen of the post were discharging their duties. In the foreground our own staunch little iron-clads—the Palmetto State and Chicora—could be seen steaming energetically up and down their chosen fighting position, evidently impatient to participate in the fray.

Up to this time the frigate Ironsides had borne a very conspicuous part in the fight. Her long hull lay at the distance, apparently, of a mile from our batteries, and her tremendous broadsides were more than once fitly answered by broadsides from the fort. It soon became apparent that she was unable to stand the severe fire directed against her. Steaming rapidly southward she gave Fort Sumter a few parting shots and withdrew from the action. The Keokuk, a double-turreted Monitor, soon followed her example, and before five o'clock the fire had evidently begun to slacken. The remaining Monitors, however, still kept up the bombardment, and our forts and batteries replied with undiminished alacrity. At a quarter after five p.m. the Monitors began to retire, and at half-past five the enemy fired the last shot of the engagement.

Gratifying as were the general results of the fight, the late hour at which it closed precluded the possibility of our receiving the full details from the forts. A despatch from Fort Sumter informs us that the Ironsides and Keokuk were both very roughly handled and retired seriously injured. The Keokuk had her flag shot down, her boat shot away, three holes in her smokestack and a portion of her bow shot off. The practice of our gunners was most creditable. Nearly every shot struck some one of the iron-clads, but with what effect is not known. Fort Sumter was struck thirty-four times. One of our guns was dismounted, but otherwise the fort is in good condition. Fort Moultrie was uninjured. The casualties at Fort Sumter were a drummer boy, named Ahrens, mortally wounded, two men severely wounded, and three others slightly injured. At Fort Moultrie one man was accidentally hurt by a fall from the flagstaff, on which he was replacing our flag, which had been shot away. We learn that he afterwards died. Two small houses on the back beach of Sullivan's Island were demolished by the enemy's fire.

After their withdrawal from the action the enemy's iron-clads anchored off Morris Island, where they now lie. Many think that the fight will be renewed at daybreak this morning; but up to the time at which we write (3 a.m.) all is quiet. The reports we get from Stono river say that the enemy's transports still remain in the stream. Doubtless the Yankee generals intend, before venturing upon a land attack, to await the issue of the struggle between their ships and our batteries.

SOME OF THE BENEFITS OF THE WAR.

(From the Charleston Courier, April 3.)

Every heart breathes a fervent prayer for peace. The signs that furnish grounds for the hope that the night of our tribulation will shortly give place to the morning of joy, are scanned with eager and intent gaze. And so ardent is our desire for relief from the burden of woes under which we have been groaning through so many months, that we do not always take the pains to examine the nature of those acts and events that animate our hopes.

We are no longer subject to the annoyance arising from the expectation of receiving aid from any European Power. That expectation has been so often disappointed, and has mortified, angered and injured us to so great a degree that we are not moved by the most plausible reports concerning the action of foreign nations in regard to our Confederacy.

We are at last awake to the fact that we have to depend upon the means and instruments which Heaven has conferred upon us for the achievement of our independence. In the course of this conflict it has been demonstrated that, with the blessing of God, we are equal to the work in which we are engaged. Our sufficiency for the momentous undertaking has been shown to the satisfaction both of ourselves and of communities across the water, and our enemies have been forced to admit the indisputable fact.

The most pure, intelligent, unselfish and resolute patriot of us all would have rejoiced with exceeding great joy over the peaceable adjustment of our difficulties, or over the return of peace, a short time after hostilities broke out. This conflict has been accompanied with evils of dire magnitude. No war that ever crimsoned the soil with human blood produced more suffering, in so large an extent of territory, than has followed the march of this terrific contest. But it has not been without large benefits, which could only be attained through the instrumentality of precisely such a war as the one whose miseries we are now enduring—whose dangers we are now confronting.

Even at the present time, with the power of our foe undiminished, and his heart all on fire with devilish hatred, while he is developing with gigantic energy and unconquerable will, stupendous schemes whose successful accomplishment involves the infliction of more horrible calamities than any we have yet been called upon to suffer, so manifest are some of the good fruits of this bloody struggle, that in spite of grievous hardships, trying sacrifices, heavy losses, overwhelming sorrows, we do not regret that the war has not come to an end.

It was necessary that we should make good our claim to the high position among national powers our character, our abilities, the race we belong to, and the mission we, as a people, are ordained to fulfil, entitle us to occupy. We have vindicated that right, and although we have not been formally admitted into the family of nations, the most mighty States feel that we are a power that they must some day recognise and respect. When those nations do extend the right hand of fellowship to the Southern Confederacy the occasion will not be marred by any feeling of obligation, and we shall have the proud satisfaction of knowing that we are a member of the family of nations not by suzerainty, or by privilege, but that we raised ourselves to that place of dignity and honour by our wisdom, valour, fortitude, and energy.

No other agency than the war in progress could have produced a final and complete separation from the United States. The simple establishment of another Government could never have accomplished that end. We should have been a distinct and independent Confederacy only in name. The yoke of bondage to the Yankee race would have remained unbroken. The enterprise which is moving on grandly to its consummation would have ended in a miserable failure, and we, who have won the praise and admiration of the world, should be objects of derision and contempt. The wickedness, baseness, and cruelty of our enemies, have caused us to loath and abhor them, and we would rather be blotted out from existence than sit with them again under the same vine and figtree, while the victories that have illustrated our generalship and courage, give us abundant assurance that we shall eventually be gloriously triumphant.

Other apprehensions may haunt the bosom of the timid and the desponding, but no heart in this Southern land, no matter how sordid and craven, ever indulges for a moment the desire of putting an end to our troubles by re-uniting the ties that bound us to the hated Yankee. Our enemies themselves admit that the Union is dissolved for ever, and they are urging this war, not with the expectation of compelling us to be confederate with them again, but to gratify their hatred, malice, and revenge.

These two objects are among those incalculably important ends which the war has enabled us to accomplish, and which we could not have attained by any other means. The contemplation of these will yield us consolation and comfort, and render us the better able to bear the woes that are the unavoidable accompaniments of the struggle, and to do the work to which we are appointed by Heaven.

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT DAVIS TO THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

The following is the text of the Address issued by President Jefferson Davis, to the people of the Confederate States, a summary of which we gave in our last issue:—

In compliance with the request of Congress, contained in the resolutions (requesting the President to issue an address) passed on the fourth day of the present month, I invoke your attention to the present condition and future prospects of our country, and to the duties which patriotism imposes on us all during this great struggle for our homes and our liberties.

Fully concurring in the views thus expressed by Congress, I confidently appeal to your love of country for aid in carrying into effect the recommendations of your senators and representatives. We have reached the close of the second year of the war, and may point with just pride to the history of our young Confederacy. Alone, unaided, we have met and overthrown the most formidable combinations of naval and military armaments that the lust of conquest ever gathered together for the conquest of a free people. We began this struggle without a single gun afloat, while the resources of our enemy enabled them to gather fleets which, according to their official list, published in August last, consisted of 437 vessels, measuring 840,086 tons, and carrying 3,026 guns, yet we have captured, sunk, or destroyed a number of these vessels, including two large frigates and one steam sloop of war, while four of her captured steam gunboats are now in our possession, adding to the strength of our little navy, which is rapidly gaining in numbers and efficiency.

To oppose invading forces composed of levies which have already exceeded 1,300,000 men, we had no resources but the unconquerable valour of a people determined to be free; and we were so destitute of military supplies that tens of thousands of our citizens were reluctantly refused admission into the service from our inability to furnish them arms, while for many months the continuation of some of our strongholds owed their safety chiefly to a careful concealment of the fact that we were without a supply of powder for our cannon.

Your devotion and patriotism have triumphed over all these obstacles, and called into existence the munitions of war, the clothing and the subsistence which have enabled our soldiers to illustrate their valour on numerous battle-fields, and to inflict crushing defeats on successive armies, each of which our arrogant foe fondly imagined to be invincible. The contrast between our past and present condition is well calculated to inspire full confidence in the triumph of our arms. At no previous period of the war have our forces been so numerous, so well organized, and so thoroughly disciplined, armed, and equipped as at present. The season of high water, on which our enemies relied to enable their fleets of gunboats to penetrate into our country and devastate our homes, is fast passing away; yet our strongholds on the Mississippi still bid defiance to the foe, and months of costly preparations for their reduction have been spent in vain. Disaster has been the result of their every effort to turn or storm Vicksburg and Fort Hudson, as well as every attack on our batteries on the Red River, the Tallahatchie, and other navigable streams. Within a few weeks the falling waters and the increasing heats of summer will complete their discomfiture, and compel their baffled and defeated forces to the abandonment of expeditions on which was based their chief hope of success in effecting our subjugation.

We must not forget, however, that the war is not yet ended, and that we are still confronted by powerful armies and threatened by numerous fleets, and that the Government that controls those fleets and armies is driven to the most desperate effort to effect the unholy purpose in which it has thus far been defeated. It will use its utmost energy to avert this impending doom, so fully merited by the atrocities it has committed, the savage barbarities which it has encouraged, and the crowning attempt to excite a servile population to the massacre of our wives, our daughters, and our helpless children. With such a contest before us there is but one danger which the Government of your choice regards with apprehension; and to avert this danger it appeals to the never-failing patriotism and spirit which you have exhibited since the beginning of the war.

The very unfavourable season, the protracted droughts of last year, reduced the harvests on which we depend far below an average yield, and the deficiency was, unfortunately, still more marked in the northern part of our Confederacy, where supplies were specially needed for the army. If, through a confidence in an early peace, which may prove delusive, our fields should now be devoted to the production of cotton and tobacco, instead of grain and live stock, and other articles necessary for the subsistence of the people and army, the consequences may prove serious, if not disastrous, especially should this present season prove as unfavourable as the last. Your country, therefore, appeals to you to lay aside all thought of gain, and to devote yourselves to securing your liberties, without which these gains would be valueless. It is true that the wheat harvest in the more southern States, which will be gathered next month, promises an abundant yield; but, even if this promise be fulfilled, the difficulty of transportation, enhanced as it has been by an unusually rainy winter, will cause embarrassments in military operations and sufferings among the people, should the crops in the middle and northern portions of the Confederacy prove deficient. But no uneasiness may be felt in regard to a mere supply of bread for men. It is for the large amount of corn and forage required in the raising of live stock, and the supplies of the animals used in military operations, too bulky for distant transportation; and in them the deficiency of the last harvest was mostly felt. Let your fields be devoted exclusively to the production of corn, oats, beans, peas, potatoes, and other food for man and beast; let corn be sown broadcast for fodder in immediate proximity to railroads, rivers, and canals, and let all your efforts be directed to the prompt supply of these articles in the districts where our armies are operating. You will thus add greatly to their efficiency, and furnish the means without which it is impracticable to make those prompt and active movements which have hitherto stricken terror into our enemies and secured our most brilliant triumphs.

Having thus placed before you, my countrymen, the reasons for the call made on you for aid in supplying the wants of the coming year, I add a few words of appeal in behalf of the brave soldiers now confronting your enemies, and to whom your Government is unable to furnish all the comforts they so richly merit. The supply of meat for the army is deficient. This deficiency is only temporary, for measures have been adopted which will, it is believed, soon enable us to restore the full rations; but that ration is now reduced at times to one-half the usual quantity in some of our armies. It is known that the supply of meat throughout the country is sufficient for the support of all; but the distances are so great, the condition of the roads has been so bad during the five months of winter weather through which we have just passed, and the attempts of grovelling speculators to forestall the market and make money out of the lifeblood of our defenders have so much influenced the withdrawal from sale of the surplus in the hands of the producers, that the Government has been unable to gather full supplies. The Secretary of War has prepared a plan, which is appended to this address, by the aid of which, or some similar means, to be adopted by yourselves, you can assist the officers of the Government in the purchase of the corn, the bacon, the pork, and the beef known to exist in large quantities in different parts of the country. Even if the surplus be less than believed, is it not a bitter and humiliating reflection that those who remain at home, secure from hardship and protected from danger, should be in the enjoyment of abundance, and that their slaves also should have a full supply of food, while their sons, brothers, husbands, and fathers are stinted in the rations on which their health and efficiency depend?

Entertaining no fear that you will either misconstrue the motives of this address, or fail to respond to respond to the call of patriotism, I have placed the facts fully and frankly before you. Let us all unite in the performances of our duty, each in his sphere, and with concerted, persistent, and well-directed effort there seems little reason to doubt that, under the blessings of Him to whom we look for guidance, and who has been to us our shield and strength, we shall maintain the sovereignty and independence of the Confederate States, and transmit to our posterity the heritage bequeathed to us by our fathers.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Executive-office, Richmond, April 10, 1863.

THE CAPTURE OF THE DIANA.—The Federals give the following account of the capture of the steamer Diana, which has, according to telegraph advices, been destroyed by the Confederates:—Port Hudson, April 4. The New Orleans Era of the 2nd inst. contains the particulars of the capture of the Federal gunboat Diana, on Sunday last, a few miles above Brashear City, on Atchafalaya Bayou, by a portion of Sibley's command. It says: "The Diana was commanded by Captain Peterson, and had aboard Company A, 12th Connecticut, and Company F, 16th New York—in all one hundred and twenty officers, privates and sailors, all of whom fell into the hands of the Confederates, together with the boat. She mounted one thirty-four pound Parrott, two thirty-two smooth bores, and two twelve pounder guns. The boat was badly damaged. The report of the engagement at Atchafalaya was distinctly heard at Brashear City. General Weitzel commanding immediately sent the gunboat Calhoun to assist the Diana, but having no pilot, the Calhoun grounded and came near sharing the same fate. A south wind raised the water and released the Calhoun. The Confederate loss was unknown. The Federals lost three officers and two privates killed.

ONE of the greatest wants of the Confederate Medical Department is opium and its various preparations. The Southern papers abound in paragraphs, appealing to the ladies and others to cultivate the garden poppy to supply the want. The mode of preparation is to slice the capsules and collect the juice on plates or glass, dry it, and forward it to the nearest medical purveyor, for conversion into the required medicine.

THE author of the celebrated lines "All Quiet Along the Potomac," which have been so extensively reproduced in English newspapers, is Lamar Fontaine.

THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

March 31.—The Senate to-day passed the Senate Bills—increasing the pay of Chaplains in the Army; increasing the compensation of route agents and special agents of the Post-office Department; the Bill to provide and organize a general staff for armies in the field; to prevent the absence of officers and soldiers without leave, and the Bill to authorise newspapers to be mailed to soldiers free of charge.

The House agreed to substitute its own Exemption Bill for that of the Senate, but adjourned without coming to a vote on its passage.

April 1.—In the Senate, the House Bill to abolish flogging in the army passed, with an amendment; also, the House Bill to reorganize the navy; also, the Senate Bill to increase the number of military courts to attend the army in the field.

April 2.—In the Senate, the Bill to establish the proposed mail across the Mississippi River, was passed. Several other unimportant bills were passed.

In the House of Representatives the Bill from the Senate to repeal the laws allowing of substitutes was rejected.

A joint resolution was adopted to adjourn to the 20th of April.

April 3.—Neither House of Congress was in session to-day, having adjourned on account of the observance of Good Friday.

April 4.—The Act to convert the First Regiment of South Carolina Infantry, now stationed at Fort Sumter, into the Second Regiment of Artillery, recently vetoed by the President, was again passed by a two-thirds vote in favour of the bill.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—Mr. Foote introduced a resolution proposing to change the seat of government. The resolution was rejected by an almost unanimous vote.

The bill increasing the pay of soldiers four dollars per month was passed.

THE ELECTIONS IN TENNESSEE.

The following letter from Governor Harris, of Tennessee, explains itself:—

To the Editor of the Winchester (Tennessee) Bulletin.

Tullahoma, Tennessee, April 3, 1863.

My attention has been called to the following paragraph in your issue of the 21st ultimo:—

It has been settled that there will be no election for Governor in Tennessee, in August next, if the Federal army continue to hold the middle and west sections of that State. By virtue of the constitution, Governor Harris holds his office until his successor is elected.

A similar paragraph appeared in the Memphis Appeal of the 27th ult.

Allow me to suggest that it is settled by the constitution of Tennessee that there shall be an election for Governor, Senators, and Representatives, on the first Thursday in August, and there is no power in or out of the State which can change or annul this constitutional requirement.

The election should by all means, and certainly will be held at the time fixed by the constitution. We should, therefore, at the proper time, take all necessary preparatory steps.

Forgetting all the differences of opinion upon minor questions of the past, we should select a good and true man for each position, in whose support all true patriots can cordially unite.

If we will present one, and but one, such candidate in each elective district throughout the State, Federal bayonets cannot prevent the election of sound Southern rights men to the positions of Governor, representatives in Congress and the General Assembly.

The people of that portion of Tennessee within the enemy's lines present the proudest spectacle of heroic firmness in their patriotic devotion to our cause. We may confidently rely upon their cordial co-operation so far as they may be permitted to vote or take part in the election.

But long before August the rivers will have fallen to low water mark, giving us an open field in which to meet the enemy. I feel that I hazard very little in expressing the confident belief that, before the election day, we will have crushed or driven from our State the miserable mercenaries and vandals who have so long plundered and oppressed a brave, true, and patriotic people, leaving every portion of the State free and untrammelled in the exercise of the elective franchise.

Very respectfully,
ISHAM G. HARRIS.

A FEW gentlemen of Nassau, New Providence, having contributed to the soldiers in Virginia 1,200 Bibles and Testaments, the following is the response of the Board of Managers of the Bible Society of Virginia to their communication:—

Richmond, Virginia, March 2.

To certain Gentlemen of Nassau, Members of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

Gentlemen, your munificent donation of 1,200 Bibles and Testaments to the soldiers in the service of the Confederate States of America, now in Virginia, has been received. They have come most opportunely. Our destitution is very great. Our soldiers, who have been taught under the parental roof to reverence and value the Word of God, and to make it the guide of their life, have exhausted the supply on hand. We had been accustomed to depend upon the American Bible Society for our Bibles, and when this supply was withheld, and we could no longer obtain them, we felt our destitution more keenly than words can describe. For the first time we experienced a famine of the Word of God. It is true, our Confederate Bible Society is actively engaged in endeavouring to supply us. But the want of men and the materials for the work is a serious obstacle in the way. Gentlemen, the sympathy you have manifested for the cause of the South; the kind, generous, Christian spirit which prompted the gift; the seasonable and opportune moment in which they were received; the wants they will relieve, have called forth the warmest acknowledgments and the heartfelt thanks of the Board of Managers of the Bible Society of Virginia. And we, the undersigned, a Committee appointed by the Board of Managers of the Bible Society of Virginia to convey their thanks to you, do in their name express to you our grateful sense of your kindness and Christian sympathy. With sentiments of high consideration,

GEO. WOODBRIDGE,
CHS. H. READ,
JAS. A. DUNCAN.

THE Legislature of Virginia has passed a law prohibiting the cultivation of tobacco in a proportion greater than twenty-five hundred plants for each field hand between the ages of 16 and 55 years, regularly employed as a field hand in such cultivation; and prohibiting any planter from growing a crop of more than 80,000 plants.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

OUR friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MAY 7, 1863.

Historicus versus Historians.

ONLY two weeks ago, in commenting upon the deliberate outrages of Admiral Wilkes in the seizures of the Peterhoff and Dolphin, we quoted some very strong language peculiarly applicable to those cases, from the earlier letters of "Historicus." Whatever might be thought of the candour or authority of this writer, his undisguised partiality for the Federal cause, and his notorious advocacy of the policy of a certain section of the Ministry, appeared to us to make him, at least against his own friends, a most unimpeachable witness. Our witness, however, feeling the damaging force of his testimony on a former occasion, and regardless of any other consistency than that of devotion to Mr. Lincoln and Earl Russell, forthwith returns to the box, and makes a fresh deposition. On Thursday last another letter appears in the Times over the familiar signature; the last revelation of the inspired prophet of international law is made.

"The pitcher goes to the spring till it breaks," is a homely old adage, illustrated in this instance. This time "Historicus" has gone just the one time too often. Whatever credit may have been allowed him thus far for sincerity of conviction, he has irretrievably lost. Heretofore he navigated boldly and successfully on the varying but impetuous currents of public opinion; last Thursday he was wrecked in his first attempt to stem a tide running counter to his friends' desires. His last letter is in sad contrast to its predecessors. It lacks, necessitate rei, the dexterity of reasoning, the conclusiveness of quotation, even the brilliancy of style, which cannot be denied to his former efforts. Instead of the sharp weapons of dialectic gladiatorship, in which "Historicus" must be considered a master, he is forced to resort to the blunt and vulgar ones of personal abuse. The speakers who in both Houses of Parliament gave vent to the public indignation are not refuted, but called bullies and other hard names. On the other hand, "Historicus" cannot be charged with a lack of gratitude, especially that gratitude which is said to consist in "a lively sense of favours to come." He has acknowledged Lord Derby's adoption of some of his views by a complimentary, as well as self-congratulatory, notice in the published volume of his letters, and he has reciprocated in kind Lord Russell's quotation from him in the House of Lords. Evidently, our Ministerial advocate has become emboldened by this twofold but delusive success. His letters on recognition found the public mind in a fusible and plastic state, pleased with the fortunes of the Confederates, which were thought past serious danger, but anxious for any plausible pretext or excuse for avoiding unpleasant and hazardous complications. In this state of the public mind both of the great parties in the State were not sorry to avail themselves, partially and temporarily, of the mode of escape from a pressing necessity, which "Historicus" opportunely presented. He flattered himself that he had converted both to a fixed policy, which if through some evil star were ever adopted as such, would mark the period of the decline of British prestige and power. Under this delusion, behold what he has dared to propose to the English nation.

"The instructions issued by Mr. Seward," writes "Historicus" in April, 1863, "are strictly in accordance with the law of nations as understood and practised by Great Britain." In January, 1862, when all Europe still thrilled under the astounding impudence of the Trent outrage, he danced to a different tune. "The great maritime nations of England and France," he said then, "cannot afford to have the leading principles of international law confounded by the loose inaccuracies of Mr. Seward. They cannot suffer their trade to be embarrassed and their interests compromised by the American navy acting under instructions of which every line is a blunder." This scarcely seems the language of the same man. Mr. Seward's professions may have been amended; the practice of the Admiral, promoted to that rank for his distinguished services in the Trent affair, and of other subordinates of the Federal Government, assuredly has not. "Historicus" himself seems to have foreseen this, for in 1862 he wrote, "With Seward's for teachers and Wilkeses for pupils, there is no saying how soon we may have another 'Trent affair' on our hands." And when the prophecy is fulfilled, and the apt pupil Wilkes obeys the spirit and not the letter of his teacher Seward's instructions, "Historicus" writes, "I must confess that I see no distinct evidence that even the Federal cruisers have exceeded the ordinary exercise of belligerent rights," and he adds, "still less can I find any proof that, if any such excess has taken place by negligence or design, the Government of America is prepared to justify or to maintain it, or that their Prize Courts are not disposed to do justice to the injured parties." In 1862 "Historicus" had a different conception of belligerent rights, and less implicit faith in the integrity of the Prize Courts created by Mr. Lincoln. "It is only in doubtful or suspicious cases," he said then, "that a captain of a man of war can be justified in the detention and capture of a vessel, even though he should afterwards submit the question to the adjudication of a Prize Court. The compensation which such a Court can award may be very inadequate to the mischief which has been done by an act of vexatious and causeless molestation." Again, "If Captain Wilkes had taken the Trent to New York for adjudication without being able to show that he had any grounds for suspecting that she had only colourably assumed a neutral destination, the act of detention would in itself have been so wanton and unjustifiable an invasion of the immunity of neutral ships trading to neutral ports, that the English Government would have been entitled to complain of it as a vexatious and unwarranted proceeding." And, relative to Prize Courts: "If, which it is impossible to conceive, an American Prize Court should have exhibited an ignorance or a contempt of law equal to that displayed in Mr. Seward's despatch, and condemned the vessel, so gross a violation of the settled principles of the law of nations by the tribunal appointed to guard its sanctions, would have been in itself a justifiable cause of war."

"Historicus's" great forte is to cloud or altogether change the issue. This he has attempted to do in his desperate pleading on behalf of Messrs. Seward and Wilkes, by making it appear that the true issue involved in the recent insults upon the British flag was the right of search, and the concomitant right of bringing in suspicious vessels "for a more deliberate inquiry than could possibly be conducted at sea," rights which no one in England has disputed in connection with these cases. What has roused the indignation of the British people, is the glaring and deliberate abuse of those rights, an abuse which, as we have seen, no modern writer has condemned more forcibly than "Historicus" when it suited his purpose; an abuse, also, for which we have his own authority that the award of a Prize Court affords no adequate reparation. So conscious is he of the weakness of his defence, that he has thrown up a sort of inner citadel whereon to fall back in the last resort. In constructing this second line of defence, he does not proceed with his usual boldness, and contents himself for the present with throwing out a doubt for the benefit of his clients. He says:

A point has been raised in the recent discussions which is of great importance, viz., whether a neutral vessel, with an immediate neutral destination, can be condemned because the cargo may have an ultimately hostile consignment. I am very much disposed to think that such a doctrine cannot be maintained, and that as far as breach of blockade, at all events, is concerned, nothing can be looked to but the immediate destination, which must be regarded for this purpose as the termination of the voyage. But in this respect there is probably a distinction between the ship and the cargo, for the ultimate would be probably regarded as the true destination of the ship itself. I think the reasoning of Lord Stowell in the case of the Jonge Pieter (Rob. Rep. iii., p. 79.) points to this conclusion. But we are not to assume this question as one that is clearly decided. If the American captors choose to raise it at their own risk in a Prize Court, we are bound to await its adjudication. It is impossible to conceive any question which more exclusively appertains to the domain of judicial decision.

In 1862, our subtle and pliant pleader had no such doubt. Then he laid down the law and ruled the practice in these emphatic words:—

England and France must make it clearly and immediately known that persons and things on board a neutral ship on its journey from one neutral port to another, are not only not subject to capture without the intervention of a Prize Court, but that, if brought before such a court, they cannot be made the object of legitimate condemnation.

With these words recorded against him, not only in letters written by him a year ago, but in a volume revised and published by him not many weeks since, we cannot but admire the cool effrontery of his hint to the captors (Admiral Wilkes) and the Court (the equally notorious Judge Betts) to raise a new point, and to draw a distinction between the ship and the cargo. And what must we think of the lawyer who, evidently knowing better, gravely tells us that "it is impossible to conceive any question which more exclusively appertains to the domain of judicial decision"—a question which never existed, save as the arrière pensée of an unconscientious partisan. A new principle is to be foisted upon international law, not by the ascertained consent of interested nations, but by a Court of Justice, whose duty it is to administer existing laws, not to make new ones; and that court, one created by Mr. Lincoln, who has suspended the functions of the highest tribunal of his country, and caused judges to be torn from their bench in open court, and personally assaulted; and of all Mr. Lincoln's courts, the Prize Court of New York, presided over by a man whose name has become a byword of venality.

After such an oblivion of self-respect, we are not surprised at "Historicus" daring to openly defend and justify the spy system of the Federal Government in this country:—

I have seen a great deal of complaint of the "spy system," as it is called, which is supposed to be carried on in this country by the agents of the American Government. These complaints appear to me both childish and unjust. If, as must be admitted, the American Government are entitled to capture all vessels contemplating a breach of blockade, or freighted with contraband, they are clearly entitled to obtain such information as they can which may be useful to enable them to exercise their right. It is important for them to know which ship it is worth their while to watch and pursue and which they may safely leave unmolested. Does any one suppose that, if this country were at war, the English Government would not use every possible effort to obtain reliable information on such points? What is the object of diplomatic missions except to obtain information (and that often secret information) on points material to the interests of their own Governments? Even in time of peace every prudent Government takes pains to make itself acquainted with what is going on in its neighbour's dockyards and arsenals. So far from such information being prejudicial to the innocent English shipper, it is exactly the reverse. If the American cruisers are well informed as to the real character of vessels, they will be less disposed to confound the innocent with the guilty, and they will be more likely to allow those who are not justly objects of suspicion to pass unmolested, than if, in the absence of all information, they were compelled to suspect, and therefore search and detain all alike.

This is bold language for the recognised champion of a British Cabinet; bold not because the writer is himself deaf to that honest instinct which causes English-born men to abhor what he justifies, but bold because it defies the universal sentiment of the nation, always expressed, and on some memorable occasions acted upon. Information, even secret information, may and must be obtained for every public service, especially in seasons of peril and great emergency. But the conscience of men and of States prescribes that such information must be honourably obtained, and the reverse of this is what is stigmatized as the spy system. Few European diplomatists would now venture to pattern after the envoys of Venice, who rendered the diplomacy of their republic infamous.

In his zeal for Mr. Seward and his official patrons, "Historicus" has at last gone a step too far. Henceforth, his advocacy, however clever and ingenious, will damage any cause. But he, and men like him, do a greater and a public harm. By their constant deprecations of the "unspeakable disaster of war," they bring about precisely what they profess to be so anxious to avoid. It is only human—not merely Federal American—nature to make aggressions, especially where a strong self-interest prompts, upon those who disclaim the will or the spirit to resist. A few words of honest indignation uttered in Parliament have restored the British mail-bags, unopened, into the custody of British officials. The Americans will stop precisely at the point where England shows signs of resisting. Yet the men who speak such honest words are denounced by "Historicus" as "advocates of democracy who have become panegyrist of despotism." These gentlemen need not our vindication of their "position and character," which "Historicus" assails; but we ask, when in modern times has the world seen a more abhorrent despotism than that which now sways the shipwrecked destinies of the late American Union, and who are more bold, more unscrupulous panegyrist of that despotism than Mr. Bright and "Historicus"?

The Confederate Army.

THE war between the United States and the Southern Confederacy is something unique in history. Strategic writers will, of course, prove that the scientific rules and accredited laws by which the movements of armies are ordered, have in every field of battle that has illustrated the contest, received their ordinary application and produced their inevitable results. There is, of course, a theory of war which may no more be disregarded by a general than precedents by a Chancery barrister. But the struggle in the New World presents so many peculiar phenomena—its enormous distances; its desultory fighting; the character of the men engaged in it; the impromptu soldiers and officers who are fighting the battles; the diversified nature of the operations, conducted by means of steam transports and railroads over an area such as never before has been made the theatre of hostilities—that it bids fair to provide the military historian with new starting points for the development of fresh theories of attack and defence, and to constitute for the great Transatlantic communities upon whom, according to an English statesman, is opening a phase of diplomatic intrigue, of jealous rivalries, and of standing armies, a complete text-book of all that relates to the military art.

There is nothing more surprising, nothing more interesting, amongst the many remarkable features that the war presents, than the rapidity and ease with which great bodies of citizens have been armed, equipped, organized, and marched hundreds of miles to the scene of conflict. The Americans are not a military people. The passion for glory, which has developed itself into, on the other side of the channel, perhaps the most perfect military machinery the world has ever seen since the days of Old Rome, is wanting in both North and South. Federals and Confederates belong to a practical race, not likely to plunge into a war for an idea, unless it offered them a tangible gain. The military profession was with them, as it is with us, the resort of the Upper Ten Thousand. The wealthy merchants and the rich landowners of the North looked down upon it. The professional classes saw no chance of promotion or profit arising from it. Political adventurers saw in the discipline and gentlemanly bearing of the army, a bar to their progress, and disliked it accordingly. Perhaps it was more popular in the South. The Southern States, representing the country party, would naturally send a larger proportion of their sons into the army, than the populations of the great cities of the North and the thriving plains of the West, absorbed in creating the wealth of which the South have had hereditary enjoyment for a century. But even in the South military feeling languished for want of an object. Outpost duties amongst the Indians, border forays with the Mexicans, were not exactly calculated to engender great ardour for an officer's life. The prizes were few, the promotions slow. When the war broke out, it found, we believe, very few officers holding higher rank than lieutenant-colonel. When we add that the regular army was composed principally of foreigners, Germans, Irish, deserters from Canada, and very few native Americans, it will be readily seen that the formation of a military class was next to an impossibility. On the other hand, if the Americans are not a military people, they are essentially a fighting people; they have the combative organs quite as largely developed, as the home branch of the Anglo-Saxon race; and in the short space of two years, they have displayed sufficient military aptitude and tact for war to warn us that American history is turning over a new leaf; that the moral and social aspect of a continent and a people is changed; that the age of material progress and peaceful enterprise has passed; and that American fleets and armies will, hereafter, be a Power in the world.

That the North should have raised with comparative ease a million of men, is not so much a matter of wonder, as that the South should have succeeded in repelling and defeating them. The North, with its money power and floating population, ready food for powder, its high bounties, and its constant influx of emigrants, had such an immediate supply of the raw material as no nation before possessed. But that the South, with small means, with no immigration, relying on the patriotic devotion of its sons, on the union and common self-exposure of all classes of the community, should have made head so long, and should be still making head, against the Northern millions, is little short of marvellous. For, be it remembered, the loss of one Southern soldier is hardly balanced by the destruction of two of the invaders. The Northern citizen fights vicariously in his war of conquest. The Southern patriot suffers, fights, and dies, in person. There are Irish and German recruits to take the place of the dead Northerner. There is no one to fill up the blanks in Southern homes that may be caused by Northern bullets. Yet battle after battle is fought with enduring devotion, and the ranks are still serried, and the gaps are still filled up, and on the day of conflict the Southern chivalry still hurls back the invader from its soil. That much of this unflinching devotion, and this continued success, is to be ascribed to a moral superiority, and to the composition of the Southern army, we doubt not; but much too is due to the men who have had its lead and organization—men like Lee, Jackson, Stewart, Johnstone and Beauregard. In this respect the Confederates have had an undoubted advantage from the first. The Southern Generals have possessed, in the highest degree, the confidence of their soldiers, not less from their character and position, than from proved military capacity. Their troops have felt, in a hundred fights, that the men to whom their conduct was intrusted, were worthy of their trust; that there would be no needless sacrifice of life, like that of Fredericksburg, no shameful humiliations, like those of Bull Run and Manassas; and the result has been an unvarying success which has rarely, if ever, marked a war of two years' duration.

We publish, in another column, an order of the day from General Beauregard, on the eve of the fight against Charleston, which illustrates in a remarkable manner the care and prevision of the Confederate General for his soldiers. To the officers of our European armies the instructions may appear almost unnecessarily minute. But in an army composed in a great degree of volunteers, without the strict discipline and the traditions of regular armies, General Beauregard's instructions must have been invaluable. They are a vade mecum, which the lowest private in the ranks can readily understand and appreciate. So concise and complete are they, indeed, that they might be read with advantage to the troops of any army in the world, and give to the private as well as the company officers all the knowledge, confidence, and presence of mind required for the actual conflict. Nothing is wanting in this general order. How to treat the enemy, how to care for the wounded, what is the duty of the private, what the responsibility of the officer; where the ambulance is to be found; how, in the heat of battle, wounds are to be treated and fractures bound, all this is to be found in the order of the day. It is impossible that men feeling themselves thus cared for and counselled should go into battle without full confidence in themselves and their leader. It is not surprising that, with anything like equal numbers, they should always regard a battle with the Yankees as a certain victory. General Beauregard had long ago established his claim to stand in the very foremost rank of the military leaders of the South. His successful and scientific defence of Charleston has added to his laurels. His order for the 5th of April shows that with his professional qualifications he combines a power of organization, and an appreciation of the highest duties of a commander, which may well entitle him to the honours conferred, and to the confidence reposed in him, by the men of Louisiana and South Carolina.

Ministers in Congress.

WE cannot but regret that the debate in the Confederate Senate on the proposal to admit the President's Ministers to a seat "on the floor"—i.e., an ex officio seat without a vote—resulted in a virtual negative. It is true that the matter is one of more importance than may seem to careless observers; and that a measure likely to lead to changes so important in the practical working of the Constitution ought not to be adopted hastily. Nevertheless, it appears that the proposition was rejected, rather through an instinctive prejudice against the adoption of a European precedent, and through a strangely misapplied jealousy of the Executive power, than from any aversion to the consequences which, as we believe, it would really entail. The presence of the advisers of the Crown in the Parliament of England has, in the opinion of the wisest and most impartial critics of English institutions, been of paramount use in bringing about and preserving that peculiar harmony and—to use an untranslatable Gallicism—solidarity between the different branches of the Government, which are to be found in no other country; and has done much to enable us to combine those two principles which have never been combined elsewhere—a really effective strength in the administration with the widest personal and political freedom of the people. Here, and here only, has the great experiment of modern politics—how to secure to a free and self-governing people a strong government, strong enough to preserve order at home and command respect abroad—been successfully carried out. And inasmuch as there is no nation so likely as the people of the Confederate States to achieve for themselves an equally happy result, it would be a cause of deep regret to all their well-wishers if they should miss any of the means within their reach by which the present fortunate condition of their mother country has been attained. It is quite true that the mere fact of an institution having done good service in England is not a proof that it is adapted to the circumstances of the English race in the Southern States. But where there is nothing in those circumstances to exclude it, its suitability to England is a prima facie evidence of its probable usefulness to a nation which in character and instincts is as English as in blood, and language, and religion. Hereditary monarchy cannot be transplanted; an hereditary aristocracy is impossible to a new country; an Established Church can only co-exist with monarchical and aristocratic institutions. But, apart from such things as these, institutions must grow, and cannot be made. We have a right to believe, till cause be shown to the contrary, that those political contrivances which are found to work well in this country are not unlikely to be of service to a people so like ourselves as are our kinsmen of the South. And the whole history and working of the Ministerial system in England tends to prove that the presence of Ministers in Parliament is essential to the maintenance at once of Parliamentary control and of Executive authority. The original practice of the Sovereign was to select his Ministers almost exclusively from the House of Lords. The growing power of the House of Commons, in the reign of Charles I., compelled him to admit members of that House to a share in his councils; and from that time the number and rank of Commons in the Cabinet has grown with, at the same time that it has enhanced, the power and preponderance of the Lower House. It is now felt both as an inconvenience to the Government and as a check on the House of Commons, that the three chief executive departments—the War-Office, the Admiralty, and the Foreign-Office—are represented there only by under-secretaries. The House feels that it has some difficulty in controlling and bringing to order a Minister who sits among the Peers, and who therefore cannot be called before it to account in person for his measures; the Ministry feels that it lacks something of that support which is given by the personal influence of a Minister of the first rank in matters concerning his own department, as well as in general debate. No one in this country dreams of doubting the essential importance of having the Cabinet efficiently represented in both Houses, unless there be any one who desires that the Crown should resume something of its old attitude of independence and quasi-antagonism towards the House of Commons. At the Revolution, some of the Radical thinkers of the day proposed to exclude Ministers altogether from that House. The proposal was nearly succeeding; and Lord Macaulay's remark upon it—a remark which would be endorsed by every statesman of the present day—is that its effect would have been to reduce the House of Commons to practical insignificance, and to render the Peers—who alone would be able to demand explanations and enforce attention to their remonstrances, and who moreover would attract into their body every man capable of Ministerial duties—virtually the ruling House of Parliament.

No one who has carefully followed and compared the course of English and of American politics can have failed to observe that the greatest distinction between the administrative systems of the two countries is this: that in England the Government—that is, her Majesty's advisers—are responsible to Parliament; and that the American Government is not responsible to Congress. In both countries the theoretic responsibility is the same—a Minister may be impeached; and if Ministers committed treason, or crimes approaching to treason, in either country they would be impeached. But impeachment is a sword of justice, not a weapon of political warfare; a means of punishing a criminal, not of correcting a blunder. Therefore, in neither country does liability to impeachment constitute effective "responsibility"—that is, liability to control, rebuke, or ejection by the Legislature. In England, this effective responsibility is secured, because Ministers have to answer for their conduct, individually and collectively, in their place in Parliament; and if they fail to answer to the satisfaction of Parliament, they must resign. But a Ministry which cannot answer questions or take part in debate can hardly be called upon to resign when the debate leads to a hostile vote. Consequently, under the system which prevails in America, the President's Government is virtually irresponsible. The Executive is almost independent of Congress and of public opinion. If its conduct was very intolerable, the supplies might be stopped by the House, or the Senate might check its public appointments, and bring it to terms in that manner; but either of these courses would involve extreme inconvenience to the public service. English feeling would hardly tolerate the power bestowed by the American Constitution upon the Executive, of carrying on affairs for several years in a manner which public opinion may distinctly disapprove; but until Ministers are allowed a seat in Congress, with full liberty to defend and explain their policy, it is hardly possible for Congress to take upon itself to compel a change of Ministry. Therefore, Ministerial representation in the Legislature is essential to effective Ministerial responsibility.

Again, by the English system, the best talent of the country is employed both in Parliament and in the service of the Crown. The administrative ability of the statesman is employed in the executive business of his department; his calm sagacity is employed in the discussions of the Executive Council; his political wisdom, his eloquence, his authority, are at the service of his country and of his party in Parliament. In America, Congress and the Executive divide the political talent of the country between them; and what is, perhaps, worse, while the Executive loses the benefit of Parliamentary counsel and popular influence, Congress cannot have, as our Parliament has, the advantage of ministerial knowledge and experience. The want of this advantage has a most unfortunate effect on the character of Congressional debates. In the first place, the absence of the responsible advisers of the President gives to every debate on the conduct of the Executive Government, an air of aimlessness and want of power and purpose which deprives it of the interest and influence it ought to possess. Secondly, the absence of those who speak under the grave sense of responsibility which attaches to those who have to act, allows the discussion to assume a tone of exaggerated vehemence, and often of unworthy extravagance, which would be checked and counteracted by the presence of men who, wielding the power intrusted to them by a great nation, would feel that they spoke not only to the House, but, like the Popes, ubi et orbi—to their country and to the world. Had Mr. Seward had a seat in the House of Representatives, we hardly think that a vote of thanks to Captain Wilkes would have disgraced their records; for the Secretary of State could not have remained silent, and he would have known that to speak in favour of such a vote was to declare war. The fact that the Ministers had no seats there enabled them to apologize and make reparation for an act which the representatives of the people had thought worthy of their thanks. It was fortunate that they could do so, but that such a thing could be done shows how very low is the position of the Federal House of Representatives as compared with that of the English House of Commons. Finally, debating in the absence of ministers, Congress debates in the absence of information and explanation; and by excluding those whose conduct it should examine, and whose advice and knowledge it should demand and use, it lowers the importance of its discussions, and brings down its authority far below its proper level. The exclusion of ministers from the Legislature is, in the first place, a waste of political talent, and, in the second place, a damaging blow to the character and authority of the Legislative body.

It is said that, in this country, the choice of the Crown is inconveniently limited by the necessity that its Ministers should either have seats by election in the House of Commons, or be able and willing to accept a peerage. But this objection could not apply to the Confederate States; where a provision, the propriety of which we will not now discuss, embodied in the Constitution itself, prevents the simultaneous enjoyment of a Ministerial office and that of senator or representative. And it is probable that the limitation placed on the choice of the President by the admission of his Ministers to ex officio seats on the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives—a limitation of that choice, namely, to men who could be safely trusted to represent him there, might be wholesome in America, where there has sometimes been observable a tendency to select men for high offices who are not the fittest persons to be placed therein; and further, a tendency on the part of the President to insist too much on his own authority, and to treat his Ministers too much as mere chief clerks of their respective departments. If the Ministers were charged, in addition to their administrative functions, with the duty of defending the conduct of the Executive in Congress, it would be necessary for the President, in the first place, to choose men who could perform that duty with ability, dignity, and authority, and, in the next place, to guide himself very much by their advice in regard to acts which they, and not he, would be called upon to justify.

Some apprehension appeared to be entertained by those who opposed the admission of Ministers to the Confederate Senate, that their authority there would be greater than it should be, if to their present means of exercising influence were added those which the right to speak in person and take part in debate would give them. This fear seems to us altogether unfounded. Ministerial speakers do, of course, derive a certain authority from their position, as knowing more and speaking under a heavier and more direct responsibility than others. But this authority belongs almost as much to their acts as to their speeches; and it belongs to all their acts, wise or foolish, while it would only attach to such of their speeches as were in themselves reasonable and apparently just. A speaker of the Opposition in Congress at present lies under the double disadvantage (with an English-born audience), first that he is attacking an absent man; and secondly, that he is censuring with imperfect knowledge the acts of a man who acts with full knowledge. But when the Minister appears in the House he loses the unfair part of this advantage. He is there to hear and answer what is said; and if he has no answer to give, this at once becomes apparent. While, therefore, his authority is increased where he is right, because he is enabled to show the House that he is right, and to exercise that influence which always belongs to the presence and voice of a respected and trusted citizen, he loses when he is wrong the presumption in his favour which is derived from his inability to speak on his own behalf. It is said that in the Provisional Congress, where Ministers were admitted, the measures they recommended were almost invariably passed. To us this seems a strong argument in favour of their admission. A Ministry whose chief measures are not approved by Congress ought not, especially in time of national danger, to be in power. Being present at the debates, Ministers were enabled to state to Congress the reasons for the measures they recommended—reasons derived from official knowledge and experience; and if, under such circumstances, Congress had not generally agreed with them, the disagreement would have been strong presumptive evidence that either the Ministry was wanting in competence or credit, or that Congress was unreasonably obstinate and self-willed.

A second objection is that Ministers would attend to their executive functions, and decline to pay Congress the respect of appearing at its debates, on the plea that they were too busy. This fear appears to us very far-fetched indeed. Surely a high-spirited assembly of Southern gentlemen will scarcely allow itself to be treated à la Bismarck, like a Prussian Chamber of Deputies, and would know how to bring a Minister capable of such impertinence to a sense of his own insignificance? Confederate Ministers can hardly be busier than those of England; and the busiest of English Ministers, in the busiest times, are regular in their attendance in Parliament.

We may remark, for the benefit of those of our English readers who are not well acquainted with American political language, that there is a wide difference between the English practice and that which the Confederate Senate has for the moment declined to adopt. In this country constitutional practice requires that a Minister shall be either an elected member of the House of Commons, or a Peer; and no person not a member of either House can have an ex officio seat there, except the Lord Chancellor, who—when not a Peer—is Speaker of the Upper House without the right to vote or take part in the debates. But the Confederate Constitution expressly forbids that a man should be at once a Senator (or Representative) and a Minister of the President; and the proposal recently rejected was to remedy the exclusion of Ministers from Congress by this rule, by giving to them a "seat on the floor of the Senate with the right to discuss measures relating to their own department"—that is, a place in the Senate with a limited right to speak, but without a vote.

The Address of President Davis to the People of the Confederate States.

IN accordance with some Resolutions passed by the Confederate Congress on the 4th of April last, President Davis, on the 10th of the same month, issued an address on the present condition and future prospects of the country. Accustomed as Europe is to the chaste eloquence, and the absence of all boasting that have from the first distinguished the official communications of the Confederate President, yet it is, we think, impossible for any one to read the document which we publish in another page, without being deeply impressed with its calm and statesmanlike tone, and with the singular humility with which events are referred to that are sufficiently momentous and glorious to have excused almost any excess of congratulation and triumph. While this address was being written the news of the defeat of the Federal iron-clads was telegraphed to Richmond, yet it betrays no trace of excitement. Not that there is any want of feeling, or any cold formality about it; but the sympathy of the Chief Magistrate in a victory that diffuses joy throughout the length and breadth of the land, finds its truest expression in modest reticence.

The review of the past history of the young Confederacy is, indeed, as this address avers, calculated to beget confidence as to the future. President Davis reminds the people of the position in which they were placed at the outbreak of hostilities, and how they are now situated. A more striking contrast cannot be conceived. The Confederates were so ill prepared for war that tens of thousands who offered themselves to defend their country could not be enrolled for the want of arms. Important strongholds were undefended, and the enemy was kept at bay by mock embrasures, by Quaker guns, and by cannon that could not be served for the lack of gunpowder. But the weakness was effectually concealed from the foe, for in the South there was not a traitor to betray it. Two years have elapsed, and devoted patriotism has furnished all things necessary for the purposes of war. The army, which is officially stated to be 400,000 strong, is completely equipped, fortifications bristle with cannon, and gunpowder and shot are abundant. Two years ago the Confederates had not a single gun afloat, yet their nascent navy has covered itself with glory, has given lessons to the maritime Powers of Europe, and on the high seas has defied the vaunted naval power of the United States. The Confederate navy is still small, but it has the prestige of victory—it is already a terror to the enemy, and it is daily increasing. Taken unawares, and unprepared for the struggle, the South has triumphed. Now she is ready to wage a protracted war. The Confederates may well feel confident of the issue.

But President Davis does not recal past triumphs, or set forth the present strength of the Confederacy for the purpose of encouraging the people to pause in their efforts, and to rest awhile on their hardly earned laurels. Having, in a few brief sentences, glanced at what has been done, he bids his fellow citizens remember what remains for them to do. The moment has not come for putting off the armour and singing the song of triumph. The war still rages. Still great armies and powerful fleets are engaged in the unholy work of seeking to desolate the South; to stir up a servile war; to excite the docile negroes to massacre white women and children; to rob the Confederates of their independence, and to hold them in bondage. So, even whilst church bells are celebrating the crowning victory of Charleston, President Davis calls upon the people to make fresh sacrifices so as to prepare the way for future triumphs.

It is thought, and we may be sure not without reason, that serious, and even disastrous consequences may ensue to the army from the scarcity of food. The President, in view of this danger, asks the planters not to cultivate cotton and tobacco, which, in the event of an early peace, will yield them an enormous profit, but to plant corn, oats, beans, peas, potatoes, and other food for man and beast. President Davis does not mean that even with the deficient harvest of 1862, the fertile soil of the South did not yield enough for the support of the population. He says emphatically: "But no uneasiness can be felt in regard to a mere supply of bread for men." We shall not trouble our readers with statistics as to the productiveness of the Confederate States; for we have done so on more than one occasion, and proved conclusively that, as far as food is concerned, no people on the face of the earth are more independent than the people of the Confederate States.

But what better evidence can we require than this Presidential appeal, and the urgent appeals that have appeared in Southern papers for months past? The thoughtless partisans of the North cite this address and this urgency as proofs that food is so scarce in the South as to render famine inevitable. Now we submit that the very necessity of this solemn appeal to the patriotism of the planters, arises because the scarcity is relative and local only, and there is not the slightest apprehension of a famine. If food were everywhere scarce its production would be everywhere profitable, and self-interest would most assuredly induce the planters to give up the culture of cotton and tobacco, and to sow corn. It would be vastly more profitable for the planter to relieve a corn famine in the South, than the cotton famine in Lancashire.

It is for the sake of the army that President Davis asks the people to disregard the promptings of self-interest. So difficult is transportation that the superabundance of one State cannot be made to minister to the deficiency of another State, and much less to the wants of armies. We had some experience of the difficulty of supplying the commissariat of our army in the Crimea; but how much greater must it be to feed an army of 400,000? It has thus happened that whilst the civilians, and even the slaves, have not been stinted in meat and bread, the troops have been on half-rations. If the President's appeal is cordially responded to, as it doubtless will be, if every available acre is sown with food for man and beast, this privation, which, however cheerfully borne, is sure to some extent to impair the efficiency of an army, will be provided against, and the troops will be able to operate on any threatened point without anxiety as to necessary provisions and provender. The army itself has set a good example in doing what is possible to make the supply of food abundant. At the stationary camps, soldiers' gardens have been laid out, and from them the troops have procured enough fresh vegetables for their use. It is likely that henceforth bad roads will not so greatly hinder military operations, or be a cause of suffering to the troops by forcing them to subsist on half-rations.

In concluding his address, the President says he has no fear that the motives of it will be misconstrued. It is only the heated partisans of the North that can misconstrue such a document. They think that to confess and prepare to meet a danger indicates an intention of giving up the contest. They console themselves with the idea that the prolific South will be starved, because the Confederates are using every effort to secure superabundance to meet the extraordinary demands of an army of 400,000, portions of which, in the defence of an immense frontier, have to be rapidly marched from place to place. These partisans are so accustomed to Northern declarations of invincibility, and to hearing the might of Heaven pledged in the pulpit, in Congress, and in the press, to the success of the Northern cause, that they regard the exhortation of the Confederate President to the people to do their duty, and then to humbly seek the guidance and blessing of the Lord of Hosts, as despondency and despair. When President Lincoln addresses the Northerners, he conceals difficulties and disasters, calls defeat victory, and tells them they can and do command success. When President Davis addresses the Southerners he says very little about their triumphs, very much about their dangers and difficulties, and tells them to do their duty bravely and unflinchingly, and seek to deserve the success which they cannot command. The world has seen, and will see, which is the better and more acceptable policy.

A PRACTICAL MERCANTILE VIEW OF SOUTHERN WEALTH AND RESOURCES.*

WE have seldom met with such a genuine book of travels as is this brief account of a two months' tour in the Confederate States. "An English Merchant" did not go South for literary, but for commercial purposes, and herein he had an immense advantage over those who travel under contract to a publisher. The anxiety of gathering materials for copy distracts the attention, and a traveller so circumstanced does not look at things as they are, but through the spectacles of the public, for whose pleasure and instruction he is to write. Then there is no end to the tricks on travellers who are known to be authors; at every turn they are flattered and deceived. An English authoress, celebrated for her scepticism, abolitionism, and radicalism, was the victim of some practical joking, when she was "doing" the Southern States for a literary object, that mainly tended to confirm her in a false impression of the manners of the people. It was well known that this lady had been taught by the New Englanders that the negroes were whipped twice a day, and at certain seasons roasted alive; and that Southerners were perpetually duelling. Her faith in the duelling was fixed for ever by some foolish young men who were passengers with her on a steamboat. They pretended to quarrel, and for two mornings the lady was horrified by hearing that there had been hostile meetings before breakfast, and that the fighting was to be continued until one of the combatants was killed. The English authoress swallowed the joke, and was firmly persuaded of the truth of all that her New England friends had told her.

Moreover, "An English Merchant" is perfectly innocent of the art of bookmaking. The style is as careless and unadorned as commercial correspondence. Instead of making the most of his facts, the author has made the least of them. His small volume in the hands of a bookmaker would have produced three bulky tomes, and even then we should have had a complaint about the limited space and the abundance of material. No pains has been taken to refer to authorities; not an almanack, guide book, or newspaper has been consulted. When at Richmond in December last "An English Merchant" visited the localities of the Seven Days' Fight. He says, "I had an opportunity of going over the celebrated battle-fields which were the scene of the utter overthrow of the Federal army under General McClellan, in June and July, 1861." We thought the date was a typographical error; but further on he says, "Approaching Mechanicsville traces are soon seen, even yet, after seventeen months have elapsed, of the desperate fight which took place there on June 26th, 1861." And again: "All these and a thousand other little evidences remain here yet, in spite of the sun, wind, and rain of eighteen months, to show how desperate had been the resistance, and how furious and relentless the pursuit." The wonder is that the printer's reader should have passed such a palpable blunder; but we must in fairness observe, that the description of the battle fields, of the new-made graves, &c., would be ridiculous after eighteen months, whilst it is probably exact and graphic as it refers to six months after the fight. Perhaps the author has very little time for the study of current history or for revising proof sheets. He seems to us to take no other than a commercial interest in the struggle. This we may gather from his declared motive in undertaking the journey. "My own object in visiting the South is soon explained. The firm of which I was a member has for years dealt with many Southern merchants, from or of whom we had heard almost nothing since the commencement of the civil war. I was anxious, if possible, to ascertain whether our old friends were living or dead, and solvent or ruined." His partners have no cause to complain of his giving heed to anything but the business in hand, and if, as we suspect, this book is made up of the letters he sent home, they may congratulate themselves on being associated with a pre-eminently shrewd and far-seeing correspondent.

Wherever "An English Merchant" went, he made diligent inquiries as to the willingness of the Confederates to pay their foreign, including their Northern, creditors. He might have been satisfied on this head without going South, for during the war, and under pressing difficulties, the States have paid their foreign creditors; or he might have learnt in New York that the Southerners were noted for their honourable dealings; but he chose to especially inform himself. His investigation was satisfactory. At New Orleans, he says: "I could not hear of a solitary instance where the slightest disposition was manifested to repudiate, or even compromise either a Northern or a foreign debt." At Mobile he remarks: "The greatest anxiety existed here that the foreign and even Northern creditors should know that they had not repudiated, and did not intend to repudiate, a single debt, but could and would pay every cent and interest. This I firmly believe is within their power, and is their intention." When at Charleston he says: "I took good care to ask the question often enough, whether the Charleston people considered themselves absolved from paying their European and Northern debts; but the notion that they would ever be repudiated was scouted universally. 'We will never have it said that we owe the Yankee one cent when we can once get a chance to pay him,' they said, 'We will pay him and let him go.'" So far as willingness to pay is concerned, there could be no question. But willingness does not prove solvency. Honour without means will not redeem a promise to pay. Accordingly, our merchant proceeded to inquire as to the ability of the Confederates to pay their debts.

This involved two considerations. First, would the South succeed in maintaining her independence? If not, if the Northern dream of conquest should be realized, the Southern debts would remain unpaid. New England would help herself, but the rest of the Southern creditors would not get a cent. Secondly, assuming the final triumph of the South, would the ravages of war leave the Confederates with sufficient property to pay their creditors? Our merchant did not speculate about the future prosperity and wealth of the South, but confined his attention to the point whether peace would be the immediate precursor of the payment of her debts.

"An English Merchant" not only found the whole people—men and women—determined to die rather than submit to the hated rule of the Yankee, but what is more important, he observed that their determination was not a sentiment, but was being acted on, energetically and continually. The luxuries of life have been resigned without a sigh, and the privations incident to war borne without a murmur:—

I defy any man to repress his admiration of the enthusiasm, patience, and good-tempered endurance of inevitable, though self-inflicted evils, which these people exhibited. Committed to a course, and in a cause which they believed just, it was plain that they had counted the cost, and were prepared for death or victory.

The spirit of the people is shown by the spirit of the press. No number of victories can lull the South into security. The clamour for more vigorous efforts is incessant. The editors, he thought, "seemed to delight in putting the worst side of the Confederate cause outside, especially the clever, sparkling Examiner; and some startling assertions about the wants of the army, or the Federals outmatching them in the West, were applied like a succession of blisters, to keep the public and the departments on the qui vive. But nothing that could be said could provoke a reply from the reticent President and his advisers. I was told that things were put right, or looked into without any fuss, and nothing said." Our author elsewhere tells us that, although the acts of the President are so freely criticised, nothing can exceed the trust and confidence reposed in him. Whatever the President orders is performed with zeal and alacrity; and his judgment is relied on as the final arbitrament in all disputes. The nation is content to leave full administrative power to the President, though every citizen claims to be his frank and fearless adviser, and the Executive is not on any pretence to violate the Constitution or the laws.

Can the South hold out till the end? Her soldiers clad in homespun, sometimes shoeless and tentless, yet in all instances carrying an excellent, well-cleaned rifle, are not likely to be overcome by the Northern hordes. But can the South be blockaded and starved into submission?

In the North there are sometimes rumours of peace, but in the South nothing is seen but earnest preparations for a long war. Take the case of the railroads. Upon their working order greatly depends the power of the Confederates to defend their soil from the armies of the invader. But railroads wear out; and how are they to be replaced? Every precaution has been taken. The speed of the trains has been reduced to ten miles an hour—except on military emergencies—because the lower rate of speed so diminishes the wear of the rails that they will last two years. At the end of that time "it was calculated that the companies would be able entirely to relay those lines essential to their military operations, from the new rails in stock, those being made in the Confederacy, those taken from unimportant lines in the interior, and those taken from the horse railroads in the streets of the various cities." As for the rolling-stock, that was being replaced as it was worn out. "I saw in the South many hundreds of Southern-made cars, for both freight and passengers, and very useful things they seemed."

The ammunitions of war are now abundant. "The quantity and quality of the cannon manufactured in the Confederacy have amazed both the North and Europe, and every day increases the supply." The Tredgar Iron Works at Richmond are celebrated for the excellence of their guns. Lead and the ingredients for making gunpowder are no longer scarce. "There are many extensive manufactories of gunpowder and bullets in Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, &c., and there seems no lack of ammunition for war purposes."

Clothing, too, is being produced in sufficient quantities to bring down the prices. Women and children's dresses are made of a mixture of cotton and wool. "Augusta drills," "Graniteville sheetings," and "Atlanta shirtings," are as well known now by purchasers at auctions, and command as high a price, as the productions of Lowell or Manchester." Neatly made shoes, with thin wooden soles, are being produced in large quantities. "These shoes, which would outwear at least two pairs of the ugly brown-paper abominations with which New England formerly supplied the South, were offered at about a third the price of the imported shoe, and a large reduction in price promised." Altogether our author adduces a mass of evidence that justifies him in concluding that the South can clothe and arm her entire population, independently of foreign aid. The Confederates possess exhaustless supplies of the raw materials, and they are not wanting in mechanical ability. In the spring of 1862, when they resigned all hope of an early peace, they set about, under every disadvantage, to become a manufacturing nation. "They have been compelled to become shoemakers, tailors, cotton-spinners, mechanics, and so on; and, whether they consider it a compliment or not, it is a fact that there is enough of the Yankee about them to invent and make machines, and look uncommonly sharp after making them pay well too." Some of the minor articles of use are not, at present, very well executed; but a nation can get on for twenty years if needs be, with bad soap, bad lucifer matches, and ugly envelopes. The author gives an account of some purchases he made at Jackson, the capital of Mississippi:—

I paid thirty-five cents (one shilling and fourpence) for a square of "Confederate" made soap, about the size of a small billiard ball, the colour of clay, and the consistency of stiff curds; fifty cents (two shillings) for two small boxes of "Confederate" matches, of which the seller candidly told me not one in five would light ("but," he added, "we shall improve gradually, sir!"); and five cents (twopence) for an envelope made out of a sort of slate-coloured grocer's paper (also a Confederate production), with the words printed on it—

"Stand firmly by your cannon,
Let ball and grape-shot fly;
Trust in God and Davis,
And keep your powder dry!"

We have so often had occasion to show the resources of the South in the way of food, that we shall not refer to the many reasons assigned by the author for saying that "the South cannot be starved out." Yet "An English Merchant," on one occasion, could not procure food in the Confederate States, although his pocket was lined with dollars. The train in which he was travelling had unexpectedly to halt at a small village, and food was not to be obtained for love or money. Those who have travelled in the Southern States in the fall, when the extra long train of cars has from some accident been obliged to stop at a small town, will remember suffering from the same inconvenience. But the mishap very well illustrates the difficulty with which the Confederates have had to contend. There was abundance of food in the Confederacy, but in many cases the food was at one place and the mouths at another. To obviate this difficulty, and to ensure abundance, the Government and press have called on the planters to give up the cultivation of cotton and tobacco, and to sow corn. Our author suggests, incidentally, why it is planters are, in some instances, loath to follow this advice:—

Half-a-crown per pound for American cotton in Liverpool said more plainly to them (the planters) than mountains of books and figures could gainsay: "We can get no supply of cotton unless the South can send her crop; whenever she can send it, we will buy it in preference to any other, take all she can send, and pay her in gold for it if she will have nothing else." Of course this tended daily to make them care more for their cotton, and I believe will cause it to be planted in 1863 extensively, even if the war goes on for twelve months more.

Under these circumstances it is not surprising that it should require the declaration of the President, that there is a patriotic necessity for planting corn and abandoning the cultivation of cotton before the planters consent to the sacrifice.

We now come to the next and what, to "An English Merchant," was not the least unimportant point. The Confederates are willing and fully resolved to pay all their foreign creditors, including those in the United States; and, however the war may be protracted, there does not seem the most distant prospect of the North obtaining any ascendancy over the South. But will the war deprive the Confederates of their all, and compel them to begin the world afresh, or will it leave them property enough to discharge their present obligations? Our author has no doubt about it. On every side he saw produce that only needed peace to find a profitable market. Irrespective of what would be done by the harvest that succeeds the termination of hostilities, there is already a stock of cotton, which the author frequently heard estimated at 4,000,000 to 4,500,000 bales.

The merchants and store-keepers at Charleston, Mobile, and other places, who have closed their businesses have not done so from insolvency, but having sold out their stocks at enormous profits, and not being able to replace them, they are obliged to give up trading. "An English Merchant" is convinced that the Confederates are willing and able to pay all they owe, and with interest. This is particularly pleasant, as Europe will have henceforth to do a large direct trade with the South. The monopoly of New England and Pennsylvania being broken down, "England, France, and Germany will, for the first time, have full and free play at a trade from three to five times greater than that done thus far with the whole Continent before."

Our author refers to the absurd fallacy of the rate of exchange and the consequent price of gold being a criterion of the resources of the Confederacy. Foreign commerce is not suspended at New York; there is the same competition between drawers of bills, and this "keeps the price of gold and exchange down to just that point, where the inflation of the currency begins to operate, and, as a rule, probably rather under than over that point." With the Confederate States it is altogether different:—

At the South there are, to begin with, no drawers of bills except those few far-seeing people who, in anticipation of trouble after the November elections in 1860, had for many months before been sending cotton, tobacco, exchange, gold, &c., or in fact any valuable property, easily realizable, to England. While the blockade continues, of course any further exports are almost impossible, and consequently no new exchange can be created. What chance any person would have of inducing people who had so invested property for their own and their family's safe support, and how the struggle might, to draw bills against that property and sell them, any one may easily guess. I met with numbers of persons in this position, and am confident that scarcely any premium would tempt them to disturb their investments. At any rate, the price asked would be about in the same proportion to the real value of the bill, as the sum which a retired millionaire would demand for the mansion he had just built and finished to his liking; which in fact would very likely amount to saying in other words that he would not sell at any price which any sane man would give.

The Southern merchants have shown the most patriotic self-sacrifice and liberality. Until the wants of the Government were supplied at the current rates, no price could tempt the importer to dispose of his goods:—

I was told, for instance, of a very large lot of strong army shoes being sold by a house to the Confederate Government at fifteen or sixteen dollars per pair, which could have been sold outside easily at twenty to thirty dollars per pair. These shoes, it was said, went to Bragg's army in Kentucky, and really enabled his men to accomplish the long and rapid marches which characterised that arduous though indecisive campaign. I saw instances of similar liberality in smaller matters fifty times with my own eyes while in the Confederacy.

This patriotism and the freedom of the Government purchases from the rapacity of contractors is so great a saving, that "the war is not costing the Confederate Government $5, where it does the Federal Government $20 at least." There is no restriction placed on the export of cotton by the vessels which bring in cargoes of merchandise. It is the North and not the South that is starving Lancashire and the cotton operatives of France.

We must now conclude our notice of this valuable work. We have presented our readers with a bare outline of a book that bristles with useful facts and shrewd deductions. To those who wish for an insight into the condition and prospects of the South we commend "Two Months in the Confederate States" as a trusty and intelligent informant. Even the partisans of the North will find that naught is set down in malice. The author tells us how the ladies of the South abhor the invader, but how, nevertheless, they minister to the necessities of the wounded Yankee:—

The hot coffee, iced water, lemonade, food, and other happily-selected luxuries, which every family daily prepared, and sent or took down to the depots, were indifferently distributed to the man most in need. Every church was stripped of its carpets, cushions, and hassocks, to make pillows and mattresses, and have never been replaced; ladies laboured like Hood's poor sewing-girl, making lint, bandages, splinters; and the gentlemen and boys with their own hands lifted the fainting heads, eased the shattered limb, moistened the parched throat, or fed the craving mouth. But in all this, I am assured, Federal and Confederate fared alike.

Meanwhile the North is causing great suffering by making medicine contraband of war; yet an English merchant does not go out of his way to denounce Northern barbarity. He witnesses the effects of Butler's brutal rule, but suffers a slight element of pity to mingle with his scorn of the execrable Yankee Nana Sahib. His business in the South was to study the commercial and monetary prospects of the country; he kept this object steadily in view, and has produced an able and valuable report.

A NORTHERN DEMOCRAT'S ADVICE TO HIS COUNTRY.*

WE have before us a letter, addressed by Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan (late United States' Minister to Portugal), to Professor S. F. B. Morse, just published in pamphlet form. Mr. O'Sullivan had, previous to the outbreak of the present war, acquired the reputation of being one of the ablest and most effective political writers in America, as well as one of the most accomplished men in the diplomatic service of the United States. Since the revolution, his pen has not been idle. About a year ago, he contributed to the pamphlet literature of the period, an elaborate essay, which attracted considerable attention, under the title of "Union, Disunion, and Reunion." Of course, Mr. O'Sullivan, being a Northern man by birth and connections, clings to the hope of reunion; and, although in the interval between his former and his more recent pamphlet, that hope seems to have been essentially modified and impaired, it is not abandoned altogether. Even when he arrives at the conclusion that the recognition of the Confederate nationality is an inevitable necessity of the North, he still fondly imagines that in some not very remote future, a new and improved Federal tie may again unite the dissevered sections. As the veterans of Napoleon's Old Guard, when forced to take the eagles from their standards, hid them away in their drumheads, so Mr. O'Sullivan, when lowering the "Stars and Stripes," furls the cherished flag up in the innermost corner of his heart, ready to be displayed in better fortunes. But this very devotion to a desperate cause gives to his words a genuine value, for they present to us the manifestation of sober Northern thought, now drowned in the din of fierce and reckless passions. Mr. O'Sullivan, besides moving much in European society, has had the paramount advantage of being far removed from the scene of angry strife which preceded the conflict of arms, and of having since watched the progress of events as a distant, though not a disinterested, spectator. Himself a prominent member of the Democratic party of the North, which has during the war gone through so many phases, he now stands where the party stood on the eve of Mr. Lincoln's Proclamation in April, 1861, and where the party, he hopes, will soon stand again.

His first appeal to former party friends is to convince them of the hopelessness of the struggle:—

At the outset, two years ago, there was indeed some excuse for the war on the part of the North; an excuse of which no vestige now remains. The country was led into it insensibly, being at first summoned merely to the defence of the Capitol against menaced attack; the army collected on the pretext of that sole purpose having been then afterwards wickedly led forward, by executive command, into that fatal invasion of Virginia which was repulsed at Bull Run; justly and deservedly indeed repulsed, but under such circumstances as to awaken all the natural fighting instinct of the North for another trial for the recovery of the honour lost, or apparently lost, in its flight from that fatal field. There was, moreover, then a great Unionist party at the South and throughout the South. Experiment could alone, as it then seemed to many, determine whether or not it was the true and real mind of the South to separate. (They forgot, or did not heed or believe, that that dread experiment itself could not but produce in the process that very adverse unity of the Southern mind and the Southern passion, whose existence it was to test!) Possibly Mr. Seward's "ninety days" might break down the assumed violent ascendancy of a minority Secessionist faction, and might develop into local power at the South this supposed, nay, this then real Unionist spirit and party. This was a plausible and seductive argument. No wonder it misled thousands of honest minds at the North. A patriotic enthusiasm of nationality, thrilling to the name of the Union, and rallying to the symbol of the flag, co-operated powerfully and naturally with these influences, urged as they were by the Government, by a majority party at the North, and by an eloquent and omnipresent press.

Whatever may have been the case two years ago, it is very certain that the South, with a degree of exasperated unanimity rarely, if ever, before witnessed in the history of any people, is now against Reunion and for Independence. Southern Unionism has utterly evaporated out of the land. Those who once cherished it, with a lingering love all the more honourable because locally unpopular, have now become all the more vehement in reaction in the opposite direction. No pretext of a Unionist party at the South now survives to justify the further prosecution of the war. The rights and the duties of now depend upon the facts of now. If anything in human politics is true and certain, it is that the Confederate States can now never be brought back into the old Union by force of arms, except as a conquered and subjugated country.

He next indignantly protests against the injustice of the war:—

To continue the war now purely vindictive and tyrannical in its character, for their mere overthrow and conquest, becomes therefore, now at least, the utter nullification of the very cardinal idea of our whole political theory and system. The attempt to do so is to stultify our own revolution; to blaspheme our very Declaration of Independence; to repudiate all our own history; to cancel all our Constitutions, State and Federal; to sanction all the despotisms, all the alien dominations, of other ages and countries; to justify the tenure of writhing and bleeding Poland by Russia at this very moment, and all the brutal means by which that tenure will, too probably, be enforced in spite of the sorrowful protest of the heart and conscience of the whole civilized world. Even though, through some superhuman prescience, he were perfectly assured of a triumphant issue of conquest and subjugation, no American has now any longer a right to prosecute further a contest whose very success can bring nothing else or better than this.

Of the Southern people, and their capacity for resistance, he speaks thus:—

Armies little inferior in numbers, while far superior in that morale derived from a cause and a motive, have hitherto repulsed every attempt by those of the North to penetrate to the vital points of the Southern self-defence. These armies can never be extinguished, while every day perfects their discipline, increases their efficiency, invigorates their military fibre, intensifies their resolve, and elevates their morale. Every year must bring forward its fresh contingent of growing youth to more than make good all the losses of successive campaigns. In case of need there remain unexhausted and inexhaustible resources of men of all ages and professions, ready to fly to arms when war should approach nearer to the vast interior of the Southern country. Far greater Northern armies than those which have hitherto waged a warfare so little successful along the mere frontier, and on a few water courses of the Confederacy, will be insufficient to overrun and to maintain a footing in the interior of a country for half the year impregnable, from the mere influences of climate, to Northern invasion. Arms they have already in abundance; they are able to manufacture, and they must continue to import, in spite of all possibilities of blockade. Of gunpowder the same is to be said. Of the military genius of their generals it is superfluous to speak. Their past successes, especially those of the past year, have animated them to that confidence in themselves, their cause, and their commanders, which in war is more than half of victory in advance. As for the pressure of the hardships and impoverishment of war upon Southern families and homes, no amount of such suffering pressing upon such a people can produce any other effect than to embitter their exasperation and to nerve their determination. They have already learned how easy it is after all, when a nation is animated with a great passion of patriotism, to bear cheerfully, nay, even exultingly, the extremest of personal privations. Tens of thousands of the best gentlemen of the land carry muskets in the ranks, and march to eager battle with the bare soles of their feet hardened by use into insensibility; while hundreds of thousands of delicate ladies submit, proudly and without a murmur, to every form of domestic hardship. All the women of the South weave and work for the soldiers in the field. Inexhaustible supplies of Indian meal, rice, and bacon, where other food is inaccessible, suffice, and must continue amply to suffice, for such sustenance as they are more than satisfied with. To wish to subjugate such a people is almost impious. To hope it is insanity.

But the most striking portion is that referring to the repudiation of the national debt. It is particularly applicable at this moment, when New York is buoyed up with the hope of the foreign loan, the negotiation of which is actually being attempted by the Northern agent for that purpose, Mr. R. J. Walker:—

The Republican party which has provoked and made the war, like the man who had the wolf by the ears, cannot now let go of it, without absolute and total party ruin. It will have to come to that in the end, but they hope to tide over the interval of eighteen months to the next Presidential election, still afloat on the bloody wave of war, with the aid of the deceived Democracy. To stave off the dread day of reckoning which inevitably awaits them, they urge and drag along the more than half dissatisfied Democratic party to support them in this prosecution of their mere party interest, with a desperate hope in the chapter of accidents, but with a fearful recklessness of all the aggregated ruin and woe they are accumulating upon the country. The public debt they are piling up, these unprincipled party leaders care in truth little about. 'After us the deluge.' They well know it will be repudiated in the indignant hour of the great popular reaction. For the future honour and credit of my country I rejoice that not a dollar of that debt has been taken abroad. A sagacious instinct of the truth of this whole business has preserved the lenders of Europe from touching it. The Government has not even dared to offer it to them. This whole war of coercion has been radically unconstitutional from the outset. A hundred acts of the most flagrant unconstitutionality have accompanied and still further characterised its prosecution. The War Debt partakes of that pervading and irremediable unconstitutionality. Held almost entirely by the contractors, the republicans, or the other supporters and abettors of the war, it will be repudiated, not alone on this ground of essential unconstitutionality, but also on the further one of that high public justice which will declare the repudiation of that wicked debt to be but a small measure of punishment to fall upon those who will stand collectively responsible (next to the Administration) for the war in which and for which it was created. They have not yet dared, to any extent, even in the midst of the deluded public enthusiasm in favour of the war, to support it by any real taxation upon the body of the people. What chance will there be of its payment by such taxation, a taxation to run, like that of England, through indefinite generations, after the war shall have failed, after the separation of the Union shall have become a fact not only accomplished, but on all hands recognised? Dissolved by the accomplished secession of nearly half the States, the Union and the Constitution will be at an end; legally and de facto at an end. This debt was to have been paid by the Union, through the collective national resources which it was to have commanded (such will be the plea of the great agricultural North West); we, a fragmentary residuum of it, are neither able, nor can we be properly called upon to pay it. The "United States" against whose name it will stand on every green-back and every bond, will then exist no longer. The debtor will be dead, and the debt dead with him. Moreover, all minds will then be turned to the one great aim and hope of persuading the South to a reconstruction of a new confederation; and the first manifestly indispensable means towards that end will be to throw overboard this huge and crushing weight of the War Debt, whose every cent will but represent an unforgotten drop of Southern blood.

The hope of negotiating a loan for a Government so utterly and hopelessly bankrupt as the fragmentary Union, is said to be based upon a pledge of the Customs Revenue to foreign creditors. On this subject Mr. O'Sullivan says:—

The customs! Why if anything could aggravate the swift-coming indignation of the public reaction, it would be the national disgrace of a specific pledge of the customs of New York, as poor despised Mexico has been wont to galvanize her dead and putrid credit by hypothecation of those of Vera Cruz and Tampico. The day of large customs revenues is over in America. With the exception of the manufacturers of New England, and a few coal and iron proprietors of Pennsylvania, the Free Trade idea is at this day dominant throughout the minds of the North. The agricultural North-West, and commercial New York are, I rejoice to say, not less thoroughly Free Trade, in both sentiment and interest, than the South has ever been. The day is past when those petty local interests, through their wealth, their shrewdness, and their adroit play upon the machinery of national parties, could levy a broad universal tribute in the form of high tariff taxation over a continent. It is they, jointly with the Abolitionist fanatics, and the party politicians of the Seward school, who have driven the South into revolution and broken up the Union, and they have killed for ever their goose with the golden egg. Let not those who have made this wicked and fatal war, and who now see the ground of the future sinking beneath them into the abyss, imagine that they can now perpetuate their Protective Tariffs through any form or mode of pledge of the customs for a foreign loan, designed to bind the faith of the future. Fortunately they do not possess the power commensurate with the greedy will. Even the last Congress, when it was exhausting itself in the prostitution of its apparent or usurped legal powers to abrogate the Constitution and all the public liberties, for the purpose of investing the Administration with a complete dictatorship for the salvation of their Party, gave no authority to pledge the customs. They had no pretext of power, indeed, to do so, but it is a wonder they did not. They forgot this, and this alone, in their scheme of powers designed to counteract for another twelve months the great ground-swell of public opinion already surging up against them and it. The next Congress will be Democratic, and even if it should be capable of ratifying such a national disgrace, and of riveting such an attempted perpetual fetter upon the freedom of future legislation and future generations, the day is swiftly coming when the people will indignantly and righteously repudiate it all.

We have quoted sufficiently from this pamphlet to show that it contains many correct views forcibly expressed. From the fundamental idea, or rather hope, which it expresses, we need not reiterate our dissent. But we agree with Mr. O'Sullivan, that, if there were any possibility of eventually bringing the South back into any closer relations to the North than treaties of peace and amity can effect, it would undoubtedly be by such tardy reparation for past wrongs as an immediate and penitent abandonment of a wicked enterprise might be considered to be. We agree also with him that it would be worse than absurd for the North to expect a community, which has actually achieved its independence, to return to share the burdens of taxation accumulated in the effort at its own subjugation; and that repudiation of the Northern war debt would, for that reason alone, if not for others, be inevitable. But not peace, instantaneous and complete; not repudiation; not humiliation; not amendments of the Constitution; not the impeachment of Mr. Lincoln and his advisers for high treason, and their execution as felons—not these, nor ought the North can do or promise, will ever bring these two now historically distinct societies into any species of political partnership whatever.

THE MAGAZINES FOR MAY.

Blackwood opens with a chatty review of Daniel Wilson's, LL.D., "Prehistoric Man." Mr. Wilson is Professor of History in University College, Toronto, and his knowledge of the New World lends a special interest to his book. He is often able to illustrate his speculations by a reference to the ethnological phenomena of the Continent on which he lives, and there is no doubt that America is a most interesting field of research for the ethnologist. He dilates at length on the remains found in the valley of the Mississippi and in the forests of Central America, which are evidences of civilization before Columbus revealed the existence of the New World. In reference to the extinction of the red races, Mr. Wilson says that it is not due altogether to the dying out of the Indians, but to their absorption into the white race. This idea will not, Mr. Wilson thinks, obtain ready acceptance, but he points to facts in support of his assertion. He observes that: "At all the white settlements near those of the Indians, the evidence of admixture is abundant, from the pure half-breed to the slightly-marked remoter descendant of Indian maternity, discernible only by the straight black hair, and a singular watery glaze in the eye, not unlike that of the English gipsy. There they are to be seen, not only as fishers, trappers, and hunters, but engaged on equal terms with the whites in the trade and business of the place. In this condition the population of all the frontier settlements exists; if, as new settlers come in, the mixed element disappears, it does so purely by absorption." The offspring of these mixed races is marked by excellent physical and mental development. It must be remembered that only by those who ignorantly suppose all the American Indians black, and all black men are negroes, has the Indian race been thought inferior. It has never been a servile race. There is nothing repulsive in this absorption, and it will never lead to the disastrous consequences that have attended the admixture of the white and negro races.

The ethnological review is followed by an ingenious essay "on certain principles of art in works of imagination," by Sir E. B. Lytton. The novelist as well as the dramatist has need of art if his work is to live. Sir Edward mentions "Ivanhoe," "Kenilworth," and "Quentin Durward," as masterpieces in historical fiction, and he might have added to the list his own historical romances, which are altogether worthy the reputation of their distinguished author—we cannot well bestow upon them higher praise. He contends that a work of genius must be a work of art. "For just as virtue consists in a voluntary obedience to moral law, so genius consists in a voluntary obedience to artistic law." It would, perhaps, be the shortest way of expressing the connection between genius and art to say that art is the offspring of genius.

Amongst the light reading in Blackwood we must include a paper on the Federal diplomatic correspondence, for it is impossible to write an essay on Mr. Seward's despatches that is not irresistibly humorous. It is curious to note, not only how all Mr. Seward's prophecies have been falsified by events, but also how coolly he has eaten his own words and changed his principles. On the 10th of April, 1861, he was of opinion that secession was a mere conspiracy, and he rejected the notion of subjugating the South. He writes: "Only an imperial or despotic Government could subjugate thoroughly disaffected and insurrectionary members of the State." He must, by this time, have learnt that the task is impossible, although the Government of which he is a prominent member is thoroughly despotic. Blackwood strings together a number of his prognostications, and observes: "Compared with these prophecies the ravings of Mother Shipton become respectable oracles. Yet on them was founded the entire foreign policy of the Federal Government." It is passing strange that any persons in Europe should have been duped by them, but the dupes are few, and Mother Shipton had her followers.

"My Investment in the Far West" is a well-told story of the way in which Colonel Coriolanus Sling and Dr. Titus A. C. Bett got up a bubble company to construct the "Great Nauvoo and Nebraska Railway."

Fraser has a paper on "The Future of the National Church," which is a frank exposition of the opinions of those who think that Bishop Colenso is not unfitted for his office because he doubts the historical truth of the Pentateuch, and that the phase of scepticism which is called neology ought to be no bar to the ministry of the Church. It is assumed that the Anglican theory was "that nationalism was in any case to be preserved, as something absolute; that truth was, in one sense, secondary, namely, inasmuch as it is something relative." This is the theory of the Essayists, but we deny that it was the theory of the founders of the English Church. We did not separate from Rome because the Romish Church is not national, for perhaps there is no communion that is more adapted to become a national church. We left the Romish Church on the ground that her doctrine was faulty, and we set forth in our Articles what we believe to be her errors. At the time of the Reformation it was supposed that the whole nation would accept the doctrines of the Church; and there has been, indeed, little dissent from them. It is not to the doctrines, but to the formularies and State connection of the Church that Nonconformists object. If, for the sake of keeping sceptics within the pale of the Establishment, we make those doctrines a secondary consideration, the days of the Church will be numbered. We venture to say that ninety-nine out of every hundred communicants, and three-fourths of the rest of the members of the Establishment would at once secede from a Church that was declared to be a mere political organization.

"The Principles of Currency" is a valuable essay for those who want to learn with ease something about an abstruse and rather uninteresting subject. The writer discusses the effects of an inflation of the currency; but this, he contends, cannot arise so long as promises to pay are known to be payable on demand. When the solvency of the issuer of the notes is questionable they are at a discount, and commerce is injuriously affected. It is, then, unnecessary to place any restriction on the issue of bank-notes that fulfil the conditions of currency—that is, pass from hand to hand without discount—for people will not use more bank notes than they want, any more than they will use more gold than their business needs; and no one suggests that there is any danger of an over-issue of sovereigns. The writer shows clearly that a commercial crisis is the result of an inflated credit, but not of an inflated currency. It may be said that an abundant supply of bank-notes encourages credit; but the same objection applies to an abundant supply of gold, and yet no one will argue that it is a bad sign when the coffers of the Bank are full. The truth is that the love of gain is insatiable, and that much would have more, so that a season of prosperity induces undue speculation, and excessive greed is punished by a monetary and commercial panic.

The narrative of "a Fortnight in Ireland, in the Lent of 1863," has nothing to do with Irish politics, and will be a pleasant surprise to those who think that Ireland is a den of misery. No doubt, there is much suffering, as there is much suffering in Lancashire, but there is plenty in Dublin as there is in London.

The first number of "The New Review," which is published in Dublin, is to some extent an experiment, but one which we think will succeed. Though issued monthly, it is modelled after the Quarterly Reviews. Fiction and poetry are excluded, and the subjects treated are mostly, though not entirely, political. We have, for example, in the present number, articles on "Sensation Pictures," and "Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister," as well as a comprehensive notice of some new books. The principles of "The New Review" are Conservative, and they are very fully and frankly explained in an admirably written article, entitled "The Conservative Party." Toryism no longer exists, even in name, and Whiggery, according to the writer of "The New Review," exists only in name. The Whigs are no longer aggressive, and not one whit more liberal than the Conservatives, but they refuse to join the Conservative party, because by coquetting with the Radicals they are able to keep in office. "The New Review" warns them of the danger of their policy, and insists that they ought forthwith to renounce a name that is no longer significant of their political principles, and to ally themselves with the Conservative party in order to resist the encroachments of Radicalism. The Conservatives may congratulate themselves on their new and able representative in the Fourth Estate.

The Dublin University Magazine manifests its loyalty by the first article in the present number, "The Land of the Princess—The Isles of Denmark and their People." The writer displays an intimate acquaintance with the manners and customs of the Danes. There seems to be much time given to meals, and the hospitality of Scandinavia appears exuberant. We must confess that we think the custom of visiting without an invitation is rather a nuisance. The Danes have been so interested in the English language, that there is even a Danish version of the nursery story of "Little Jack," and an Englishman in Copenhagen can get on remarkably well without the aid of an interpreter or that fruitful source of ridiculous blunders—a conversation lexicon. The only other contribution that calls for special notice is "Slavery and Secession—Our Answer to Professor Cairnes." The answer is unquestionably conclusive, but it will not convince any one who has read the "Slave Power," and believes its statements and arguments. If a man is fool enough to think the moon is made of green cheese, and that the stars are old moons chopped up, he will not be persuaded of his error. In like manner any one who is idiotic enough to accept Professor Cairnes's assertion, that the 4,000,000 slaves in the South are cruelly used, and that seven tenths of the white population are desperate lawless vagabonds, is incorrigibly stupid. In the interest of his clients the learned professor should remember that there is a limit to credulity, and that it is sometimes necessary for the advocate to put a check on a too ardent imagination. Any Old Bailey lawyer could tell him of many promising causes which have been lost through a too willing witness swearing to too much.

Besides the usual quantity of fiction the Cornhill has several amusing papers. The contribution on chess playing gives the student some very sage advice. Parents generally, and particularly mothers, will be pleased with the essay on "The Mental Condition of Babies." It is a comfort to have an assurance that the dear pets have rather more capacity than crying dolls or playful kittens.

"Revelations of Prison Life" is very lively, and dispels the notion that criminals are reformed by our present discipline. The kind of punishment we give them, as well as the care we take of their physical comforts, have a hardening effect. The solitary system seems a complete failure:—

Rogues sequestered in solitary cells ought to occupy their thoughts with repentance, no doubt; but, in ninety nine cases out of a hundred, their cogitations take a directly opposite course. Here is the written testimony of one of them. He says the thoughts of the prisoner "are always occupied with, what he has been, and what he may be, in his career of crime."

He runs over his past life, thoroughly examines his mistakes, guards and strengthens his weak points, and resolves to be more skillful next time. What college is to the student, that prison is to the thief. His prison days are his thief-making days. Most new dodges are invented and planned in prison. At night he dreams of trials, successes, flying over the prison walls, and perdition. He lies upon his bed for hours together, thinking and dreaming of what he will do when he gets at large. He reads only to kill time; his thoughts are rummaging among his past blunders, and elaborating plans for the future.

Mr. F. Marshall must be a bold man, for he contributes a paper to Bentley's on "False Hair," and avows the authorship thereof. According to this gentleman's testimony the luxuriant tresses worn by ladies are almost always false. It is really too bad thus to destroy a pleasing delusion. "Cardinal Pole," an historical romance, by Mr. W. H. Ainsworth, will, we think, meet with success at the circulating libraries after it has duly run its course in Bentley's.

In Macmillan's there is a novelty which is likely to prove attractive and useful. We refer to the first of a series of letters from "A Competition Wallah," which presents a graphic view of the life led by the members of our Indian Service. We may hereafter find that the competitive system, from which so much was expected, does not benefit the country, but only those mediocrities who can be readily crammed for an examination. Civil Service examination tutors find that the less brains a man has the easier he is crammed, and that clever pupils are very often plucked. "Physicians and Surgeons of the Last Generation," is a gossiping contribution about a class of men who have the knowledge, but not the time, to keep biographical diaries. A physician in full practice sees more variety of character than a barrister, but he is always too busy to impart his knowledge.

The Victoria is a new magazine, brought out under distinguished patronage, by Miss Emily Faithfull.

*THE civil war in America has been accompanied, very naturally, by a conflict of the pen. Each side has its advocates or defenders, of whom some have written with a passionate warmth, more appropriate in the field than the library. To contrast with these, it is gratifying to read the opinions of a calm spectator, of one who, in the midst of exciting scenes remains unexcited, and so is able to place the simple truth before us, free from the exaggeration by which it is so frequently distorted. Such works as that of Mr. Ozanne are of special value at a time like this. What the intelligent reader requires is neither declamation nor subtle argument, but plain statements of the facts as they really exist, that, being unable to see them with his own eyes, he may have, so to speak, a photograph placed before him, an unimpassioned and truthful image of the reality.

Recollecting the deplorable cant and nonsense lately brayed at Exeter Hall and other kindred assemblages, it is of value to have before us the testimony of an eye-witness as to the actual condition of the negro. We have here the thoughtful views, not only of a spectator, but of one competent to judge, and on whose veracity all can rely. If there be any one who recollects the ravings that recently insulted the common sense of this country, let him turn to these pages and see the difference between fiction and fact, between the South as caricatured by calumniators, and the same country as it really exists.

We are here reminded of a fact that must have struck many readers. It is the singular unanimity of feeling in favour of the South which we find in the works of all who have really been there. This is the more remarkable in the case of those who entered the country with strong prejudices against it. There are few more eloquent writers or truthful spirits to be found than Frederica Bremer—far more able or high-principled than the Hon. Augusta Murray. Both arrived in the South under the strongest influences of literary association and friendship with the Abolitionists of New England. Both entered it with feelings of distrust, not, indeed, to say of aversion. Yet where are to be found in our language more beautiful and glowing pictures of a contented, happy peasantry—of a social life free from poverty, care, anxiety—of a land where the sunshine that gilds the soil sparkles with the gaiety of the people. Here is another witness to the truth. May it not be said, indeed, that the whole course of the war bears witness to it? What would have been the effect of Northern armies, emissaries, proclamations, incitements, if the negro had really been the ill-used race, if he had been impelled by that craving for escape from his position which Yankee veracity has described? Has not the world beheld fidelity in the midst of temptation, quiet in the midst of turmoil, contentment in the midst of privations? When was ever a country exposed to such an earthquake? When was ever a labouring class exposed to such a shock? What was in comparison the stimulus to our own trusted and petted Sepoys? And yet, throughout the whole of that vast area of the South, there is not one district, a single spot, in which any man can put his finger on so much as a social disturbance.

The personal narrative of Mr. Ozanne is of peculiar interest, as the scenes he visits are those of the present hostile operations. The same district around Vicksburg has just been described in the pages of the Cornhill Magazine by an officer of high rank; and we find the man of the sword and the minister of peace agree in their descriptions and their conclusions. This testimony of a character that commends itself to the thoughtful mind. And there is much that bears upon questions of great interest; for instance, the conduct of Butler, the cunning, cruel, corrupt, vulgar trickster, whom the people of the North are not ashamed to accept as a representative man. We find, too, inquiries into the unjust fiscal system which has filled the North with palaces built out of the tribute extracted from the Southern people. We have also placed before us the resources of the South, a subject on which the delusions, not to say the ignorance of the North, have been truly remarkable. Throughout the work there is constant evidence of that spirit of self-sacrifice and stern resolve which have defeated and set at naught great fleets and armies, and which will render this struggle, when recorded in future history, the nobles' effort ever made by a people to resist subjugation and vindicate their right to liberty and self-government. Having said so much, we need not add that we cordially recommend the work of Mr. Ozaune to our readers.

THE AMERICAN UNION.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—Notwithstanding so much has been written on the American question, one important link in the chain of transatlantic history has been overlooked, namely, the PEACEABLE REVOLUTION that was effected by Washington, and the other "Secessionists" who framed the Federal Constitution, with closed doors, at Philadelphia in 1787, and completely overthrew the then existing Government under the "Articles of Confederation," which they had been commissioned merely to revise. Two of the delegates from New York withdrew from the Convention, and others from Virginia and Massachusetts refused to acquiesce in its proceedings in consequence of the corp d'édit. Rhode Island did not even desire the "Articles" amended; she refused to send delegates to the Convention, and would have prevented any change being made, if her rights had been regarded, as will be seen by the 13th Article of the Confederation, which reads:—

Every State shall abide by the determination of the United States in Congress assembled, on all questions which by this Confederation are submitted to them. And the articles of this Confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State, and the Union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them; unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every State.

Yet in spite of this emphatic and unmistakeable language, the "Articles" were abrogated by a portion of the States, and the "Constitution" adopted containing the following clause:—

The ratification of the Conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution, between the States so ratifying the same.

And no provision was made for the payment of the public debt, the division of the public property, or, in reference to the "Crown lands," that were ceded to the "Confederation" for the benefit of all the States. It was a violation of a solemn compact—an infringement of the rights of four sovereign States that might have refused to give their concurrence. The Articles of Confederation, unlike the Constitution, did not permit of the implied right of secession, contained in the following words in the "amendments" to the latter document, adopted shortly after the organization of the new Government:—

Preamble. The Conventions of a number of States having, at the time of their adopting the Constitution, expressed a desire, in order to prevent misconstruction or abuse of its powers, that further declaratory and restrictive clauses should be added; and as extending the ground of public confidence in the Government will best ensure the beneficial ends of its institutions, therefore, Resolved, &c.

Article 10. "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The old Congress, too, without any authority under the "Articles" which gave them power, dismissed the "Committee of States," and adjourned on the 3rd of March, 1789, after having called a new Congress of the members from the eleven States, that after much debate, had been called into confirming the action of the "Secessionists" of 1789, to meet on the following day. No quorum, however, of Representatives was present until the 1st of April, and of Senators until the 6th. Washington was not notified of his election as President until the 14th, and his inauguration did not take place until the 30th of April, when the proceedings of the Constitutional Government of the United States of America commenced. The Executive and Legislative branches being installed, possessed from that day the power to make laws, and appoint all the officers necessary to constitute the Judiciary as well as the Executive departments, and subordinate offices both civil and military. From the 3rd of March to the 30th of April, no "union" whatever existed, and during that period of fifty-eight days, each State might have sent a separate Ambassador to the several European Courts. France had acknowledged the independence of the States even before the "Articles of Confederation" were entered into; the treaty bears date the 6th of February, 1778. During the existence of the "Articles," other powers followed her example, viz., "The United Netherlands and the United States of America; to wit, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia." On the 8th of October, 1782, "the King of Sweden, of the Goths and Vandals, &c., &c., &c., and the Thirteen United States of America," on the 3rd of April, 1783. "His Britannic Majesty acknowledged the said United States, viz., New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia to be free, sovereign and independent States," on the 3rd of September, 1783. "His Majesty the King of Prussia, his heirs, successors, and subjects, on the one part, and the United States of America and their citizens on the other," on the 9th of July, 1785. With Morocco in 1789. And a Convention with France in 1788.

John Adams was appointed the first Minister to Great Britain after peace was restored; he arrived in London in February, 1785, and returned to America in May, 1788, in consequence of the "mother country" not having honoured the States with a diplomatic representation, although she had sent Mr. Temple to act in the capacity of Consul for the "Eastern States," who "was admitted at a time when hopes were entertained of a commercial treaty;" but Mr. Bond, who was subsequently despatched to reside in the "middle States," was not received. Several years afterwards he was accepted as the Consul for the "Middle and Southern States."

It does not seem that any notice was given to the European Governments of the change that had taken place in the external arrangements of the States. Washington, however, as the chief magistrate of eleven States, despatched Governor Morris, of New Jersey, to England, as their "commissioner," on the 13th of October, 1789. Can it be doubted that North Carolina and Rhode Island had a right at that time to likewise send a representative separately or conjointly? The one not having united herself to the new league until the 21st of November, 1789, and the other till the 29th of May, 1790. These two States are maritime States, remote from each other, and held commercial intercourse with Great Britain during the period they were "left out in the cold." And on the same principle are not the States comprising the Southern Confederacy entitled to have an ambassador at this court, in accordance with the treaty of 1783, in which Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia are mentioned by name, and Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi were included, they being at that time portions of those States? The Treaty of 1840, between Great Britain and Texas, strengthens this position. The Southern States withdrew from the second "Union" under all the forms of law—there was no "rebellion" about their procedure. Secession is a right expressly mentioned in nearly all their ordinances in accepting the Constitution, and was never questioned until a comparatively few years since, and then only by a portion of the Northerners, who desired to control the commerce of the South. It is true that the Southerners opposed the course of the New England States when they threatened to retire from the Union, in the midst of the war with England, 1812-15: and this has been adduced as an argument against the action of the Confederates at the present time. But what right has a partner in a commercial firm to "back out" when his house is in difficulties? None whatever. A political copartnership is held together by the same tenure.

Although the action of the Constitutionalists of 1789 was a clear breach of faith with those who opposed the movement to peaceable revolution, no sound thinker can deny that the States had the power to alter their form of Government. To be sure, the "Articles of Confederation" were called a perpetual Union, and were framed from a draft submitted by Franklin, which Mr. Madison, in an introduction to his "Debates in the Convention," refers to in the following language:—

It appears that as early as the 21st of July, 1775, a plan entitled "Articles of Confederation and perpetual Union of the Colonies," had been sketched by Dr. Franklin—the plan being on that day submitted by him to Congress, and, though not copied into their journals, remaining on their files in his handwriting. But, notwithstanding the term "perpetual" observed in the title, the articles provided expressly for this event of a return of the colonies to a connection with Great Britain.

The words, "We, the people," and more "perfect" union used in the preamble to the Constitution, have been productive of mischief, in consequence of their not having been properly understood by the masses, who have been led astray by designing politicians taking advantage of these expressions without explaining their true intent and meaning. History settles all difficulties on this subject. On the 6th of August, 1787, the committee appointed for that purpose reported the first draft of a Constitution. The preamble was in these words:—"We, the people of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, do ordain, declare, and establish the following Constitution, for the government of ourselves and our posterity." On the next day this preamble was unanimously adopted. The draft of the Constitution was discussed, and various alterations made until the 8th of September, 1787, when the following resolution was passed:—"It was moved and seconded to appoint a committee of five, to revise the style of, and arrange the articles agreed to, by the House; which passed in the affirmative." This committee had no power to change the meaning of anything which had been adopted, but were authorized merely to "revise the style" and arrange the matter in proper order. On the 12th of the same month, they made their report. The preamble read:—"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, to establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." On the next day (13th September) "it was moved and seconded to proceed to comparing of the report from the committee of revision, with the articles that were agreed to by the House, and to them referred for arrangement, which passed in the affirmative, and the same was read by paragraphs, compared, and in some places corrected and amended." The only change which was made in the preamble was striking out the word "to" before the words "establish justice," and no other change was made in any of the articles, except such as would make the "report of the committee of revision correspond with the article agreed to by the House." There is a perfectly conclusive reason for the change of phraseology in the preamble, from the States by name, to the more general expression "the United States," and this too without supposing that it was to convey a different idea as to the parties to the Constitution. The revised draft contained a proviso that the Constitution should go into operation when adopted and ratified by nine States. It was, of course, uncertain whether more than nine States would adopt it, or not, and if they should not, it would be altogether improper to name them as parties to that instrument. As to one of them, Rhode Island, not being represented in the Convention, it would be altogether improper to insert her as a party. Hence it became necessary to adopt a form of expression which would apply to those who should ratify the Constitution, and not to those who should refuse to do so. And it simply means, "We, the people of those States who have united for that purpose, do ordain," &c. This construction corresponds with the historical fact, and reconciles the language employed with the circumstances of the case. The word "people" was plural as well as singular at that period; indeed, it was so used up to the year 1847, when the expression "peoples" was suggested by Kossuth, who said that the Austrians and Hungarians were two peoples.

The Government under the Articles of Confederation, having only been in existence six years at the time of the framing of the Constitution, it would have been an absurdity to repeat the word "perpetual" on the latter document, and a less permanent term was inserted—a "more perfect" union. Now, this language is quite moderate in its character. The Government was only to be "perfect" as long as it lasted. The work of human hands can never be so "perfect" as to be "perpetual;" "perpetual" motion has not yet been discovered.

In the opinion of many sound lawyers, each one of the Northern States has now a right under the existing treaties to despatch Ministers to Europe. The bond of Union between them—the Constitution—has been broken by the Lincoln Administration, and they are only held together by the inertia of a large military force. Mr. Madison, in his inaugural address, declared the duties of the Federal Government to be: "to support the Constitution, which is the cement of the Union, as well in its limitation as in its authorities; to respect the rights and authorities reserved to the States, and to the people, as equally incorporated with, and essential to, the success of the general system; to avoid the slightest interference with the rights of conscience or the functions of religion, so wisely exempted from civil jurisdiction; in behalf of private and personal rights, and the freedom of the press," &c., &c.

The Lincoln Government is as revolutionary in its character as that of its neighbours in the South-West—the Mexican States. Indeed, there is a striking similarity between them. The difficulties that have existed in the latter country for the last thirty years, have been altogether owing to the interference by the Central authorities with the rights of the individual States, and the constant effort to form a consolidated power.

Your obedient Servant,

LONDON, May 2nd.

THE ST. JAMES'S HALL MEETING.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—In one of your recent numbers some remarks appeared upon a meeting in St. James's Hall of persons who professed to be Trades Unionists. On last Saturday evening, Mr. Bright and a deputation presented an address, and a copy of resolutions, from that meeting to Mr. Adams, the representative here of the Northern States. Mr. Bright described this meeting on that evening as one of Trades Unionists, and intimated to Mr. Adams that the Trades Unions now were moving in favour of the Morrill tariff on British goods and the Butler tax on Confederate cotton—not indeed in so many words, but by the assertion of their sympathy with the North in this struggle—the Butler tax and the Morrill tariff being both items of Federal policy as consistent with Mr. Bright's political principles as the war encouraged by him is with his religious professions.

In these circumstances, that is to say in reference to your notice and Mr. Bright's misrepresentations, perhaps you will allow me to say that the meeting in St. James's Hall had no more to do with Trades Unions than with secular societies, and probably not so much. The meeting was not attended by delegates from any Trades Union. It was not confined to members of Trades Unions. It was not paid for from the funds of Trades Unions. The orators were not all members of Trades Unions. Mr. Bright, the chairman, certainly is not a member of one of these societies; and the affair has been repudiated by the representatives of some Trades Unions. Others have not interfered in the matter from a conviction that the non-political character of their societies is well known. As the St. James's Hall Meeting was not one of Trades Societies, you may not object to know its real character. It was addressed by persons who talk frequently in the meetings for political and secular discussions among the working classes and the classes who assemble in taverns. Its expenses were paid by a donation of £20 or £25 from the new Emancipation Society; and by the gifts of some of that union's supporters. The "new" Emancipation Society should be distinguished from the "old;" for the members of the older body never proposed to be generous at other people's expense alone, but always carried with them the idea of compensation. They never proposed to confiscate.

Mr. Bright has thus attempted to deceive Mr. Adams, President Lincoln, and every other remote person interested in the question, by representing a gathering of his own Emancipation Society, devised by its office-bearers, addressed chiefly by an able, acute, but ruined, and experienced opponent of Trades Societies, and paid for from the funds of that Emancipation Society, as a meeting of the Trades Unions.

Yours respectfully,

N. S.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

On the 30th of April, at sunrise, the Federal forces commenced the passage of the Rappahannock, and it is alleged that the bulk of the army has crossed the river. Having stated thus much, we have given all that is known about the latest attempt of the Federals to march on to Richmond. The intelligence is accompanied by the usual prognostics of the speedy triumph of the invincible Northern army, and congratulations on the easy way in which the Confederate Commander has been outgeneralled.

The news of the advance was known in New York in time to have forwarded it to Europe, via Halifax, by the Arabia, but the military superintendent had imperative orders to permit no information relative to the army of General Hooker to be given to the public. The movement was intended to be a grand surprise, but since it was known in New York, it seems to us that no detriment to the service could have ensued from its transmission to Europe. The movement has, in a certain sense, been a surprise to Europe, and very possibly to the South, but it cannot be supposed that the Confederates were taken unawares and at a disadvantage. The heights of Fredericksburg are too near the scene of the movements of General Hooker for them to have been effected without detection. The assumption of the Confederates being surprised is founded on the unopposed passage of the river, but it seems to us that General Lee may have good reason for rejoicing at this movement.

The programme of the North is, that General Lee will be outflanked, and that he has no alternative but to march out and fight, "with the certainty that, if defeated, his whole army will be destroyed or captured." Suppose General Lee refuses to march out. What then? Either General Hooker must attack the Confederate position on the heights of Fredericksburg, or proceed on his way to Richmond, leaving General Lee at his leisure to march out and fall upon his rear. We do not presume to prophesy the issue of the new campaign, but we submit there is nothing to justify arrogant confidence and preliminary rejoicings on the part of the Federals. We know the Confederates will do their best, and that the military position of the Confederates in Virginia was never stronger or less assailable than it is at present. General Hooker was obliged to advance or resign, for an advance was necessary to the Lincoln Government. He has chosen the former alternative. If he succeeds, the plea of necessity will be needless; if he fails, the plea of necessity will not save him from popular denunciation. In a few days we shall learn whether Hooker has attacked the heights of Fredericksburg, or gone "on to Richmond," leaving a powerful enemy in his rear.

The Confederate advance in Western Virginia and Maryland has caused considerable excitement. It is supposed that the object is to break up the Baltimore and Ohio railroads. It is said that the Confederates have only small bodies of troops engaged in this expedition. General Stonewall Jackson is reported to be at the head of these forces. The latest advices state, "There is a large Confederate force at Morgantown, Western Virginia, on the Pennsylvania State line of railway. They have repulsed Colonel Mulligan at Fairmount, and destroyed the Baltimore and Ohio bridges at Fairmount and Cheat River."

On the 26th of April it was officially announced at Washington that twelve more transports had passed Vicksburg on the 23rd, without serious damage, except to one, which was sunk. It was next stated that "four Federal transports, which attempted to pass Vicksburg on the 23rd, were sunk, and two others badly damaged;" and now we are again assured that only one transport was sunk. What are we to believe?

General Banks is said to have made a successful expedition into the Bayou Teche country, and that he has taken 1,500 prisoners, and a large amount of stores. It is also reported that he has taken possession of the Opelousas railroad, and communicated with Admiral Farragut. General Banks in two engagements has lost 7,000 men killed and wounded.

The reports from Missouri are contradictory. A body of 3,000 Confederates, under General Marmaduke, are said to have been defeated at Cape Girardeau, and, of course, "hotly pursued by the Federals." Another report says, it was only a part of General Marmaduke's forces that were engaged at Cape Girardeau. In the meantime, we are informed that General Price is at Little Rock, Arkansas, preparing for the campaign in Missouri.

In St. Louis 200 Confederates seized, during the night, the fastest steamer at the levee, and escaped with her. A still more dashing adventure is reported from Mobile. Eighteen men from that city proceeded to the mouth of the Mississippi, and captured a Federal tugboat, which they ran through the blockading fleet into Mobile. An account of this enterprise will be found in another part of our impression.

The New York papers state that the second Federal expedition to Yazoo River has proved a failure. Also that the Federal pickets have been driven in, and skirmishing has recommenced upon the Nasemonde River.

The report of the committee appointed by the Federal Congress to inquire into the conduct of the war has been published, and the New York Herald says that the revelations "are of a scandalous character, calculated to damage the President and his Cabinet, and to throw a wet blanket on the national enthusiasm for the war, so as to prepare the way to bring it to a close as soon as possible, with a divided Union and two Independent Governments." There is, at all events, enough in the report to justify angry comments. The object of the committee was, evidently, to damage General McClellan. The first question put to General Hooker was, "To what do you attribute the failure of the peninsular campaign?" And to this he replied, "I do not hesitate to say that it is to be attributed to the want of generalship on the part of our commander." Hooker's plan, when he arrived at York Town, has the merit of extreme simplicity. He says he should have got to the rear of the Confederates. "They would run the moment we got to their rear, and we could have picked up the prisoners." A charming arrangement, we admit; but it might have been frustrated by the obstinate Confederates not allowing Hooker to get in their rear. Hooker could have taken Richmond half a dozen times. He knew no reason why General McClellan did not throw his army between York Town and Williamsburg, and capture and destroy the enemy's army. After the Battle of Williamsburg, he thinks "we could have moved right on, and got into Richmond by the second day after the battle without another gun being fired." And here let us bear testimony to the unscrupulous accuracy of General Hooker. Speaking of the battle of Williamsburg, he says, "I have since learned from most reliable sources that when the news of that battle reached Richmond, Jefferson Davis and Governor Letcher moved their families out of Richmond, removed the archives and their libraries; and every citizen who could command a vehicle had his goods piled on waggons and prepared to abandon the city. They only returned—those who had left—when they found that the pursuit ceased—I might almost say was abandoned." How kind to inform the Committee that those who did not leave did not return! After the battle of Fair Oaks he was equally sure of getting into Richmond. In answer to Mr. Chandler, he said, "I would say that at no time during the whole of that campaign did I feel that we could not go to Richmond." Judging of General Hooker's military capacity, from his examination before the Committee, we are inclined to think that if he had been in command of the Army of the Potomac, he and a considerable portion of his forces would have speedily found their way to Richmond under an escort. Hooker went to McClellan (so he says) and pressed him to take Richmond, and when he returned to his camp he found an order from his commander to prepare himself with three days' rations and the usual amount of ammunition. "I firmly believed that order meant Richmond. I had said to General McClellan that if we were unsuccessful it would probably cost him his head; but that he might as well die for an old sheep as for a lamb." This was a curious way to encourage his Commander to advance. It seems that McClellan declined to die for Hooker or any other old sheep. In reference to the battle of Malvern, Hooker was asked, "Could you have gone into Richmond after that fight?" and he promptly replied, "I have no doubt we could." When interrogated about the treatment of Pope, he said, "I myself felt as though Pope was not supported. But it was a matter of feeling. I had no opportunity of knowing the facts in the case." No one who reads the testimony of the feeling Joseph Hooker can be surprised that he should sympathize with the invincible John Pope. Hooker's comments on the battle of Antietam are poetical and affecting. He tells us before the battle began the soldiers "almost rent the skies with their cheers." He says, "I felt as though there would be troops enough with me to drive the rebel army into the Potomac, or to destroy it; and I expected to be able to do that by 3 o'clock that day." He was wounded, and had to leave the field; but if he could not fight he could feel. "As an evidence of my feeling when I left the field, I telegraphed to my brother-in-law—supposing they would be anxious about me—that we had won a great battle. I did not suppose that anything could happen by which any drawn battle could be made of it. I telegraphed that we had won a great battle, which had been severely contested on both sides." This was a cool proceeding, especially as he admits that before leaving the field "I had lost about 4,000 men myself." Perhaps this mistake about the result of the battle of Antietam made Hooker rather reckless of life, for in his testimony about the campaign under General Burnside—whom he does not like better than McClellan—he says he did not hesitate to make the attack at Fredericksburg, though he knew it to be useless, because "it made no difference what became of me." This humility is touching. If he had been killed at the battle of Fredericksburg the world would not have been favoured with this comic version of the history of the war in Virginia. Mr. Lincoln loves a joke and we presume a joker, and if he had been called upon to attend the funeral obsequies of "fighting Joe," he would no doubt have paraphrased, in his own West County vernacular, the exclamation of Prince Henry when he thought Falstaff dead, "I could better have spared a better man."

General McClellan's examination proves him to be a gentleman, for it does not abound in charges brought against his comrades, and it displays admirable temper. He seems to have answered all the questions addressed to him for the purpose of proving that he was a coward, with the utmost coolness. It is unnecessary for us to criticize General McClellan's tactics. His failure is a sufficient criticism.

The Alabama has captured the Federal ship Morning Star, which was released on giving bonds for $60,000.

The Confederate steamer St. John, bound for Nassau, has been captured off Cape Roman. The crew escaped.

The Prize Court has ordered the cargo of the Peterhoff to be landed and examined, to ascertain if there is contraband of war on board. This is merely done to make the proceedings as vexatious as possible to the English owners. Unless the Peterhoff was engaged in an unlawful voyage—that is, was not going from a neutral port to a neutral port—her cargo cannot be contraband. Is her cargo to be adduced as evidence of her destination? Suppose the Peterhoff had guns on board, would that prove that she did not intend to deliver the mail with which she was charged? The Federals call medicine contraband. Will a box of quinine, if found amongst the cargo of the Peterhoff, be sufficient to condemn her? Once admit the principle that the cargo and not the destination of a vessel is to be the test of the lawfulness of a voyage—or that the cargo is to be a proof of destination, and we must forthwith give up our trade with all the neutral ports that the Federals choose to blockade.

It is stated that arrears of pay to the Federal army amounting to nearly $60,000,000, have been liquidated, but that the arrears due to the widows of soldiers have not been paid. The Federal Government wants the soldiers and does not want the widows, and it pays those who can render it a service.

There is some talk of taking California out of the Union and establishing a Pacific Republic. The New York Herald says, "If California ever throws off the Federal control, it will be the work of Northern men, who will refuse to pay crushing taxation, or to regard the Constitution laws."

The price of gold at New York, on the 1st of May was 50½ per cent. premium.

CONFEDERATE ARRIVALS.—The Hon. C. J. McRae, of Alabama, whose arrival on an important financial mission in connection with the Confederate Loan has been for some time expected, arrived at Southampton by the last West India steamer. He has at once proceeded by the Havre packet to Paris. We also learn the arrival, by same steamer, of Charles Walsh, Esq. President of the Bank of Mobile.

ENGLAND.

There is a decrease in the number of persons receiving parochial relief in Lancashire of 5450. We have already explained that this does not imply a proportionate diminution or relaxation of the severity of the misery resulting from the cotton famine. There is, however, a very slight increase in the amount of employment given by the factories: arising, however, rather from a resumption of full work by those who were only working half-time, than from the opening of mills hitherto closed. It is important to notice [this distinction, which has a considerable bearing on the condition of the trade. Half-time can never pay, for the expenses of working half-time are more than half those of working full time, while the produce is only one-half. If, therefore, it pay a millowner to work at all, it pays him best to work as long hours as the law allows. But when to work at all involves loss, it may easily occur that the loss is less on working half-time; and this is generally the case when, as now, the loss is caused by a rise in the price of the raw material. Hence, while the reopening of a few mills for half-time would suggest that the proprietors were influenced either by feelings of compunction, or by a desire to keep their work-people together, or by some other motive altogether irrespective of the prospects of trade, the change from half-time to full-time of mills already open gives us reason to ask whether it may not have been found that, even at present prices, particular kinds of calico may, under special circumstances, be woven at a profit? If so, there is pro tanto an improvement, however trivial, in the home prospects of the factory folk.

The circular of Messrs. Neill Brothers and Co. contains some important facts and suggestions in regard to the cotton supply. It appears that the increased imports of cotton from the East Indies, of which we have heard so much, are, in fact, non-existent, while the minor sources of supply, though some of them have greatly increased their exports, still send us so little that their crops hardly deserve to be enumerated. "Comparing the imports of 1862 with those of 1861, we find that India has given us an increase of 6½ per cent., Egypt 44 per cent., and Brazil 35 per cent. We have heard a great deal of the West Coast of Africa, but the yield has been only 3,300 cwts., against 1,300 in 1861; and of the West Indies, but they have only given 10,400 cwts., against 9,400 the previous year. In 1861 the imports from Turkey were 633 cwts.; in 1862, 41,212 cwts.; but the crop now coming in is estimated by competent authorities at 100,000 bales, or 300,000 cwts." This firm expects a further reduction of stocks, and probably a rise in price during the next few months. From May to September, inclusive, according to their estimates, the balance of supply and consumption will be somewhat as follows:—

SUPPLY.		CONSUMPTION.
	Bales.		Bales.
Indian .....	275,000	Home (21 weeks)
Other .....	165,000	at 23,000 .....	483,000
Stock in Liverpool..	369,000	Foreign demand ..	210,000
		Balance in hand at close of September	116,000
Total ....	809,000	Total ....	809,000

This estimate would reduce the stock in Liverpool, at the close of September, so low as to ensure a rise even above the present high prices. Nevertheless, if the estimate of 23,000 bales for home consumption be realized, it will at least imply a certain improvement in the labour market of Lancashire, where recently the demand did not exceed 15,000 bales per week.

It should be borne in mind that the factory operatives are paid by the piece; that Surats take much more care, and give much more trouble to both spinners and weavers than American cotton; and that consequently at the same ratio of pay a worker earns far less now in the same time than was the case before June, 1861. In fact, before that time, a married couple could earn enough in two days' work for the bare subsistence of themselves and a child; a small family could maintain themselves by half-work; whereas, now full work barely furnishes a sufficient maintenance. With experience, and improvements in machinery, this evil will diminish; but Surats will always be so liable to break, and give so much trouble, that the operatives must earn much less, or the purchaser give much more for inferior wares than heretofore, until the cultivation of cotton in the Confederate States is sufficiently recovered to drive Surats once more out of the market, except for the purpose of admixture with low American cotton in the most inferior class of goods.

A curious and not very creditable correspondence has been published in the Times, relative to a matter which engaged the attention of the House of Commons on Thursday night. It seems that the American Minister at Rio, one General Webb, whose connection with the New York Press is more notorious than the services which have procured him his military rank or his diplomatic position, had a quarrel over the whist-table with Mr. Christie, whose want of temper, diplomatic reserve, and gentlemanly feeling contributed in no small degree to produce the recent misunderstanding between this country and Brazil. So far as we can understand the merits of the quarrel (both parties to which liberally accuse one another of lying, while neither can be held entitled to implicit credence from others), it appears that Mr. Christie and General Webb were partners; that the General complained of Mr. Christie's play, and the latter retorted by a somewhat petulant remark upon his colleague's talkativeness; that General Webb thereupon threatened to inflict personal chastisement on Mr. Christie; that threats were used on both sides, and that the matter did not end in a duel. Mr. Christie was no doubt placed in a difficult position, when once he had come to high words with a person of General Webb's character; and it seems that the latter behaved like a ruffian and a bully. But we know too much of the previous history of the British Envoy—of his disgraceful quarrels with his own attachés, of his insolence to them, of his squabbles with his diplomatic colleagues, of his outrageous impertinence to the very courteous Minister for Foreign Affairs, of the intemperate language of his despatches to Lord Russell in vituperation of that courteous Minister—to believe that he was blameless in the matter. It is a pity that personal friendship for a diplomatist so utterly unworthy to represent a great country should have led so many gentlemen in the House of Commons to uplift their voices in Mr. Christie's behalf. As for General Webb, Lord Russell, no doubt, did right to treat his letter in accusation of Mr. Christie with the contempt which it merited; but Lord Russell's successor will do better still to recall Mr. Christie from a post which he is utterly incompetent to fill. His antagonist is, we do not doubt, a fit representative of the present Government of the United States; and while that Government remains in office, he will naturally continue to do its bidding at Rio de Janeiro. For the rest, the English public is likely to take a very impartial view of this disgraceful quarrel, and to sum up its judgment by classing both the brawlers together as "Arcades ambo"—according to the Byronic translation of that phrase.

The conduct of the Piedmontese Government in the Neapolitan provinces has furnished both Houses of Parliament with matter for somewhat angry discussion. That of the House of Lords may be briefly dismissed. Mr. Bishop is an amiable gentleman, of weak judgment and Legitimist principles, who allowed himself to be made certainly the letter-carrier and probably the accomplice of the reactionary conspirators in Naples. He was guilty of treason, we have no doubt; and if he had been at once put on his trial for treason, fairly tried, convicted, and hanged, nothing could have been said. The difficulty which exists in the way of English intervention on his behalf is simply this: that he ought to have been tried, not for conspiracy, but for treason, and that his sentence should have been, not ten years at the galleys, but death. As it is, Lord Russell has obtained a promise of his eventual pardon; and this would have satisfied everybody, if Lord Russell would have refrained from defending the entire proceedings of the Piedmontese authorities. It would be wiser to admit frankly the extreme severity of the Italian Government in its Neapolitan provinces; to rebuke and protest against its errors; and having thus secured their own reputation for candour, to point out that, after all, the present condition and prospects of Italy are better than they could have been had Naples and Sicily not fallen under Sardinian rule. It is in vain to deny a fact so patent as the badness and unpopularity of the present Administration of the Neapolitan provinces: it is absurd to deprecate discussion of the conduct of the Italian Government, and at the same time to take credit for having used the power of England to create and aggrandise that Government. We trust that the exposure of their faults in the English Parliament may do something to bring the rulers of Italy to amendment: for their present career is painful and discouraging to their well-wishers.

The Anglo-Saxon steamer, from Liverpool and Londonderry, for Portland or Quebec, with 360 passengers, and a crew of eighty-four men, was shipwrecked off Cape Race, in a dense fog, on the 27th ult. About 180 persons have been saved; the fate of a few is uncertain; but there is every reason to believe that nearly 250 must have perished. The telegrams received at Boston state that the ship went ashore about four miles east of Cape Race, at noon, on the 27th; that seventy-three persons escaped by means of ropes and spars, and upwards of one hundred in different boats, but that the deck broke up about an hour after the vessel struck, and it would seem that all who were then on board perished. The New York journals say:—"The terrible disaster to the Anglo-Saxon would, undoubtedly, have been avoided but for the unaccountable refusal of the British Government to permit the Associated Press, the New York underwriters, the Transatlantic Steam Companies, and other parties in New York, to place one of Daboll's powerful air trumpets at Cape Race, which could be distinctly heard in foggy weather from six to ten miles at sea, and would save millions of property and hundreds of lives."

EUROPE.

THE session of the Corps Legislatif was closed on Friday by a speech from the Duke de Morny, in which he thanked the members for the confidence and kindness they had shown him, and expressed the wish that they might all meet again. M. de Morny said:—"A Government without control and without criticism is like a vessel without ballast. The absence of contradiction blinds and sometimes misleads the Government, and does not tranquillise the country. Our discussions have done more to increase security than a deceitful silence could have effected. * * * Political daily contact has brought you to esteem and honour one another. In spite of the warmest discussions you must admit that the most opposite opinions have softened down and yielded a little towards each other. How many prejudices have been removed, and how much mistrust has vanished?"

M. de Persigny has written a circular to the prefects, in which he points out the course they are to pursue in the elections, which are definitely fixed for the 31st of May, with reference to the several candidates.

"If," he says, "there were in France as in England only parties divided as to the conduct of affairs, but equally attached to all fundamental institutions, the Government might confine itself in the elections to watching the struggle of the different opinions; but in France there are parties which are only factions. Formed of the wrecks of fallen governments, though weakened every day by time, they only seek to insinuate themselves into the heart of our institutions in order to vitiate their principles, and only invoke liberty to turn it against the State." "In presence of a coalition of rancour, hostilities, and disappointment, the duty of the Prefect is to leave full liberty for candidates to come forward for the publication and distribution of professions of faith and balloting papers; but at the same time to openly designate the candidates in whom the Government has confidence, that the populations may know who are the friends and who the adversaries more or less disguised of the Empire."

A telegram from Halifax announces that Puebla was invested on the 23rd of March, that the bombardment opened on the 27th, that a breach was made on the 31st, and the assault at once given. The Plaza de Armas and the cathedral, which had been fortified, were captured, and nothing remained to the Mexicans, who fought with great courage and determination, but Forts Guadalupe and Loreto. The success cost the French 150 killed and 500 wounded. The announcement is likely enough to prove correct, but the authority is not a reliable one.

We are sorry to say that the Empress is unwell; an evening party at the Tuileries had, on that account, to be postponed. Prince Napoleon and the Princess Clotilde have arrived in Egypt.

The Russian Government has published the notes it has received from Sweden, Spain, and Italy, together with its replies. Neither applications nor answers contain anything important. Prince Gortschakoff is civil, only allowing himself a polished sneer at the Italian Government. The Swiss Federal Council has, as a matter of course, declined to take any part in the intervention. The wonder is that Earl Russell should have asked it to do so. A State whose neutrality is guaranteed by Europe, has no business to interfere in European quarrels. The English and French Governments are believed to be engaged in negotiations, having for their object the attainment of an understanding as to the further steps to be taken.

The rumour that the question will be referred to a Congress acquires consistency. La France says that Russia accepts the principle of a Congress, and the Kreuz Zeitung of Berlin, which is more likely to know what are the views of the Russian Government, thinks that it is favourable to the scheme.

There has been much hard fighting in Poland during the last few days, the general result being rather in favour of the Russians. The principal scenes of conflict have been the neighbourhood of Kalisch, where very strong bands of insurgents, continually reinforced from Posen, have for some time made head against the Russians and the Galician frontier, round about Sandomir. Our space will not allow us to array the telegraph triumphs on each side, and appreciate the credit to be given to each, and it would be labour lost, for before the result reached our readers fresh telegrams would, in all probability, have arrived, giving a totally fresh character to the struggle. Great devastations have been committed, it is said, in Livonia, in the neighbourhood of Dunaberg, by a body of fanatics whom the Russian Government, hitherto barely tolerating, has called to its aid. They have attacked the houses of the nobility, stripped them of their valuables, and grossly maltreated the inmates; several ladies are said to have sustained horrible outrages at their hands. A London newspaper, which has already made some terrible blunders about Livonia and Courland, describes these outrages in evidently very exaggerated terms, and goes so far as to pretend that the perpetrators were Russian soldiers disguised as these dissidents. That, however, is too gross an experiment upon the credulity even of the British public, prepared as it is to believe everything bad of the Russians. The Russian Government cannot afford to disperse its soldiers in such a way, and certainly if it did allow them to pillage and murder, it would not take the trouble to disguise them. The Polish accounts speak of these dissidents—Raskolniks they are called—as the criminals. If they were Russians in disguise, the journals of the insurrection would take care to blazon the abomination.

The agitation in Polish Prussia seems to augment. The Government has redoubled its vigilance. The police have made many domiciliary visits and arrested a large number of persons. The Government had serious thoughts of proclaiming the state of siege, but the provincial authorities have reported that they can maintain order without its adoption.

The Minister of Justice has applied to the House of Deputies for permission to prosecute two of the Polish members of the House for high treason,—Count Dzialinski and Herr Guttry—the prosecution being probably based upon information obtained by the seizure of papers made at the house of Count Dzialinski. The Count is said to be with the insurgents in the Government of Kalisch. Herr Guttry is reported to be in Brussels. Two more members of the House will probably be prosecuted—one, Bentkowski, was aide-de-camp to Langiewicz, and was arrested by the Austrian Government at Cracow; the other, Niegolowski, is said to be with one of the insurgent bands on the Wartha.

The Prussian House of Deputies has commenced the discussion of the law for the reorganization of the army. It has to choose between the proposition of the Government, which retains the three years' service with the augmentation of the cadres, and the other alterations to which the country is so much opposed; the proposition of the Committee, which, insisting on the two years' service, allows a yearly levy of 60,000 men, and the resolution of the extreme Liberal party, which, proceeding from the principle that the present Government can be trusted with nothing, declares that not more than 40,000 men should be levied in each year. A host of amendments have been presented, offering compromises between these different views, and it is probable that if the proposal of the Committee is not accepted, one of these mediating proposals approaching pretty nearly to it, will be successful.

The discussion has been broken off by the recurrence of an old difficulty. None of the Ministers are members of the House, and they are present at its sittings only in their ministerial capacity. On that ground the present ministry, as did that of Van der Heydt, deny the right of the President of the House to limit a Minister's freedom of speech by calling him to order. They deny that they are in the slightest degree subject to his authority. Our readers will remember that a few weeks since Herr von Bismark Schonhausen flatly told the Vice-President presiding, that he could pay no regard to his authority. The present squabble has arisen from an expression employed by Herr von Roon, the Minister at War. He described a remark of Herr von Sybel as an "unwarrantable assumption," and was interrupted by the President. The Minister disputed the powers of the latter, who put on his hat, and adjourned the House.

The dispute was thus brought to a crisis. At the sitting of the following morning the President had to read a letter signed by the Ministers, stating that so long as the House supports the assumption made by the President, of a right to limit the Ministerial freedom of speech, the Cabinet will no longer attend the sittings of the House.

The letter was referred to a special committee, which has already made its report, recommending the House not to assent to the Ministerial demand; and until this great privilege question is settled, the debates upon the army re-organization will necessarily be suspended. We confess that, with all our sympathy for the cause which the House of Deputies is maintaining, we are inclined to consider that the Ministers have some justification for their pretention. They form no part of the House, and they certainly do not attend its meetings for their own pleasure. Our readers will remember that upon several occasions the House has complained loudly of their absence, and summoned them to attend. The only object which the deputies have in enforcing that attendance is, that they may have the pleasure of abusing Herr von Bismarck or Von Roon to their faces. The breach between the House and the Ministry is so wide that no explanation or discussion can close it, and the Ministers naturally have an objection to sit like so many criminals in the dock before a succession of vituperative orators, whose violent denunciations and bitter gibes are rapturously received by the House, which interrupts the Ministers at every sentence with laughter and other noises. The members put no curb upon their tongues; and the Presidents, who are all active members of the Liberal party, take little trouble to restrain them; whilst, on the other hand, they are very quick to call out against a strong expression which falls from the Ministerial table. We speak of what we have ourselves seen, and for that reason we are not disposed to condemn the proceedings of Herr von Bismarck and his colleagues.

The question once raised so distinctly, it cannot be settled easily. Either the Ministers or the House must give way—that is to say, suffer a great humiliation, or the House will be left to carry on its debates without the Ministers, and then they will lose half their interest and effect.

The Danish Rigsraad—the Legislative Assembly originally established for the whole Monarchy, including Holstein and Lauenburg, but, since the revocation in 1838 of the common constitution for the two German duchies, representing only Denmark proper and Schleswig—is now engaged in discussing an address in answer to the speech from the throne. Although the great majority of the Assembly are disposed to sustain the King and his ministers in their recent action with respect to Holstein, the measure does not escape criticism. If the Danes are desirous to maintain their national independence, they are equally determined to defend their constitutional privileges. And although they accept the ordinance of the 30th March as the best solution of the difficulty, they cannot exactly stomach the determination of so weighty a step by the King's good pleasure, and without the previous assent of the Rigsraad. Meanwhile the Germans are gnashing their teeth, and vowing a terrible vengeance upon Denmark, as soon as they are in a position to take it. The leading Prussian journals, for instance, are quite beside themselves with rage. They feel the utter inability of Prussia to do anything now, and they can only console themselves by reviving the absurd pretensions to Schleswig, which they may make themselves quite certain Europe will, under no circumstances, allow them to establish. The Diet is deliberating what it shall do in the matter. The Austrian Government is said to have recommended the seizure of Holstein as a "material guarantee;" but Austria herself is not now in a position to carry the recommendation into effect.

From Madrid we learn that the sittings of the Cortes have been suspended, whether with a view to a dissolution we are not informed. From Lisbon we have the announcement that the King of Portugal has left his dominions, on a foreign tour, intended to have some two months' duration, having first ascertained from the Chambers that the country could do without his presence so long.

The state of Greece—whose chance of getting a king has declined again—is very unsatisfactory. Telegrams from Trieste confirm the announcement of the resignation of Ministers, and speak of an agitation hostile to the King designate; whilst Otho has made the—in the present state of the Greek Treasury crushing—demand of six million drachmas for his private property.

A telegram announces that an earthquake at Rhodes on the 22nd, occasioned the destruction of 2,000 houses and a proportionate loss—a most ambiguous phrase—of human life. It is strange that fuller particulars should not have reached us before this.

The Turkish Minister for Foreign Affairs, Aali Pasha, has addressed a circular to the Representatives of the Sublime Port at Paris and London, in which he declares that the Sultan cannot allow any further prosecution of the works of the Suez Canal except upon the fulfilment of certain conditions which he specifies.

In the first place, an international agreement must guarantee the neutrality of the canal in the same way as the neutrality of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles is secured; secondly, the freed labour by which the canal has hitherto been constructed must be abolished. 60,000 men, the Pasha says, are now kept from their families and callings by the canal. And lastly, the Company must abandon the clause in the contract which surrenders them the whole territory bordering on the canal—a clause which the Pasha says would give them the frontier of Syria, and allow the establishment in the empire of colonies almost independent of it. These conditions satisfied, the Sultan will take the contract into consideration, and if the Company cannot, or will not, satisfy them, he is willing to return the money they have expended, although, as they have incurred the expenditure without obtaining his assent, which the contract they entered into with the late Pasha made a fundamental condition, they have no right to reimbursement. This despatch has excited much feeling in Paris, where it is regarded as a result of British intrigues, with very little reason. Lord Palmerston is, indeed, opposed to the canal, but Earl Russell and some other members of the Cabinet have expressed themselves strongly in its favour.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, MAY 7.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The bill sent up from the Commons, for the prevention of corrupt practices at parliamentary elections, passed through committee.

Lord Redesdale moved a resolution intended to prevent clauses being inserted in Railway Bills—which are private bills—giving power to tenants for life of entailed estates to charge those estates with a rent-charge for the purpose of constructing railways, on the plea that their construction would benefit the estate. Lord St. Leonards, formerly Chancellor, supported this resolution. Viscount Eversley—late Speaker of the House of Commons—moved, as an amendment: "That while this House is of opinion that the question of empowering land-owners to charge settled estates for the purpose of taking shares in railways contiguous to those estates ought to be dealt with as soon as possible by a public Act (which should also comprehend provisions for charging estates for drainage, building, and other improvements), it is not prepared to withdraw from the consideration of Committees on Railway Bills clauses which may confer such powers; provided that such securities and conditions be obtained as shall be satisfactory to the committee, and that the charge so imposed shall be in the form of a rent-charge for a term not exceeding twenty-five years; provided, also, that no such charge shall be imposed unless it has been proved to the satisfaction of the Enclosure Commissioners that the proposed railway will confer a permanent benefit to a greater annual amount than the said rent-charge on the lands through or near to which it is intended to pass, nor until the said railway has been completed and opened for traffic under the authority of the Board of Trade."—Lord Granville opposed the motion. But, after a brief debate, the amendment was withdrawn, and the motion agreed to. Their Lordships then adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 7.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Monckton Milnes, referring to a letter received at the Foreign Office from General Webb, the American Minister at Rio de Janeiro, relative to a quarrel between that gentleman and Mr. Christie, her Majesty's representative there, complained that this letter had been quoted in the House on a former occasion, by Mr. Bramley-Moore. That member spoke in terms of censure of the conduct of Mr. Christie; and he had declined to withdraw or explain away his language. Mr. Milnes therefore asked a question tending to elicit a full approval of Mr. Christie's conduct.—Lord Palmerston expressed that approval in energetic terms, and said that Lord Russell had treated General Webb's letter with the contempt it deserved.—Mr. Bramley-Moore said it was notorious that Mr. Christie's temper had involved him in quarrels with nearly all his diplomatic colleagues. Moreover, Mr. Christie's pretence that his conduct had been approved by the British merchants at Rio was wholly incorrect. Eighteen firms had signed an address approving it; but forty firms, representing by far the greater part of the wealth and respectability of the British community at Rio, had refused to sign that address.—Lord Palmerston said that British merchants residing abroad were not entitled to criticize the conduct of Her Majesty's representative in the country where they resided. He was to look to the approval of his Government, not to theirs. And the British merchants who had expressed disapproval of Mr. Christie's conduct had really been glad of what he had done, but had thought it desirable for prudential reasons to adopt a tone more agreeable to the feelings of the Brazilian Government and people.—Mr. Bouvier (a veteran Whig) and Mr. Newdegate (the champion of Protestant Toryism) praised Mr. Christie and abused Mr. Bramley-Moore.—Lord R. Cecil remarked that Mr. Christie's conduct was open to severe censure, and that members of the House had a right to express their opinions freely upon such conduct.—Mr. C. Howard followed, in eulogy of Mr. Christie.—Mr. Cobden remarked that the address presented by a minority of the British merchants at Rio did not express any approval of the conduct of Mr. Christie or of his Government, except in so far as he had acted with more forbearance towards Brazil than was justified by his instructions.—Mr. Disraeli said that it was exceedingly inconvenient that such questions should be raised in such a manner. Lord Palmerston had attacked the Brazilian Government, the British merchants in Brazil, and the American Minister there; and it was open to the friends of any of those parties, following the precedent set that night, to ask a question and raise a debate, demanding an apology for what had been said of them. Then Lord Palmerston would have another opportunity of indulging in those attacks on Foreign Governments and Foreign Ministers, which, however amusing, did not tend to conciliate goodwill abroad. He hoped that in future questions of this kind would be raised in a more formal manner.

FRIDAY, MAY 8.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Earl of Shaftesbury, in presenting a petition from the City of London in favour of Poland, directed attention to the state of that country, and expressed the sympathy which he, in common with the English people, felt in the present struggle for Polish independence. He also censured in strong terms the conduct of the Prussian Government, and indignantly denounced the oppression by Russia of the Poles. In his opinion the only remedy for the state of things unfortunately existing in Poland was its separation from Russia, for matters could not continue as they were without being a chronic danger to the peace of Europe.—The Earl of Harrowby fully sympathized with the cause of the Poles, but did not think that this country would be justified in going to war on its behalf. It was our duty, however, to use the strongest remonstrances to the Government of St. Petersburg.—Earl Russell, whilst desiring to speak with all reserve, lest he should unduly excite the hopes of the friends of Poland that the British Government would do more than interfere by diplomatic representations, expressed his confidence in the sincere and honest intentions of the Emperor of Russia towards the Poles, though he could not see that anything had yet been done to consult the welfare of the Poles or to make the concessions they were entitled to expect. With regard to the promises held out in the despatch of Prince Gortschakoff, he feared that the Poles were not disposed to attach to them any great amount of confidence, for the system pursued by Russia in Poland was not calculated to command that confidence which was requisite to the fulfilment of these promises. Such, however, were the necessary consequences of a despotic and capricious policy. In this unfortunate state of things her Majesty's Government had advised the Emperor of Russia to restore to Poland the institutions originally granted by the Emperor Alexander, and pointed out that the only means of regaining the confidence of the Poles was to intrust the judicial, civil, and political administration of their country to the hands of men upon whom he could rely, by means of an assembly elected by the Poles themselves. Unless this was done he apprehended there was no prospect of a durable peace, in the sense in which the three Western Powers had spoken; and it would be deceiving all Europe to expect any different result. With regard to the suggestion of Lord Shaftesbury, that the separation of Poland from Russia was the only solution of the difficulty, he thought that in the present temper of the Russian Government and people they would never consent to a measure of the sort, but would consider it a dismemberment of their empire, and this could only be effected after a long, dangerous, and costly war. In these circumstances the duty of Her Majesty's Government was to proceed with slow and cautious steps, and to act in conjunction with the other Great Powers in whatever they attempted to do. In conclusion, the noble earl asked the House to rely, in the first place, on the Government taking the best and most practical course they could; in the next place, on the public opinion of Europe, which not even the Emperor of Russia, autocrat though he was, would be long able to neglect; and finally, to rely on the general sense of justice which animated all men, and on that Heaven which would not allow oppression to go unpunished, or such sufferings to endure. The subject then dropped, and their Lordships soon afterwards adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 8.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Lygon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much he expected to realize by obliging clubs to take out a retail license to sell wines and spirits.—Mr. Gladstone said he did not know, and it mattered very little, as he intended to withdraw the proposal.

On the order for going into committee of supply,

Mr. Hennessy moved for further papers respecting the state of Southern Italy, and in doing so pointed out the discrepancies between the statements contained in the despatches of Mr. Consul Bonham and the returns of the Board of Trade with regard to the commerce of England with Naples and Sicily, the former representing that British trade had increased in 1862 over the previous year, whilst according to the latter there was a large falling off.—The motion was seconded by Mr. C. Bentinck.—Mr. Layard, in objecting to the motion, raised a perfect storm on the opposition benches by proclaiming that, with few exceptions, the Conservative party were opposed to Italian liberty. He contended that the Government of Italy represented the feelings of the Italian people, and that the time had passed for the House of Commons to debate the condition of that country. They might as well have a debate on the state of France or Prussia. Let the Italian Parliament, for example, ask for the production of papers relating to Ireland, what would be thought of it, but that it was a piece of impertinence, and an insult to the British nation. The accusations directed by Mr. Bentinck against Sir James Hudson and Mr. Consul Bonham, both men of high character and unimpeachable honour, excited his greatest indignation, and he appealed to the House to say whether it was generous or fair to make such representations when the men against whom they were directed were absent, and unable to defend themselves. No Government in the world possessed a more honourable, trustworthy, conscientious, and truthful set of public servants than the English Government, in its diplomatic and consular officers; and to say that they sent reports which were not to be relied upon, and withheld information which was not agreeable to their Government, was a calumny that deserved to be resented. Whether the disorders in certain parts of the Neapolitan States were brigandage or civil war might be judged of by the fact that the men who were engaged in them were foreigners, not Italians. He defied honourable members to mention the name of a single man of rank, position, or fortune in Italy who had connected himself with the movement; and that being the case, the proof was unanswerable that it was brigandage, and not civil war. He admitted that the state of Italy was not satisfactory, but he believed that no country had ever achieved its independence in so short a time with so little to complain of. Under the old Bourbon régime the kingdom of Naples had become thoroughly demoralised, its people broken down by a horrible priestly tyranny, and a most abominable civil Government, and it was not to be wondered at, if it took generations to raise them in the scale of civilization.—Lord H. Lennox was desirous of giving the results of his recent personal experience in Italy with regard to the character of Victor Emmanuel's Government. His warmest sympathies had been with the cause of Italian freedom; but the facts that had come under his observation rendered it impossible for him to go on any longer blindfolded. These facts he classed under four heads. There was at present in operation in the Neapolitan States a system of personal domestic espionage of the same description as that which prevailed under the Bourbon rule. In the next place, the severest restrictions were imposed upon the press, not only in Naples, but at Genoa, Florence, Milan, and Bologna. Then, personal liberty was not safe, and the most despotic acts were perpetrated upon the people under the benign sway of the constitutional King. And lastly, the prisons were crowded with the victims of tyranny, who had lain there for months without being brought to trial, and among them were a number of females charged upon suspicion of entertaining certain political sympathies. From all he had seen with his own eyes he came to the conclusion that the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs was misleading the people of England when last year he drew such a brilliant picture of the great political and social change effected by the Government of Victor Emmanuel.

Mr. Butler Johnstone said that some would suppose from the speech of the noble lord that entrance to the Neapolitan prisons was as difficult as to penetrate the Patriarchs' tombs, whereas nothing could be easier, for the gaols constituted one of the great sights of Naples. If those places were crowded it was because the worst of them, such as St. Elmo, had been abandoned, thus creating a natural pressure upon the others. He argued that the Italian Government were using their best exertions to improve the administration of the law and the condition of the people. They had repressed and destroyed that vicious society, the Camorra, which had been so much encouraged by the paternal government of the Bourbons. They were educating the people, establishing a new system of judicature all over the country, and creating an army and navy which were destined, he hoped some day, to make Italy something more than a mere geographical expression. With regard to brigandage, it was in the city of Rome that these bands were organised by the Bourbon committee, at whose head was the ex-King, and sent over the borders into the Neapolitan States to assist in lighting up the flames of discord. And it was this which constituted the great difficulty of the Italian Government. He admitted that many cruelties were practised in the gaols; but these were the result of the vicious system so long practised under the old dynasty, and which it was almost impossible to completely and at once put down. The Government at Turin, however, had appointed a number of humane men to preside over the gaols, and given them orders from time to time to introduce reforms. As to the light in which the Government was regarded by the people, he could only say that, so far as the most intelligent classes were concerned, they were enthusiastic in its favour.—Mr. L. Gower also defended the Italian Government, and said that the information detailed by Lord H. Lennox must be regarded as erroneous, inasmuch as he had been surrounded at Naples by agents of the Mazzinian and reactionist parties.—Mr. B. Cochrane complained of her Majesty's Government, that whereas under the Bourbon rule there was a constant interference on the part of Lord Palmerston, with a view to improving the state of affairs in Naples; in the present day, on the contrary, no effort had been made to remove or mitigate the evils under which the Neapolitans were suffering.—The debate was continued by Sir G. Bowyer, Sir P. O'Brien, Mr. Whalley, Mr. Maguire, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Slater-Booth, and Sir J. Walsh.—Lord Palmerston complimented the various speakers who had taken part in the debate on the great ability they had displayed, especially naming Lord H. Lennox, Mr. Layard, and Mr. Butler-Johnstone. With regard to the speech of Lord H. Lennox, there was nothing in all he had described which had not actually existed in the reign of former Neapolitan Sovereigns, and the only conclusion to be drawn from the noble lord's statement was that the present Government of Italy had not yet succeeded in eradicating all the abuses that had been left to them. The fact was that in the Neapolitan territories there had existed a great number of abuses, which were the relics of the system which was overthrown when Garibaldi presented the kingdom of Naples to Victor Emmanuel. In every other part of Italy there was nothing of which complaint could be made. Of six additions of territory to the Italian kingdom five had been welded together, and everything there went on satisfactorily. Naples was the only exception. And why? Because of its neighbourhood to Rome, where there was a French garrison, and that garrison protected the ex-Court of Naples. Besides that, there existed at Rome a committee of two hundred persons, whose constant employment it was to organise bands of marauders, the scum and dregs of every nation, and send them forth to Neapolitan territory to commit every sort of crime. It was they who had kept up the agitation; but it was altogether wrong to abuse the phrase by terming that civil war. He did not regret the course which her Majesty's Government had taken in the affairs of Italy. The people of Italy felt grateful to this country for the interest it had displayed in their welfare; and he had no doubt that the Italian Government would endeavour to establish order with every regard to indulgence that might be consistent with the accomplishment of that object; that no undue severity would be exercised, and that they would enforce by all the means in their power the maintenance of that authority which had been founded upon the free will of the people.—Mr. Disraeli, referring to the course which her Majesty's Government had pursued with respect to Italy, said that their policy was at first utterly distrustful of the future of that country. It was alike timid and vacillating, and on the whole he believed that, instead of assisting the patriotic views of Italian statesmen, consolidating the strength and developing the resources of Italy, it had distracted Europe and had laid the basis of future embarrassment to the world. When the great Reform Bill was withdrawn, then we heard of the capture of Rome and the establishment of a united Italy as the great measure of the session. But where was the state of Italy now? It was to be found in dismemberment, dilapidation, and utter confusion. Nothing was now said of making Rome the capital of the Peninsula; and in the debate of to night there had been no fresh menaces held out to France or promises to Italy, menaces and promises which heretofore had been equally fallacious. He hoped that the Italians would be content to consolidate their strength and develop their resources, and no longer indulge in those wild dreams of impracticable politics in which for some reason or other they had been encouraged by her Majesty's Government. Henceforward Italy must learn to depend upon herself, not upon expectations held out by English Ministers that could not be realised, or by hopes held out by French Governments which might only lead it into a most embarrassing position. He admitted that the general condition of affairs had been much ameliorated, but that amelioration was only to be secured by abandoning the wild policy of the English Government—a policy of words, not deeds.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer, after animadverting upon the manner in which Lord Henry Lennox had obtained and used his information relative to the Neapolitan prisons, said that when the present Italian Government succeeded to the possession of power in the Southern provinces they did not succeed to a paradise which they had since defiled, but to something more nearly the exact reverse, which must necessarily be the work of protracted time and gigantic labour to cleanse. Reform must begin not from below but from above. Had it begun? What did Lord H. Lennox say? That he had found at the head of every prison a man of humanity and intelligence. Doubtless there was much that was lamentable and disgraceful to the immediate agents in the system that still prevailed; but it likewise proved that the work of reform and improvement had effectually begun. The principal functionaries had been removed and replaced by better men; the light of day had been let into the inmost recesses of the darkest caverns, and there was not an abuse or a horror in existence that was not brought freely forward. As to the policy of her Majesty's Government, he appealed from the censures of Mr. Disraeli to the gratitude of the Italian people, and to the universal and enthusiastic approval of that policy by the people of England. Mr. Disraeli had talked of the renunciation by the Italian Government of extreme views; but it was no extreme view to look upon Rome as the natural capital of a strong Italian kingdom. There was one thing upon which England had made up its mind, and that was that Italy ought to be one, and ought to be free.

MONDAY, MAY 11.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Marquis of Normanby presented a petition from the Rev. Alfred Bishop, rector of Martyr Worthy, in the diocese of Chichester, complaining of the conduct of her Majesty's Government and their agents in the case of his son, Mr. James Bishop, at present undergoing a sentence of ten years' imprisonment in the fortress of Alexandria on the charge of conspiring against the Italian Government, and praying for an inquiry. The noble marquis observed that the case was without parallel, there being no instance in which a similar punishment had been inflicted upon a British subject on such a charge. There were no grounds for the charge against Mr. Bishop, and the whole question had originated with a mistake in the passport. Mr. Bishop was a young man with a weak constitution, and afflicted with lameness. He had been arrested by mistake, stripped, struck, and challenged to fight, and his sole offence was the use of the words—"By such acts as these you will not tend to make a united Italy."—The Duke of Sutherland said, he saw Mr. Bishop in prison in February last, and found him very comfortably provided for, except that he was deprived of his liberty. The authorities of the prison were under the impression that he was weak in his head, and all they had to say against him was that he was a friend of Lord Normanby.—The Earl of Hardwicke was of opinion that the treatment of Mr. Bishop had been unnecessarily harsh and severe, and that his punishment was contrary to the recognised laws of Italy.—Earl Grey differed from the noble earl with regard to the conduct of the Italian Government, who, he thought, had displayed considerable lenity. Were a foreigner convicted of such an offence in this country he would, in all probability, be hanged as a spy and a traitor. He regretted the disposition which prevailed in some quarters to throw odium upon the Italian Government, for he looked upon the success which had been achieved by Victor Emmanuel in laying the foundation of a free form of Government with admiration and astonishment.—The Earl of Carnarvon was of opinion that to a great extent Mr. Bishop had only himself to thank for all that had befallen him. He could not complain of the unfairness of the trial, but under all the circumstances, and considering Mr. Bishop's weak state of health, and that he was the citizen of a country which for the last three years had displayed special friendliness towards Italy, he did think it would have been a more graceful act to have passed a lighter sentence.—Lord Russell, in stating the course he had taken in this case, expressed great sympathy for the Rev. A. Bishop and the misfortunes of his son, an additional one being that the Marquis of Normanby had taken up the case. Having quoted the authority of Mr. Panizzi as to the fairness and impartiality of the Italian tribunals, he protested against Lord Normanby's assertion that Mr. Bishop had been convicted on insufficient evidence, especially as the decision had been confirmed on appeal, and thought it most unfair to impugn the justice of the Italian Government, and to make the House of Lords as it were a Court of Review. On hearing of the arrest of Mr. Bishop, he had taken steps to procure him a speedy trial, and after conviction a full pardon, and when that was not deemed amissible a remission of the harder part of his sentence, on the ground of his ill-health. He had received a promise that on the first fitting occasion Mr. Bishop should be proposed to the King for a free pardon. After a few words from a Lord Normanby in reply, the subject dropped, and their Lordships soon afterwards adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 12.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In reply to Mr. Hadfield, Lord C. Paget said that he had seen an article in a Liverpool paper relative to the flogging of a seaman on board H.M.S. Majestic, for striking an officer. He characterised the article as a loathsome and disgraceful libel, to which the name of another person had been forged by the writer, and said that legal measures were likely to be taken for the punishment of the offender.

In reply to Mr. Hennessy and Lord John Manners, Lord Palmerston stated that Mr. Odo Russell was right in saying that brigands escaped from Rome into the Neapolitan territory in French uniforms; that General Montebello had been misinformed in his denial of that assertion; that it rested with the French garrison to put a stop to the systematic despatch of brigands, by a committee sitting at Rome, into the Neapolitan provinces; and that both that garrison, and the Pope whom they protected, were responsible for the continuance of brigandage in those provinces.

Mr. Roebuck called attention to the dismissal of two Judges in the Ionian Islands, and inveighed bitterly against the conduct of Sir H. Storks, the British Commissioner there, to whom he attributed the act. He moved for papers.—Mr. C. Fortescue, observing that there would be no difficulty about producing the memorials and the correspondence connected with them, said the case of these two gentlemen must be judged by the law and Constitution of the Ionian Islands, and that their non-reappointment was justified by the charter and as a measure of policy. He had not a word to say against their character, and they would enjoy their pensions; but there were considerations which had operated upon the mind of Sir H. Storks and his Senate in not re-appointing them, and the decision had been received with satisfaction in the islands.—General Peel, from official knowledge of Sir Henry Storks, bore testimony to his high character.—Lord Stanley thought the question should not be looked at as one personally affecting Sir Henry Storks.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer reminded the House of the peculiar position of the Ionian Islands towards this country, and the difficulties attending their Government. All that Sir H. Storks could do was to put a veto upon the act. The Ionian authorities were not amenable to that House, which was not called upon to pronounce an opinion upon the merits of the act; he thought it a wise and just act.—After a few words from Mr. Coningham and a reply by Mr. Roebuck, the motion was agreed to.—Mr. H. Seymour moved a resolution, "That the occupation of waste lands in India by settlers, and the redemption of a portion of the land tax of India, are desirable objects, especially with a view to the present state of the cotton industry in this country; and that it is expedient that her Majesty's Government take further steps to carry them out."—A long debate took place, ending in the withdrawal of the motion.—After some further business had been disposed of, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 13.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

A bill of Mr. Hadfield, to alter the law in regard to judgments obtained in reference to real estate, was lost on the second reading by 33 ayes to 43 noes.

Sir J. Fergusson moved the second reading of a bill to limit the liability of railway companies to compensate the families of those who are murdered, and those who are personally injured, by the accidents which are constantly occurring through the greed of the companies or the recklessness of the directors and their servants. Under the bill, the largest sum to be paid in any case would be £400. Some railway directors supported the bill. The general feeling of the House, however, was strongly opposed to it.—The Solicitor-General considered that the principles of the bill were such as to render it impossible that it could receive the sanction of Parliament. Railways were not responsible for loss of life unless wrong could be shown, and the insurance proposed would be insurance against the company's own wrong. The second reading was negatived—Ayes 70, Noes, 90. So this most impudent proposal is defeated.

Mr. Alecock moved that his Church Rate Redemption Bill should be read a second time on June 10. Ayes 25, Noes 39. So the proposal was lost. The House adjourned just before Six.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, May 13, 1863.

Our last report closed on a steady market, after a considerable rise in prices; Fair Dholerah 17½d.

On Thursday the sales again reached 10,000 bales at full prices. On Friday, when the actual business of the past week was declared, the amount sold was found far to exceed the estimate; the trade had taken 48,000 bales, and exporters 18,000 bales, bringing our stock down to 330,000 bales. These figures gave increased confidence to buyers, and sales were run up to 15,000 bales at ½d. advance on American, and ½d. on other kinds. On Saturday the market continued strong, with a business again of 15,000 bales at higher prices. The sales on Monday reached a like figure at rather higher prices. Yesterday in Manchester a good healthy tone pervaded the market, and most classes of goods and yarns were rather dearer; here the business reached 10,000 bales at steady prices. To-day Bombay telegrams are to hand, reporting the India import market quiet, at slightly easier prices for the fortnight; there has consequently been less activity here, and the sales do not exceed 10,000 bales at steady prices. We quote Middling Orleans, 23½d., Fair Egyptian, 22d., Fair Dholerahs and Omrawattees, 18½d.

The news from America points to renewed activity, both in Virginia and the West. Hooker was said, at the latest dates, to be crossing the Rappahannock, and a general engagement would soon be obliged to move forward, or be compelled to retreat on Nashville. On the Mississippi the recent passage of the Vicksburg batteries by Federal gunboats had so far been productive of no important results.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, May 12, 1863.

During the whole of last week, our market has experienced a very lively demand for nearly all kinds of yarn and cloth, suitable for India, China, and other foreign markets; sluggishness of demand being only apparent amongst continental shippers of bundled yarns.

Up to Friday, home trade yarns, from Nos. 32 to 50's twist and pincoops were sold readily at an advance of fully ½d. per lb. on the previous Tuesday's quotations, whilst for the Bolton class of yarns, say from No. 60's upwards, rather more than the ½d. was obtained, these latter yarns being in very good demand from manufacturers of greenend mulls, who are busily engaged working to order.

For some kinds of water twist in bundle, also in warps, there has been a small business doing, the continental shippers being much restricted in their operations by the low limits put upon the orders from their German clients.

For China there has also been an improved business done in water twist, which if it continue, will in a great measure compensate for the small German trade.

5, 6, and 7lbs shirtings have been in good request at an advance of fully ½d. per piece on last Tuesday's prices, while for Jaconets and Mulls an increase from ½d. to 3d. per piece has been got. Madapolams, T and long cloths, also some particular kinds of printers, have improved their position during the past few days, manufacturers of the former being well in order.

To-day our market was a little depressed in tone, owing to a rumour circulating through the Exchange, to the effect that a telegram from India, dated 18th April, had been received by a house in town, which stated Nos. 40s mule twist had declined 6d. per lb., and that shirtings were also much lower in prices; but as this could not be traced to its source, very little credence was given to it, and the market closed in a very satisfactory state.

There has, again, been some little business done in Continental yarns, at a slight advance on last Friday's quotations—say about ½d. to ¾d. per lb. India and China shippers have also taken mule and water-twist in bundle, at an advance of ½d. per lb. on Friday's prices.

Home trade yarns, from Nos. 32's to 50's twist and pincoops, are better by fully ½d. per pound on Friday's prices, whilst for No. 60's and upwards the improvement is ¾d. per pound.

The demand for goods has not been quite so brisk as during the previous part of the week, still manufacturers are not inclined to enter into further contracts, unless at a further advance in price.

The only fear in this market, now that the demand is increasing so generally, is, that with the small amount of cotton at Liverpool and at sea, the increased amount of spindles and looms being put in work from day to day, will send up the price of cotton beyond the reach of spinners in a very short time.

NORTHERN VIEW OF COTTON PROSPECTS.

(From the New York Economist.)

There are those who imagine that the conclusion of the war will be followed by a return to about old prices. This opinion seems to be based on the idea that the four or four and a half millions of bales of cotton now in the South will be thrown immediately upon the market, and its value placed entirely at the dictation of the manufacturers. The mistake is very apparent. It will require, perhaps, more than the ordinary time for moving the crop to the seaboard, so that there is no prospect of a glut in the market. Nor will the manufacturer be the only party found wanting cotton. Speculators, foreseeing the future deficiency in the supply, will compete with the spinner, and put up the price to a point out of proportion to the legitimate influence of supply and demand. Moreover, it will be found at the close of the war that much less of the crop remains to be brought from the needy planter than is now anticipated. A very large proportion of the cotton crop is now virtually the property of Northern and European manufacturers and speculators. Some of our Northern corporations have already, through Southern agents, equally interested in the speculation with themselves, bought very considerable amounts of cotton in the interior of the South, to be delivered at the conclusion of peace. They have bought it at merely nominal rates, and will some day realize upon it perhaps three times the purchase value. The same is equally, or, perhaps, to a still larger extent, true of English speculators, who have now immense stocks of cotton in the South, nominally in possession of the Southern agents. It would be unsafe to conclude that the speculative buyers of this property will at once throw their purchases on the market at the opening of the ports, and thereby depreciate prices. Men who can buy so far in advance of delivery are mostly those who can afford to hold their stock for the most advantageous market, and these far-seeing cotton speculators may be trusted to make the highest possible price, be their sales effected early or late. For the above, among many reasons, we think those who imagine that cotton will sell much below 20c. per pound during the next seven years will find they have wrongly estimated probabilities.

SOUTHERN WAR NEWS.

(Associated Press telegrams to the Southern papers.)

PORT HUDSON, April 6.—The Hartford landed at Bayou Sara this morning, and destroyed the Government stores at that point. It is stated that Farragut has gone to Washington, via Memphis, on account of his health failing.

April 7.—The lower fleet has opened fire upon us, but is lying out of the reach of our batteries, firing slowly, and without effect.

VICKSBURG, April 7.—Another transport laden with troops left the Yankee fleet to-day. The enemy cut the levee and turned the water into their old camping ground on the Peninsula.

JACKSON, April 7.—The enemy is retreating up the Tallahatchie, towards the Coldwater. Our shell produced a deal of alarm in their crowded camps. Farragut, with three vessels, is just above Port Hudson.

CHARLESTON, April 8.—8 o'clock, P.M.—All quiet thus far to-day. The people and troops are in high spirits at the results of yesterday's fight. The Keokuk is certainly sunk.

The fighting was chiefly at a distance of 900 yards. The Monitors cannot pass Sumter without coming within 500 yards.

The impression is very general that the enemy will renew the attack after repairing damages. Seven Monitors and the Ironsides are still off the harbour.

Ten o'clock, P.M.—The latest official intelligence from the bar states that only two of the iron-clads have gone south, leaving seven remaining, besides the Keokuk, which lies sunk about 1000 yards from Morris Island.

The Yankee machine called the "Devil," designed for the removal of torpedoes, has floated ashore and fallen into our hands.

All quiet now. The enemy is constantly signalling, but no renewal of the attack is anticipated before to-morrow.

The Yankees have been busy all day repairing damages.

CHARLESTON, April 9, A.M.—All quiet this morning. The Monitors are still in sight. Yesterday evening many pieces of the Keokuk's furniture, with spy-glasses, &c., washed ashore on Morris Island beach. Many of these articles were covered with clotted blood. The impression prevails at our batteries that the slaughter on board the Keokuk was terrible.

VIKSBURG, April 10.—Nothing new here. Two additional (Yankee) transports went up the river to-day, loaded with troops. Others are preparing to go.

MOBILE, April 10th.—An official despatch states that the enemy, 400 in number, mostly contraband troops, landed at Pascagoula yesterday, and were attacked by our cavalry, with a loss of fifteen killed; our loss was one lieutenant and one private slightly wounded. The Yankee gunboat put back to Ship Island with the wounded. Reinforcements have been sent to the scene of action.

RODNEY, MISSISSIPPI, April 10.—Yesterday, Major Harrison moved near the enemy, above St. Josephs, Louisiana, and opened with his 12 and 6-pounders. The enemy replied with one piece, which was soon silenced, when the enemy withdrew. Several shells from our guns exploded in the midst of the enemy. No casualties.

CHATTANOOGA, April 10.—Nothing additional from the front to-day. Eighteen prisoners, captured near Franklin, by Van Dorn, reached here to-night. Parties through the lines report a number of Confederate prisoners liberated from their guards by the citizens of Mount Sterling, Indiana. Burnside is at Louisville with twenty thousand men.

JACKSON, April 10.—Fifty-three gunboats, all Yankees, have gone up the Coldwater. Three iron-clad Yankees have been abandoned and destroyed at the mouth of the Amite. The Memphis line is closed hermetically for sixty days—neither cotton nor contraband admitted.

April 11.—General Lee reports the enemy at Black Bayou, retreating towards the river, and laying waste the whole country near Grenada. The river patrol on two gunboats, conveying five cavalry transports, passed up the Mississippi on the 7th. Also nineteen transports containing infantry, and forty freight boats loaded, bound down. The enemy are reinforcing all the depots on the M. C. R. R. A wagon train and tents went east of Memphis. Grant has reached Memphis.

Thirty boats and twelve gunboats have gone up the Memphis to operate on the Cumberland. Heavy shipments are making over the M. C. R. R. at Corinth. Merchants are shipping their stores North, and sutlers are selling their waggons. A great strategic movement is on foot.

A FEDERAL LOAN IMPRACTICABLE.—Although United States' stocks fluctuate less than the exchanges and the premium on gold, they continue to experience rapid movements according to the progress of the war. But the variations are directly opposite to those which logic would dictate. The Federal "successes" which are followed by an improvement should in reality cause increased distrust, while every new and crushing disaster to the North might, on the contrary, be accepted as the best gleam of promise against the reign of repudiation which seems imminent. If the war be protracted much longer, or if the subjugation of the South be accomplished either late or soon, American finance must be without hope. If a definite and honourable separation can be effected, the possibility of a redemption of Northern obligations may still, perhaps, be within rational anticipations. A prolongation of the war for another six months on its present scale of expenditure will swell the mass of liability to a degree that can leave no doubt as to the manner in which it will be dealt with, since, concurrently with the drain of treasure, the drain of life and labour from the fields will have reduced the productive capacities of the country, so that years must elapse before it can even regain the condition in which it stood in 1860. On the other hand, assuming that the South could be overthrown to-morrow, its slave labour deported or turned adrift, its debts disowned, and its population kept from new outbreaks by huge garrisons and naval squadrons, the new state of peace would be as costly as the late state of war, while the credit of the country would be wholly destroyed from the knowledge that there was a chronic danger of revolution such as has prevailed in Mexico and Central America throughout the whole of their independent existence. The Washington politicians fancy that the dissolution of the Union is hoped for in Europe as the best means of breaking down American power; whereas, if there were malice against them of the most cruel and wicked kind, it might be gratified to satiety in the one wish that they should succeed in their present enterprise. It is because these facts are generally recognized on this side that the possibility of a Federal loan being entertained is entirely out of the question, and the financiers of that country may therefore dismiss all thought of attracting foreign capital until a separation be effected which shall leave the Northern energies free for their natural course of progress to the Pacific, instead of being hampered by a partnership with States which must for the present contain either 3,000,000 Africans in subjection or 3,000,000 African idlers, and, as far as military conquest can make them such, 8,000,000 slaves of Anglo-Saxon race.—Times' City Article, May 12.

NO PEACE.

(From the Lynchburg Republican.)

It is now settled that the North is determined upon another grand effort to conquer the rebellion. Conservatives and Abolitionists—the north-west and the east—the Hoosier and the Yankee—Van Buren and Vallandigham, as well as Lincoln and Seward—have all agreed in their determination to continue the war for another six months, at least, and to strike home to the heart of the Confederacy in one of the grandest and most desperate efforts of the war. This seems to be the compromise between the Radicals and the Conservatives—the Democrats and the Abolitionists. If the rebellion is not crushed in the next ninety days or thereabouts, then it is thought the struggle will be given up by the Conservatives at least, and peace demanded. But, however this may be, the war for the next three or six months is to be desperate and bloody beyond anything we have yet seen. The whole concentrated power of the Northern armies is to be precipitated upon us at all points, and these points are to be carried if it is in the power of mighty armies to carry them. Fredericksburg, Charles-on, Savannah, Port Hudson, Vicksburg, and Tullahoma will be the leading points of assault, and it either of them fall, it will greatly embolden the enemy and prolong the war. All the talk, therefore, we have heard about peace, and about the north-west breaking off from the despotic yoke of Lincoln, has turned out to be gammon. There is no peace. The North cannot, in fact, afford to give us peace at this time, or at any time, unless she is whipped into it with bayonet and ball. Her credit, her commerce, her trade, her existence as a nation, depends upon her success in this struggle.

Southern lands and negroes must be taken to pay the expenses of the war, and relieve the Yankee nation of its terrible burdens. The complete subjugation of the South or the utter ruin of the North is the mighty issue involved, and our adversary is too painfully impressed with the fearful fact, not to exhaust all his efforts to accomplish the former and avert the latter.

The crisis of the war, therefore, is upon us. The next sixty days are big with mighty events of weal or woe to this Confederacy. Genial spring is now carpeting with living green many a field soon to be made red with the best blood of our people, and torn by the hoof of thundering artillery. Who is to win? We have no fears of the result at any of the points named, except Tullahoma. There the enemy is not only greatly superior to us in number, but is commanded by the best general in the Yankee army, Rosecrans. If we are defeated there, we lose Tennessee and our western connections, and, perhaps, will be compelled to surrender the Mississippi Valley in a short time. If, on the other hand, we are successful it gives us all of Tennessee and Kentucky, and throws us upon the borders of Ohio and Indiana. The issue, therefore, is a vital one, and nobly will our men contest it. Johnston and Bragg will be there with as gallant an army as ever confronted a foe. We do not think they can be whipped. We believe they will hold their own, if they do not rout the enemy; but in the worst aspect of view, they can only be repulsed for a time. They cannot be routed or dispersed, but if overpowered by numbers will only fall back to a stronger position to meet the invader again.

THE YAZOO PASS EXPEDITION.

Can anybody explain to us this Yankee mystery? We have read everything we could lay our hands on, thought of and pondered the matter, inquired of the military and naval savans, and nobody is able to inform us what the Yankees were after in their expedition to reach the Yazoo river through Yazoo Pass and the Tallahatchie. Why undertake this perilous and extraordinary voyage, when they could have entered the Yazoo at its mouth directly from the Mississippi, Vicksburg being below, and not above the confluence of the two rivers, as some have ignorantly supposed.—Savannah Republican.

Although the mouth of the Yazoo is above Vicksburg some ten miles by water, yet the fortifications of Vicksburg reach the Yazoo river at Haynes or Snyder's Bluff (being a continuous range of hills from Vicksburg to that point) which is some ten or twelve miles above its mouth. The Yankees attempted this route in December last, but could not pass the fortifications up the Yazoo. They then tried to break the lines of these fortifications between Vicksburg and Snyder's Bluff, by landing at Chickasaw Bayou, the breaking of which they expected would flank both Vicksburg and Snyder's Bluff, and in both attempts they failed. They have lately tried another route by going up Steele's Bayou, and thence across to Deer Creek and Little Sun Flower, by connecting bayous, and thus getting into Yazoo above Snyder's Bluff. Steele's Bayou, Deer Creek, and Sun Flower all run parallel with the Mississippi and Yazoo rivers, and empty into the Yazoo—the two latter above Snyder's and the former below, about five miles from the mouth of the Yazoo. We hope the Republican will now see clearly what the Yankees were after in the Yazoo Pass expedition. Not being able to turn the right of our lines and Snyder's, the Yankees leave our front, travel up the Mississippi, through Yazoo Pass, down Cold Water and Tallahatchie, and try to come down the Yazoo, a distance of at least 1,000 miles—to flank Vicksburg. But our energetic and skilful leaders are ready for them at all points, and they may as well make up their minds that they can't take Vicksburg by trickery or ingenuity, but that they must face the music or quit the job.—Vicksburg Whig.

THE SUPERIOR POWER OF THE NORTH.

(From the Charleston Mercury.)

The presses of the United States still rely upon the superior physical power of the North to subject the Southern States. In their view, our conquest is a simple affair of arithmetic. As eighteen is greater than eight, therefore eighteen millions of people must subdue eight. They ignore all moral influences. They ignore God. Material and sensual, they regard a struggle for liberty and independence as an affair of mechanics, in which a longer lever or a stronger pulley will lift the load. So corrupted are they by the prosperity which they wrung from the South, that they seem to have forgotten history—their own history, and the history of the people they are striving to subdue.

Frederick the Great, with but five millions of inhabitants in Prussia, in seven years' war, beat back Austria, Russia, and France combined—each of them being five times as great numerically as Prussia. In the Revolution of 1776 we were but two millions and a half of people, against the most powerful nation, by land and sea, at that time in Europe. Since this war began we have repulsed the Northern armies in every pitched battle, although they have had their own time for their preparations and superior numbers. Yet they still argue that, because they are numerically greater than we are, they must subdue us.

Bonaparte very truly observed that the morale of an army is three-fourths of its strength. An army is not the mere bones, flesh and blood which compose it. It consists of men—with all the passions, feelings, and motives which actuate men. Men may enter an army simply to obtain bread, which is the case with one half of the present army of the United States; and when brought into battle they will fight, under circumstances, perhaps, very bravely. Men may enter an army on a speculation of robbery. They want the country they invade as a source of future gain or of present occupancy. A large portion of the United States' army really believed, when they invaded the South, that they were only going down to select fat farms; another portion came to coerce us as their future tributaries. But there is one thing all robbers prefer to robbery—and that is life. In the game of robbery, there is a reasonable limit to all adventures. But what are these motives for conquering us, compared with those which must actuate the people of the Confederate States in defending themselves? The land invaded is their land. The property to be appropriated is their property. The homes to be desecrated, or given to the flames, are their homes. The butchery and murder to be perpetrated is of them and their children. Country, property, home, all we love or live for, is put up at every battle as the price of victory. Is it at all surprising that, in such a contest, the Southern people should be invincible? Why should any man in the South survive one day the subjugation of the South to Yankee domination? Death is a thousand times preferable to the doom which awaits him and his. Our ruthless and bloody foes have left us in no doubt as to their designs. They have written them upon their Statute Books; they have proclaimed them to the world. The deeds of Butler and Mitchell are but faint glimmering shadows of the horrible and unspeakable atrocities they meditate for our torture and humiliation, should they succeed in subjugating us. How can the motives of the robber or mercenary arm him with the same intrepidity and desperation in battle, which, under such circumstances, must nerve the arm of the Southern man?

Whilst ignoring all moral influences, our savage foes also ignore God. It is true that we sometimes see proclamations from their authorities, setting apart certain days for thanksgiving and praise to God for some successful murder of our people. There can be no more striking repudiation of the Deity than a denial of His attributes. How can a God of justice and holiness accept the thanksgiving and praise for the success of the robbers and murderers of an unoffending, innocent people? But in their presses they make no reference to God whatever in their meditated slaughter of us. Victory is a simple affair—of so many more men against so many fewer men. God, with them, does not reign; but Mammon and Moloch. Material, infidel, and bloody as they are—it is our task to scourge them from our land, and make them the hissing scorn and detestation of the world.

THE BREAD AND MEAT QUESTION.

(From the North Carolina Presbyterian.)

We really believe that the great hope of the enemy now is, to starve out the rebellion. And circumstances amongst us are not altogether wanting to encourage this hope. The absence of large numbers of men in the service, who have heretofore been producers, has certainly caused a scarcity of provisions much greater than was ever before known in the country. This would naturally tend to enhance prices. It is feared also that there is a disposition on the part of many to withhold supplies in their possession, either for higher prices or because of their distrust of the currency, thus increasing the scarcity that certainly does exist. Then there is the great redundancy of money, produced by the immense amounts necessarily expended by the Government in the prosecution of the war. These things combined have led to unexampled prices for everything. These prices are quoted North as evidence that our people are on the very verge of starvation. A few months more, they argue, and gaunt famine will accomplish what experience has taught them cannot be effected through the power of their arms. Thus it is that those of our own people who seek to advance prices are, unintentionally, no doubt, but not less really, giving aid and comfort to the enemy in his insane and wicked purpose.

But that of which there is now no immediate danger may come upon us in a future not distant, unless the advice of Governor Vance shall be followed. The quantity of provisions in the country, before the crop of the approaching season shall be gathered, will be very small. Unless, therefore, a full crop shall be raised, much suffering must ensue. All the available labour of the country should be devoted to raising provisions—corn, potatoes, peas, anything indeed that can sustain life—so that there shall be enough for the people at home and for the soldiers in the field, if God, in His providence, should prolong the war. It would be an awful calamity for our cause to fail through the neglect of those at home to provide for the soldier in the field. But this is possible; and without special attention to the raising of bread and meat during the present season, it may be realized.

There can be but one motive in the mind of any one to induce him to plant cotton or tobacco—a desire to make more money. Though one would think that at the present prices of provisions, the most inordinate greed of gain might be fully satisfied, but is it possible that there are persons amongst us who, to gratify their thirst for wealth, would entail an almost inconceivable amount of suffering upon their fellow citizens, and bring ruin upon their country? If there are, it were better for us had they gone out from us, for they certainly are not of us. Such sordid, selfish spirits are unworthy of the privileges of freemen, and can certainly lay no claim to humanity or to Christian principle.

But there is with us, unquestionably, too much love of money for its own sake. The feeling has been rapidly developed during the last few months, until it now threatens ruin to the best interests of the country. We saw recently an idea advanced in one of our exchanges that appeared to us just and proper. The present business of the people of the Confederate States is war. The conflict with our enemy is one of huge proportions, taxing the strength and trying the manhood of the nation to the uttermost. It is not merely the Government at Richmond that is engaged in the struggle, or the soldiers who have been called into service. It is a contest for life, and liberty, and property, and country—everything we have and hold as men. The whole people are then the party engaged—the old and young, male and female. It becomes the duty of each one, therefore, whatever be his condition or calling, to do what he can to advance the cause. To this end he must bend his energies and expend his strength. If his lot fall at home, in the walks of business, he is just as much bound to promote the interests of this great struggle in any way that God shall give him ability and power, as though he were on the battle field. The country, when engaged in a struggle for life, has the same claims upon one of its citizens that it has upon another—upon the man exempt from age or from any other cause, as upon him who is taken and placed in the ranks of the army. Were it possible, then, for the Government to engage successfully in a work so complicated, it might take every citizen and assign him his labour until the struggle should be over and independence secured. Farmers might be detailed to cultivate the ground and raise provisions, mechanics to manufacture arms and necessary implements of husbandry, and even females—why not?—to minister to the sick and clothe the naked. The life of the nation is at stake, and all the resources and energies of the people are necessary to preserve its life and perpetuate its blessings. If the Government, the agent for managing the affairs of the nation, may lay violent hands upon one man and hurry him away to the battle field, because his service may be needed there, might it not do the same in regard to every other, could the public good be promoted by it? Is there anything in the relationship of a man between the ages of eighteen and forty to his State, that renders him more completely in its power, than there is in the relationship of one over or under these ages? What right then has any one to seek to make money during the war, save as a means of promoting the great object that every good citizen has in view? Cotton and tobacco are neither of them necessary to the success of the war, but provisions are—just as necessary as powder and lead. He, therefore, who cultivates the former, subordinates his patriotism to his pocket. He deserts the service of his country in the hour of her extremity, and deserves to be branded as a deserter by the true and the good.

We sincerely hope that our farmers will think of these things. Patriotism, humanity, and Christianity all call loudly upon them to expend their energies to raise as much provisions as possible during the present year.

CONFEDERATE TREASURY NOTES.

We subjoin the Act of Congress to provide for the funding and further issue of Treasury Notes:—

Section 1. The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That all Treasury notes not bearing interest issued previous to the first day of December, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, shall be fundable in eight per cent. bonds or stock until the twenty-second day of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-three; and that from that date until the first day of August, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, they shall be funded in seven per cent. bonds or stock, and after the said first day of August they shall no longer be fundable at the pleasure of the holder, but shall be receivable in payment of public dues, except the export duty on cotton, and payable six months after the ratification of a treaty of peace, as specified on their face. All Treasury notes not bearing interest issued after the first day of December, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and within ten days after the passage of this act, shall be fundable in seven per cent. bonds or stock until the first day of August next; and after the said first day of August, shall be fundable only in bonds bearing interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum, and payable at any time not exceeding thirty years from the date thereof; and all such notes not funded shall be receivable in payment of all public dues, except the export duty on cotton, and shall be payable six months after the ratification of a treaty of peace between the Confederate Government and the United States. All call certificates bearing eight per cent. interest, shall, with the accrued interest, be fundable on or before the first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, into bonds of the Confederate States, bearing interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, and payable at any time not exceeding thirty years after their date: Provided, That the accrued interest aforesaid may, at the option of the holder, be paid instead of being funded. All call certificates of every description, outstanding the first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-three shall, after that date, be deemed to be bonds bearing an annual interest of six per cent., and payable at a date not exceeding thirty years from the said first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-three.

Sec. 2. In lieu of the power heretofore given by law to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue Treasury notes, he shall be authorized to issue monthly an amount of such notes, bearing no interest, not exceeding fifty millions of dollars, which shall be receivable in payment of all public dues, except the export duty on cotton, and payable within two years after the ratification of a treaty of peace between the Confederate States and the United States, and fundable at the pleasure of the holder during twelve months from the first day of the month of their issue, in bonds of the Confederate States, payable at any time not exceeding thirty years after date, and bearing rates of interest as follows:—If funded within twelve months from the first day of the month of their issue, the bonds shall bear 6 per cent. interest per annum; if funded after that period they shall be fundable into bonds bearing 4 per cent. interest per annum. These notes shall bear upon their face the month and year of their issue, and if not funded, shall be paid at the time specified on their face without interest.

Sec. 3. After the passage of this act, the authority heretofore given to issue call certificates shall cease, but the notes fundable into 6 per cent. bonds may be converted at the pleasure of the holder, into call certificates, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, from the date of their issue. That every such certificate shall bear upon its face the monthly date of the oldest of the notes which it represents, and be convertible into like notes at any time within six months from the first day of the month of its monthly date aforesaid; but every certificate not reconverted within six months from the first day of its monthly date, shall be exchanged for a bond payable at any time not exceeding thirty years from the expiration of the said six months, and bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. Treasury notes, which by the operation of this act become fundable into bonds bearing a yearly interest of 4 per cent. may be converted, at the pleasure of the holder, into call certificates, bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, from their date until reconverted or paid; the said certificates being reconvertible at any time by the holder into notes fundable in 4 per cent. bonds, and payable and receivable as heretofore prescribed, but the said certificates may be redeemed by the Government after six months from the ratification of a treaty of peace between the Confederate States and the United States.

Sec. 4. That all bonds or registered stock authorized to be issued by this act, shall be payable not less than thirty years after date; but shall be redeemable five years after date at the pleasure of the Government, and shall in other respects conform to existing laws.

Sec. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury shall use any disposable means in the Treasury, which can be applied to that purpose without injury to the public interest, to the purchase of Treasury notes bearing no interest, and issued after the passage of this act, until the whole amount of Treasury notes in circulation shall not exceed one hundred and seventy five millions of dollars.

Sec. 6. The Treasury notes hereby allowed to be issued, shall be of any denomination of not less than five dollars, which is now authorized by law, that the Secretary of the Treasury may direct. The authority hereby given shall cease at the expiration of the first session of Congress, after the ratification of a treaty of peace, or at the end of two years, should the war continue so long.

Sec. 7. In addition to the authority hereinbefore given to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue Treasury notes, he shall be allowed to issue notes of the denomination of one dollar, and of two dollars, and of fifty cents, to such an amount, as, in addition to the notes of the denomination of one dollar, heretofore issued, shall not exceed the sum of fifteen millions of dollars; and said notes shall be payable six months after the ratification of a treaty of peace between the Confederate States and the United States, and receivable in payment of all public dues except the export duty on cotton; but shall not be fundable.

Sec. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to sell bonds bearing six per cent. interest per annum, and payable as hereinbefore directed, at par for Treasury notes issued since the 1st of December, 1862, to such of the Confederate States as may desire to purchase the same; or he may sell such bonds, when guaranteed by any States of the Confederacy, upon such plan as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, for Treasury notes on such terms as he may deem advisable, to the highest bidder, and not below par: Provided, however, That the whole amount of such bonds shall not exceed two hundred millions of dollars; and provided further, That the Treasury notes thus purchased shall not be reissued, if the effect of such reissue would be to increase the whole amount of Treasury notes, bearing no interest, which are in circulation, to a sum greater than one hundred and seventy-five millions of dollars. And the Secretary of the Treasury is also authorized, at his option, after the 1st of July, 1863, to issue and sell, at not less than par, as estimated in Treasury notes, coupon bonds, of the Confederate States, bearing six per cent. interest per annum, and payable as hereinbefore directed. The said coupons to be paid at the pleasure of the owner either in the currency in which interest is paid on other bonds of the Confederate States, or else in cotton certificates, which pledge the Government to pay the same in cotton of the quality of New Orleans middlings. The said cotton to be paid at the rate of eightpence sterling per pound, and to be delivered at any time within six months after the ratification of a treaty of peace between the Confederate States and the United States, at any or all of the ports of New Orleans, Mobile, Savannah, Charleston, or Wilmington, as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct: Provided, however, That the bonds hereby authorized, shall not exceed one hundred millions of dollars, and shall be applied only to the absorption of Treasury notes as prescribed in this act.

Sec. 9. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury immediately after the passage of this act, to make publication of a copy thereof in each State, in at least two newspapers published in the State, and to have said publication continued until the 1st day of August, 1863.

Approved March 23, 1863.

THE CAPTURE OF THE INDIANOLA.

[We copy from the Louisiana Democrat the following account of the capture of the Indianola, which was compiled from information obtained from several of the Confederate officers in the expedition. The affair is not new, but all that concerns the power of iron-clads for aggression or defence interesting.]

The expedition started from Fort De Russy on Sunday, the 22nd ult., and arrived at the mouth of the river in a few hours, and turned their heads up stream.

The Indianola had forty-eight hours the start of the Red River fleet at Acklin's; at Natchez she was less than twenty-five hours in advance. They left Natchez on the 23rd, and the commander found that he could easily overhaul the enemy on the morning of the 24th, and determined not to do so, in order to bring on a night engagement. Grand Gulf was reached before sunset, and there, information was had that the enemy was only about four hours in advance. We came up with her about 9.40, above New Carthage, near Palmyra Island, and immediately the Webb was signalled to prepare for action. The order of battle on approach was as follows: The Queen of the West about 500 yards in advance of the Webb, and the Dr. Batey, Lieut.-Colonel Brand commanding, two miles in the rear, lashed to the tender Grand Era.

The moon was partially obscured by a veil of white clouds, and gave and permitted just sufficient light for our men to see where to strike with our rams, and just sufficient obscurity to render uncertain the aim of the formidable artillery of the Indianola. She was first discovered when about a distance of 1000 yards hugging the eastern bank of the river, with her bow quartering across and down the river. No indication of life was given as we darted towards her, no light, no perceptible motion of her machinery was discernible. The lights on the Queen and the Webb had been obscured, and only the fires of the Grand Era could be seen two miles back where she was towing the Batey. The distance between us had diminished to about 500 yards. The long black line of her coal barges which protected her sides, could be clearly distinguished from forward of her bow to nearly abreast of her wheels; when within 150 yards, Captain McCloskey, on the Queen, opened fire with his two pivot guns and one brass 12-pounder; at the second fire the 20-pound Parrot was disabled by the blowing out of its ventpiece. The first intention was to dash the bow of the Queen in the larboard wheel-house of the Indianola just in rear of the coal barge, but when about 150 yards from her she backed and interposed the barge between the Queen and herself. The bow of the former went crashing clear through the barge, and was not arrested until it shattered some of her timbers amidships, and deeply indenting the iron plating of her hull. So tremendous was the momentum of the attack that for nearly five minutes the Queen could not disengage herself, but remained stuck fast! When in this position her sharpshooters opened fire on every light and crevice that they could see. But not a living soul was to be seen on the Indianola's decks. While thus adhering to the latter, the Webb came dashing by the Queen, and plunged with terrific force just in the rear of the bow of the iron-clad Federal.

The result of the first onset was to strip the Indianola of her coal barges which protected her sides, and to injure her to some extent in her wheel. So soon as the Webb had swept away clear of her, the Queen swung around and again dashed upon the Federal, who this time with partial success, endeavoured to break the force of the onset by presenting her bow to the blow. But she was too slow in her movements; the Queen struck her a little in advance of amidships, but as she was turning the force of the blow glanced along her side and past her wheel-house without inflicting any very serious damage. The Queen swung clear of her stern, and just then the Federal opened on her with her two aft nine-inch guns. One shot struck her on the shoulder and knocked off a few bales of cotton, and the other, a shell, entered her front port hole, on the port side, passed out and struck the chase of a 12 pound gun, and exploding, killed two men, wounding four, and disabled two pieces.

This time the Queen swung around rapidly up stream and, in a very brief interval, again dashed on her, striking a little to the rear of her starboard wheel-house, crushing through and shattering her frame work and loosening some of her iron plates. By this time the Webb had run up stream, turned, came careering on with a full head of steam, and struck her nearly in the same place where the Queen had hit her. Through and through her timbers, crushing and dashing her iron plates, the sharp bow of the Webb penetrated as if it were going to pass entirely through the boat. As the Webb backed clear, the Indianola, with all the speed she could raise, declined further fight, and ran down the river towards the bank with the intention of getting a line ashore, in order to land her officers and men, and abandon her. The Queen was again brought up all ready for another butt. Whilst the Webb had her bow knocked off, her splendid machinery was unhurt, and she quickly and gallantly bore up for her third charge, when, bearing down and approaching the Indianola, Captain Pierce was hailed from her deck announcing the surrender, and begging to be towed ashore, as she was sinking. Captain Pierce placed a line on board, and commenced towing the Indianola, when the line parted. As the Queen of the West ran off from her last charge, to make a circuit to obtain more space, to add increased momentum to her onset, she encountered the Doctor Batey, who had cast from the tender Grand Era and was hovering around to enter the fight when an opportunity offered. She was crowded with near two hundred and fifty gallant spirits, who volunteered from the forces at Port Hudson, and who had embarked on her with the resolution to fight the enemy by boarding him. From the deck of the Queen voices called out to them that the opportunity for boarding had arrived. Lieut.-Colonel Brand, with his command, gallantly approached, and he gave the command, "Prepare to board," when he was greeted by a voice from the decks of the enemy, announcing that he had surrendered, and was in a sinking condition.

The Indianola was found to be a most formidable Monitor, 200 feet long, 53 feet beam, mounting two 11-inch guns forward, and two 9-inch guns aft; and all protected by splendid iron casemates, utterly impervious, except to the heaviest artillery at the shortest range. Her propelling power consisted of two side wheels, and two screw propellers. She was fitted with a most valuable cargo, embracing supplies of every kind. The officers and crew, amounting to over one hundred men, fell into our hands as prisoners. They were put out at Grand Gulf, and placed in charge of Colonel Wirt Adams's cavalry.

As an evidence of her perfect protection, we will state that our artillery frequently fired at her at the distance of twenty and thirty yards, and utterly failed to injure her. Lieutenant Handy, of the Webb, fired his 32-pound rifled guns so close in to her casemates that it actually enveloped both port holes in flames, and yet no injury was sustained. Our skillful and courageous sharpshooters fired deliberately at every onset. Notwithstanding all these circumstances, the enemy lost but one man killed, and none wounded.

CAPTURE OF A UNITED STATES STEAMER.

(From the Mobile Register, April 15.)

Some few days since a party of eighteen men, under the leadership of Captain Andrews, an old Mississippi steamboat man, obtained permission from General Buckner, to go and capture a boat at the entrance of Pass a l'Ouvre. They left Fort Gaines in a yawl, and proceeded on their enterprise. On Sunday night they found the tow-boat Whittemore tied at the mouth of the Pass, and were met by the watchman, who, finding himself "looking into the barrel of a repeater," warned not to give the alarm, very considerably and Yankee-like obeyed. The hatches were attended to, and the balance of the party proceeded to arrest the rest of the crew, who were calmly and unsuspectingly sleeping. In twenty minutes from the time they boarded the boat, they had steam up, and proceeded down the Pass. They had met transports, but were not then discovered. A boat appeared to chase or hover around her next morning, but she escaped safely until she reached the blockaders outside the bay. She ran the blockade under a heavy fire, and was struck twice, but received little or no injury. She arrived in the stream opposite the city about six o'clock yesterday evening. The daring party captured, besides the boat, a large quantity of coal and twenty-three prisoners—among whom is one Goodrich, who is a ship-carpenter, and worked in this city for ten or fifteen years. The Whittemore (now the Fox) is a splendid tug-boat, with powerful machinery and sound, and is altogether a superb prize. So much for eighteen of our "horse marines."

This daring and successful expedition was fitted out by Mr. Julius Buttner, an enterprising merchant of this city.

RETURN OF THE SPANISH CONSUL TO CHARLESTON.—Some weeks ago, it will be remembered, we announced that the Spanish Consul at this port, Senor Moncada, had sailed for New York on board one of the vessels of Her Catholic Majesty's Navy, which touched off the bar. Yesterday Senor Moncada returned to the city by way of Richmond, having crossed the lines under flag of truce. He was in Washington, District Columbia, on Thursday of last week, and intended remaining there some time longer, but hearing that the attack was certainly about to be made here, he hastened the conclusion of his trip and lost no time in reaching his post of duty. He is now the only Consul of any of the "Great Powers" remaining in Charleston, the representatives of France and England being both absent.—Charleston Mercury, April 13th.

THE Confederate steamer Stonewall Jackson, Captain Black, formerly the British steamer Leopard, left Nassau on Wednesday last, with a cargo consisting of several pieces of field artillery, 200 barrels of saltpetre, 40,000 army shoes, and a large assortment of goods, bound to this port. On Saturday night, about 11 o'clock, off the beach of Long Island, a few miles from this Bar, she got among a fleet of blockading vessels. The Yankees having discovered the presence of the Stonewall Jackson, they commenced firing at her from nearly every direction. Captain Black finding his vessel surrounded, with no chance for escape, headed for Long Island beach, where she was run ashore after a half-hour's chase, during which her hull was penetrated in several places by the balls of the enemy. The Stonewall Jackson was burned about 4 o'clock on Sunday morning by order of Captain Black, and everything about her has been destroyed except the iron hull. The passengers, officers and crew, have reached this city, but have lost nearly everything.—The Charleston Courier, April 13.

The naval command of Savannah has been divided.—Captain Richard L. Page being assigned to everything afloat, and Commander Josiah Tattnall to the operations on shore, such as constructions, repairs, &c.

The Hon. A. J. Lawson, formerly member of Congress, died in Waynesboro', Georgia, on the 26th of March last.

The Virginia State Line, commanded by General Floyd, was disbanded on the 8th of April.

ANOTHER YANKEE GUNBOAT DESTROYED.—A brief despatch received at General Beauregard's Headquarters, announces that General W. S. Walker, with his light artillery, had, at an early hour yesterday morning, destroyed an armed vessel of the enemy in the Coosaw River. No particulars are given.—Charleston Mercury, April 10th.

The Yankee gunboat destroyed in the Coosaw River last week by our light artillery, was the George Washington, Captain Briggs, United States Navy, mounting two 24-pound brass howitzers and one "James" gun. Her crew consisted of thirty-eight men. The Virginia battery engaged in the exploit was "Cooper's Battery," attached to Cook's North Carolina Brigade.—Ibid, April 13th.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MAY 14, 1863.

A Long Way.

THERE can be no useful purpose subserved by concealing from our friends in the Confederate States the truth, that recognition by Foreign Powers is now morally further off, because less present to men's minds, than it was three or even twelve months ago. They have long anticipated this conclusion, and acted upon it by nerving themselves to a protracted and unassisted struggle. Thanks to this timely realization of the exigencies of their situation, and the manly—nay, heroic—determination to face them boldly, and provide against them deliberately, they are to-day stronger for resistance, and even for aggressive operations, than they were, when more was thought and said about recognition. Their levies of volunteers are now veteran armies, equal in discipline and efficiency to the best in the world, with the names of many victories emblazoned on their standards, and commanded by Generals whose eminent talents have been matured in the greatest modern school of experience. All the munitions of war are supplied by native enterprise in good quality and of sufficient quantity; and in the satisfactory progress of the manufacture of machinery, they have successfully opened the parent source of every other manufacture. The "blockade running," from being a series of isolated and hazardous ventures, has become an organized system, and steamers enter and leave the ports of Charleston and Wilmington with almost perfect regularity. The dangers apprehended from the scarcity of food supplies, attendant upon the movements of large armies over immense distances, have already been averted by the strenuous warnings of the presses and the leading minds of the country during the months of the planting season.

But while we pay a deserved tribute to the foresight and self-reliance of the Confederates, of which they now earn the fruits, we would not have them misunderstand the causes of what must appear to them like apathy on the part of this country towards them. It is not because the sympathies of the British heart have grown cold in this sublime spectacle of national self-sacrifice, that so little is now said about recognition. Doubtless the timorous—and, we believe, history will add, unwise and culpable—inertia of the Government which has been active only in repressing those sympathies, and in administering opiates to the public impatience—now by assurances that the opportune moment is not come, and anon by predictions that the war is drawing to a natural close, has had much to do with the phenomenon we are considering. But the true and principal reason is the conviction which has impressed itself upon every intelligent mind in Europe, that the issue of the war is virtually decided, and that the South no longer needs that moral assistance which diplomatic recognition would cast into the scale. This conviction, we know and regret, has silenced many friends who are none the less zealous in their well-wishes and active in their efforts to aid. Another reason must not be overlooked. Two years of war have, in a great measure, worn off its startling effects. People on this side have come to look for astounding events and sudden changes of scene as almost matters of course. The alarm, also, which was at first felt at the probable reflective injuries of the war, has in no small degree subsided. It is naturally gratifying to British self-complacency to consider that while America is rushing with railway speed to financial ruin, the British Chancellor of the Exchequer can dispose of a surplus of three millions sterling and reduce taxation. It is pardonable, also, though perhaps premature, to feel elated by the consciousness that the material prosperity of these islands has attained so lusty a growth, that an important limb of it may be wholly lopped off without fatal injury to the whole, and that even the American trade may be dispensed with for years without sensibly affecting the magnificent figures which represent the annual national balance sheet. Lancashire, it is true, is literally rotting to the core; but for the very reason that mortification has set in, there are less symptoms of acute inflammation. Much of this security and self-congratulation is unwarranted by the facts below the surface, is unwise and even dangerous; it was precisely such a dazzling material prosperity as that in which Great Britain now rejoices, which only two and a half years ago concealed from the outside world the fearful doom then impending over the United States. But we are dealing with facts as they are, not as they should be, and these facts sufficiently explain why the currents of popular opinion flow with less apparent rapidity in the direction of Southern recognition, and why yet, as we firmly believe, those currents flow with greater volume, more unvaryingly, and more resistlessly than ever before, towards the consummation of Southern independence.

Great Britain having, then, decided—whether rightly or wrongly history will judge—that her kind intentions toward the Confederates shall not, within any definite period of time or upon any probable combination of events, assume the only practical and effective shape which common-sense and common justice indicate—the acknowledgment of an actually-acquired and successfully-defended independence, she must be prepared for the full consequences of her decision, a decision which has heretofore restrained that of all the other Great Powers. The most disastrous of these consequences is the indefinite protraction of the American war. Foreign recognition is the indispensable preliminary of peace. For over a twelvemonth, the most eventful period of the war, in the moment of lowest depression of the Confederate fortunes, as in that of their most signal triumphs, we have never seen but this one road to its termination. Except on this condition, we have never expected peace either from Federal defeats, or from the exhaustion of Federal finances, or from a political revulsion at the North, or from any of those numerous causes upon which predictions of a speedy end have so frequently and so confidently been based, even in high official quarters. Events have justified the correctness of an opinion which at times seemed obstinacy. All history justifies it. Even those who quote history only to prop up their paradoxes, cannot deny that no Government, however weak or contemptible, has ever been the first to recognise and submit to the loss of an important portion of what it deems its rightful dominions. Why should the still great and powerful United States be the first to set that example? To those ingenious casuists who propose a new rule of international law for the recognition of de facto nationalities by neutrals, it is sufficient to reply that no nation has ever achieved its independence without some species of foreign assistance. Like individuals, it is in their infancy that nations most need the fostering care of older sisters. To insist rigidly upon the rule that they should first beat off all comers, and force the parent State to terms or reduce it to impotency, before neutrals may justly recognise them, is tantamount to saying that no new nationality shall evermore be formed; and such a doctrine in this age of liberal thought the most bigoted devotee of the Right Divine of monarchs would scarcely dare to avow. Those who base their hopes of peace upon the financial ruin of the aggressor, forget that however accurately they may compute the certain operation of their laws of finance when undisturbed by other and more potent influences, they cannot compute by figures, rules, or measures the impetuous torrents of popular passions, which obey no laws but those of the tempest. They also forget, or rather ignore, that war has become the normal state of that belligerent who alone can make peace. The war, directly or indirectly, gives wages and food to the millions in the North, whom the loss of the Southern trade would have thrown out of employment; the war, in fact, precisely fills up the vacuum left by the South; it consumes the productions of all the different States—the grain and food which the West before sold to the South; the manufactures which the Middle States before poured into the Southern markets, the shipping which the East before employed in carrying the Southern staples. What matters it that all this consumption is waste, not gain? The mass of men think of the present only, and so long as poor men have food, and rich men grow richer, national bankruptcy is only a vague threat. If these facts were properly appreciated, it would be understood that it is as much more difficult for the North to spontaneously make peace than it was to drift into war; as it is, it is more difficult to climb up a declivity than to slide down it. Under these circumstances, a revulsion of feeling at the North would be a more astonishing moral revolution than the world has yet seen; and to make good this revolution would require higher courage, more undaunted boldness, more unflinching resolution, more patriotic self-sacrifice, and more political wisdom and sagacity, than even the South has been called upon to exhibit in its unequal struggle. To expect this from the Northern peace party, without encouragement or aid from Europe, is expecting too much.

There is, therefore, not a sign of peace on the horizon. When campaigns shall have become impossible, the war will degenerate into predatory excursions on either side. In proportion as its operations shall lose important strategic significance, its character will become more barbarous, more fiendishly vindictive. Europe will at last have to pronounce the talismanic word of peace,—Recognition, but too late to have secured many of the most valuable results of the separation. It will have stripped itself of the greater portion of the rentals of its most productive semi-tropical estates, farmed more for its own profit than those of the farmer; it will have forced its best customer to become a rival manufacturer; it will have dried up for many generations the source of inexhaustible wealth which the New World has been since its discovery; and it will have lost the golden opportunity of imposing the sway of its moral influence upon two great and populous societies of Anglo-Saxon race. Such are the certain consequences of the policy of non-recognition, now pursued. A thousand minor evils and causes for regret will come as the consequences and the punishment of the neglect of a high moral duty.

The New Stay of the North.

THE North has been parodying our Sebastopol Committee. Half a dozen civilians, chosen, we presume, for their military ineptitude on the principle of lucus a non lucendo, have been inquiring into the conduct of the war, and determining the responsibility of the several commanders for the failures which have befallen the army of the Potomac. If modesty were a Yankee characteristic, some of these gentlemen must have blushed as they cross-examined General McClellan with all the assurance of an Old Bailey barrister browbeating a witness. But as nine men out of ten in the North think themselves qualified to act as generals, the probability is, that the ridiculous side of the matter never presented itself to the minds of these respectable gentlemen, and that they imagined they were really saving the Republic. The Committee had its origin in the outcry against somebody after the first disaster of Bull Run. It was a sort of offering to the ventosa plebs in their anxious inquiry after that day of humiliation, "Whom shall we hang?" And, although it has not thrown much new light on the war, and has lately become the mere instrument of a cabal against the man to whom alone the North owes its present hold upon Washington, it elevates the politicians; it arraigns the generals at the bar of public opinion; it adds importance to the Congress and authority to the Senate; altogether it is just the sort of institution to please the North. But whether it conduces to the efficiency of the army, or the confidence of its chiefs—whether it is calculated to nerve the arm and heart of a commander, to know that a committee of non-military gentlemen will hold him to account for every movement, pester him with the most absurd and irrelevant questions as to his reasons for marching along this road and not along that—as to his own opinion upon his own ability and judgment; nay, as to his own courage on the field of battle,—is, to say the least, doubtful.

Quite recently, the Committee has resolved itself into a sort of judicial tribunal, sitting in the case of Hooker versus McClellan. We do not know what their verdict will be, but as the former is still Commander of the Grand Army of the Potomac, and the latter out of the service, it will be probably given on the side of Hooker. And we do not know that anything in the course of the war has more unfavourably influenced Englishmen against the North. A bully is not always a coward; we have known great boasters who were not deficient in ability and courage; but we confess we should have considerable doubt about the expediency of trusting an army to General Hooker, after perusing his evidence. From first to last it is an impeachment of the Commander-in-Chief and all his colleagues, and a complete "apotheosis" of Hooker. In every battle throughout the campaign, there is imbecility, timidity, and blundering on everybody's part, except Hooker's. If there is an advantage gained, Hooker's division, led into the thickest of the enemy's fire, has won it. If there is a defeat staved off, an attack repulsed, it is Hooker who, like Ney, is the rear man of the rear guard. If an opening is afforded and not taken, there is the ubiquitous and indefatigable Hooker urging and imploring McClellan or Burnside or Franklin or Sumner, or some other of "the old women," to use this indomitable hero's language, to take advantage of it. Finally, when the battle is at its height, Hooker's is the one prominent figure on the field. As in the Scotch picture of the Battle of Waterloo the whole conflict is embodied in the person of one Highlander defying, with his claymore, the storm of shot and shell; so in Hooker's narrative of the campaign, the one real courageous soldier is "Fighting Joe Hooker." This is by no means a caricature. His first answer to the Committee is sublime. "To what do you attribute," asked the Chairman, with charming naïveté, "the failure of the Peninsular campaign?" "I do not hesitate to say that it is to be attributed to the want of generalship on the part of our commander." He is puzzled for a moment by the second question: "What would you have proposed?" But only for a moment. "He would have marched through York Town with his single brigade, marched straight upon Fort M'Gruder and Williamsburg, and in four days have taken Richmond." He had good reason to know that, when President Davis heard that Hooker was at Williamsburg, he packed up his furniture and started it out of Richmond. He never could understand why so much time was wasted. But he got a beating at Williamsburg and lost 1,700 men, according to his own admission. He admits also that after an attempt to march three miles he was compelled to halt his men for the night, as the mud was knee deep. He knew, though he did not admit, that where the men could not march, there was no possibility of provisions reaching them. Yet in three or four days he would have marched eighty miles, through an unknown country, destroyed an army of some 70,000 men, and taken Richmond. Hooker's confidence never deserted him. He would have taken Richmond the day after the defeat of Fair Oaks. He would have marched through it after the seven days' fighting on the Chickahominy. "Richmond would have been ours without a doubt." What evil genius kept the undaunted Hooker in his subordinate position? Pass we to the later experiences of the gallant general at Boonesville and Sharpsburg; it is the same story. Hooker is all vigour, and dash, and victory; McClellan all timidity, and torpor, and indecision. Hooker wins the battle, and McClellan loses it. And now, Young Napoleon retires from duty, and a new commander rises in his stead—General Burnside. It is all one to Hooker—he is equally incompetent. The Battle of Fredericksburg follows. Hooker does all that mortal man can do, he tells the Committee, but he is beaten again. He is slightly insubordinate. He is guilty of disobedience for which he would have been broken or shot in any other service. But he assures the Committee that if his advice had been taken the rebels must have been beaten, and the Committee, as Burnside's plans failed, very sagaciously conclude that Hooker's must have succeeded. We have one comment to add to this evidence. General Hooker has had the command of the army of the Potomac for six months. He is reported to have 120,000 men under him, in the highest state of efficiency. He is not so far from Richmond now as he was when he fought at Williamsburg. Let him take care, however, when he does advance. The Southern generals have given one braggart a lesson, from which he will never recover. General Hooker has emulated the bluster and insolence of Pope; by all means let him advance and complete the parallel.

The contrast between the blatant self-sufficiency of Hooker and the modest and gentlemanly feeling displayed by McClellan in his answers to the Committee is what might be expected. McClellan has not a word to say against any individual. His account of the campaign is truthful, as impartial as a partisan view of hostilities can be, and entirely free from egotism. It is evident that McClellan is not always the first person in McClellan's thought, that he led his army with a consciousness of the responsibility that rested on his shoulders, and a sense of duty to his men and to his country. Twice in a moment of emergency he saves the fortunes of the Administration. He it was who reorganised the beaten army of Bull Run. He it was who got together the remnants of the armies shattered under Pope at Manassas, and, marching out on his own responsibility when President and Cabinet were alike panic-stricken, restored the drooping spirits of the North by the bloody fight at Sharpsburg. He won no victory. That was an impossibility, fighting with beaten troops and raw recruits against the veterans that composed the army of Lee and Stonewall Jackson. But it was a marvellous proof of his personal influence and energy that he should have been able so soon to rally the demoralized armies of the North, and lead them on as confident as ever to a new field of battle. Questioned as to his command in the brief campaign in Maryland, he says:—

It was never definitely decided, up to the time that I left, as to whether I was to go or not. I asked the question, two or three times, of General Halleck, whether I was to command the troops in the field, and he said it had not been determined; and I do not think that it ever was. I think that was one of those things which grew into shape itself. When the time came I went out.

The general tenor of General Halleck's despatches was that I was committing an error in going so far away from Washington; that I was going rather too fast.

As late as the 13th of September I recollect a telegram of General Halleck in which he pressed that same idea, and tells me that I am wrong in going so far away.

So General Halleck becomes Commander-in-Chief, and McClellan is in retirement and disgrace; and General Bobadil—we beg his pardon, General Hooker—is the coming man. We congratulate General Lee on his new adversary.

Since we penned these remarks the telegraph announces that Hooker's whole army has crossed the Rappahannock. No one will be surprised, and the friends of the South will not be greatly alarmed to learn that the bulletins of such a commander already triumphantly proclaim the complete surprise and outflanking of the Confederates.

International Law and American Practice.

THE professional morality of the Bar is said to allow an advocate to say on his client's behalf everything that the client might be justified, if he could say it, in saying for himself. Some barristers are apt to go a little further, and think themselves entitled to say whatever their client, if he had their professional tact and oratorical ability, would say for himself. The very clever lawyer who has accepted the duty of defending the Federal Government in the columns of the Times appears to act upon the latter rule. We regret to see this kind of professional license extended to the press, because it is likely to degrade the character of those who make use of it, rather than because it is capable of seriously misleading any attentive reader. From the moment in which "Historicus" abandoned the affectation of judicial impartiality, and openly avowed himself the defender of Admiral Wilkes and Mr. Gideon Welles, his letters ceased to carry with them any other weight than belongs to clever, unscrupulous, and ingenious advocacy. They are sufficiently answered by a simple statement of the facts which they misrepresent, and the plain rules of law which they ignore.

We should hardly have thought that any judicious advocate would have ventured to panegyrize the moderation and conciliatory temper displayed by Mr. Seward in directing the restoration of the mail-bags, captured on board the Peterhoff. But as "Historicus" has thought proper to do so, we shall briefly recall to the memory of our readers what Mr. Seward was bound to do, and what he has done. We waive for the moment the question of international law; we will consider presently whether mails taken under such circumstances can legally be examined for evidence against the vessel on board of which they were found. It is enough that Mr. Seward had pledged himself to deliver them up. By instructions long since addressed, in the President's name, to his colleague of the Navy Department, and formally communicated to the British Ambassador, he had engaged that mails found on board vessels arrested by the Federal cruisers should be at once delivered up with the seals unbroken. Now the mail-bags of the Peterhoff were not delivered up at once. They were taken to New York, put into the hands of the Prize Court, and detained there for a considerable time. They were not delivered up with the seals unbroken. They were opened, and only when it was found that all the packages they contained were directed to Matamoros was the question of giving them up entertained. It appears then that, so far from making a voluntary concession to Great Britain in this case, Mr. Seward only half fulfilled his promise; that he did so tardily; and that he did not think of keeping his word until warned by the remonstrances of the British Government, that it might not be altogether safe to break it.

It is only just to Mr. Seward to remember that he is not the President, nor, in the English sense, the Prime Minister of the United States. He is only one member of a Cabinet in which unity is not expected; he is hampered by a chief and by colleagues much more foolish and ignorant than himself; and it is possible that the wide discrepancy between the promises which he has from time to time made to the Government of this country, and the course actually pursued by Federal officers at sea and on land, may be due less to insincerity on his part than to his inability to control his colleagues, and their utter indifference alike to the law of nations, and to the honour of the Administration to which they belong. But, however we may be disposed to regard the personal conduct of Mr. Seward, there is no doubt that the Federal Secretary of State has been guilty of equivocation, evasion, and systematic breach of faith, and that the Federal Government, while constantly promising a strict observance of every rule of public law pressed upon its attention by this country, has habitually and systematically set the law at defiance. It has conceded everything that we asked; it has done everything that seemed convenient to itself. It is entitled, therefore, to no credit whatever for its frank admissions, on one occasion after another, of the binding force of the laws which it continues to violate.

In the case of the mail-bags, "Historicus" is probably right in saying that no decision in favour of their immunity can be alleged. But he is absurdly wrong in every argument which he urges against that immunity. The case of convoy is by no means parallel. In the case decided by Lord Stowell, the claim of the convoying ships was that their presence, on behalf of their Government, exempted the vessels under their charge from visitation and detention. Lord Stowell decided that no neutral Government had a right to protect its merchant ships from visitation, or from detention in case of reasonable suspicion; and further, that armed resistance offered to the visiting cruisers was in itself a sufficient ground of condemnation. In the case of the mail-bags, the neutral Government does not claim to protect its merchantmen from search and visitation, but simply claims the right to send its own mails by them without thereby rendering the mail liable to foreign examination, or inflicting injury upon the ship. The Spectator indeed argues that the mail may be searched for evidence against the vessel carrying it, inasmuch as the convoying man-of-war might be searched for evidence against the convoy. But we conceive that our contemporary is utterly wrong in his facts. A man-of-war is not liable to visitation under any circumstances; and if—which we altogether disbelieve—it could even be searched for evidence against its convoy, this could only be done in case it had offered armed resistance on their behalf, and had been captured in so doing. In the first place, therefore, the Spectator's premiss is false, and in the second place, his inference is unfounded. "Historicus's" principal argument against the immunity of the mails is, that a ship's real papers might be concealed therein, while she sailed with fabricated ones. But the mere possession of fabricated papers would be sufficient to condemn the vessel, and were it not for this nothing could be easier than for vessels carrying no mails to find safe places of concealment for their real papers. Again, the mail-bags could not be opened, and consequently the ship's papers could not be obtained, except at the port of her nominal destination; and, therefore, unless her nominal destination were her real one, she could not place her papers in the mail-bags; and if her nominal and real destination were the same, she could scarcely have any motive for doing so. Finally, it is a rule of maritime law, that evidence against a ship must be furnished by herself, not by anything found on board any other ship. A vessel, then, might as well send her papers by another ship as carry them in her own mail-bag; and in the former case, they could not be brought in evidence against her. It is quite evident that no injury is inflicted on the belligerent by insisting on the immunity of the mails; and "Historicus's" argument falls to the ground.

The question may arise in three forms. The vessel carrying the mails may be bound for a blockaded port. In that case, the Government which placed the mails on board would clearly be particeps criminis, and the mail would justly be condemned. Or the vessel may be on her way to a non-blockaded belligerent port. In that case there is at least this plea for the seizure of the mails—that they may contain contraband of war—e.g., a ship bound from England for New York may carry despatches from Mr. Adams to Mr. Seward in the British mail-bags, and these are clearly of that character. Yet we conceive that we should hardly allow the Alabama to seize, or a Confederate Prize Court to condemn a Cunard steamer on the ground that her mails contained despatches; and we are quite sure that the Government of the United States would not tolerate the condemnation by a French Prize Court of an American vessel carrying mails from New York to Matamoras because those mails contained a despatch for President Juarez. Finally, the ship may be ostensibly bound for a neutral port. In that case the mails at least are really bound thither; they can be delivered nowhere else. They, therefore, contain, and can contain nothing contraband of war; they are the property of neutrals; they bear the official seal of a neutral Government; and they ought clearly to be allowed to pass free. We may further observe that a clear and a grave injustice would be done to a neutral ship if the mails were allowed to furnish evidence against her. Her cargo is allowed to do so, on the ground that it is the duty of her captain to know exactly what she has on board, and to refuse to carry contraband to a belligerent port. But it is not his duty or his right to know what the mails contain, nor can he refuse to carry them. Therefore, the principles of justice which underlie all law, public and municipal, would be outraged by allowing the mails to furnish evidence against the vessel which carries them.

The Federal Government, then, deserves no credit for the surrender of the mails of the Peterhoff, except such as may belong to a tardy, exceptional, and reluctant exercise of discretion, in obedience to law, common sense, and evident necessity. It is quite clear that neutral nations could not possibly sanction a practice which would leave their communications in every part of the world at the mercy of any belligerent Power; and which would give the cruisers of the United States a clear right to seize the Dublin and Holyhead mail-packets, and search them for the possible despatches of Messrs. Mason and Slidell. A nation which pretended to examine and possibly to confiscate mails on board neutral ships bound to neutral ports would, if it attempted to carry out its theory, find itself in a month at war with every maritime Power in the world.

It is worth while to note the conduct in this matter of the Prize Court of New York—the chief of those Courts in the rectitude of whose character and the justice of whose decisions Englishmen are bidden to repose implicit confidence. That Court declined to direct the restoration of the mails on board the Peterhoff, till it received orders from Washington to do so; and no one in America, at least, pretends to doubt that, had its orders been in a contrary sense, it would have directed that the mails should be opened. Here, however, as we have seen, the Court might plead that there was no ascertained rule of law upon the point. But it has wantonly outraged one of the plainest rules of international law. It had no right to meddle with the cargo till the condemnation of the vessel. It had no right to inquire into the character of the cargo until it was proved that the vessel had not a neutral destination. Nevertheless, it ordered the landing of the cargo in order to ascertain whether any part of it was contraband of war; with an obvious intention, if any goods of that character could be found, to condemn the ship on that pretext, without regard to her destination. It is in vain to hope that Lord Russell will protest against so gross an outrage. But it is our duty on every occasion to call attention to the grand principle of neutral rights, as announced by Lord Stowell in the Admiralty Court of the greatest of maritime belligerent Powers; that goods going from one neutral port to another cannot come under the description of contraband, all trade between neutral ports being equally lawful; and that the subsequent destination of the cargo cannot be taken into consideration by the captor or the Prize Court. As a very sensible correspondent of the Times remarked, if Matamoras were separated from Galveston only by a ditch, the Federal cruisers could not lawfully detain nor the Federal Courts condemn a ship laden with arms and munitions of war for the Mexican side of that ditch, however certain it might be that the cargo would be straightway conveyed across the frontier.

In all cases, neutral nations watch with jealous vigilance the proceedings of belligerent cruisers, and the Prize Courts before which their captures are brought. Prize Courts like that over which Lord Stowell presided, held by a permanent Judge of the highest rank, in a country where the bar is a profession which its votaries never quit after they have once achieved practice, and where, consequently, lawyers and judges think far more of legal rights than of national or political antipathies—are entitled to some degree of respect and confidence; and something of the same credit attaches, or did attach, to the Supreme Court of the United States, which is, we believe, the ultimate Court of Appeal in prize cases. But extemporized Courts, presided over by persons of no repute, in a country where the man who is a barrister to-day was a speculator yesterday, and may be a preacher to-morrow, and where consequently the spirit of professional honour is comparatively lax, and the influence of political feeling on legal questions extremely powerful, can command no confidence whatever. And when these Courts are established by a Government notorious for its contempt of public law, and when the judges are the creatures of a President who has trampled on the law of the land, superseded the power of its regular tribunals, and substituted his own will for the decisions of its authorized Courts of Justice, we can accord them no more deference than is due to their masters. The judges of the American Prize Courts are not independent dispensers of justice, but simply the executive officers of President Lincoln; and it is not to them that England can safely or honourably intrust the task of doing right as between the officers of Mr. Lincoln's navy and those who are charged with rendering comfort and aid to Mr. Lincoln's enemies. It is on the vigour, resolution, and promptitude of their own Government, and on that alone, that English merchants must rely for justice; and to commend them to the mercies of Federal Prize Courts is, on the part of that Government, a wanton mockery as well as a disgraceful dereliction of duty.

A Glance at Southern Newspapers.

We have received files of Southern papers to the 14th April, and by culling from them a few noteworthy items we shall be able to present our readers with the latest and most reliable account of the condition of the Confederate States. A free press is always a reflex of public opinion; and this in the Confederacy, as in England, is peculiarly the case. Southern newspapers, like our own, are not merely the organs of politicians, but of the entire community.

On the 13th April the people of Charleston, though by the defeat of the Federal iron-clads more than ever assured of the safety of their city, did not assume that the struggle was over. The Charleston Courier of that date considers it possible that the attack, so completely repulsed, "will be followed by other attacks, more fierce and of longer duration," and that "the garrisons of Forts Sumter and Moultrie and other strongholds will, doubtless, be subjected to unusual labours and privations." An appeal is made in the same article to civilians to supply the garrisons with coffee and tea, and by all means in their power to add to the comfort of their brave defenders, and to prepare them for the hard work anticipated. So, if the Federals are resolved to once more try their fortune at Charleston, they will find the Confederates ready to again do their best to defend themselves.

The Lynchburg Republican of the 13th of April contains a special despatch, which gives a very concise account of "Jeukins's expedition, with a small portion of his command, in Western Virginia." It was successful. The elections and Spring Courts of the bogus Government were being held under the direction and protection of Federal bayonets; and in all the counties west of the Kanawha river, where the Confederate force appeared or was expected, the Federal troops beat a hasty retreat, and the election farce and Spring Courts were over. The Confederates proceeded to a point on the Kanawha river, four miles below Evenfield, where they disabled two Government steamers that were passing. The same night they embarked in flat boats, floated down the Kanawha, and attacked and captured Point Pleasant. Next morning they defeated a small body of the enemy, destroyed a large quantity of stores, and took 150 horses. Notwithstanding the most desperate efforts of the Federals to cut off their retreat, the Confederates retired with the whole of their booty.

A telegram, dated Chattanooga, April 13, confirms the Federal account of the Confederate repulse at Franklin. General Van Dorn attacked the enemy with 7,000 cavalry and Freeman's battery. The Federals retreated, but advanced again with large reinforcements, when a bloody fight ensued. Freeman's battery was captured and Freeman killed. After six hours' hard fighting the Confederates had to retreat from the place, but before doing so they had recaptured their artillery.

Information was received at Tullahoma on the 13th of April, that General Wheeler had captured two trains, one between Louisville and Nashville, and the other between Nashville and Murfreesboro', with a large number of men and officers. The trains were destroyed.

The Confederates are amused at the Northern notion of a famine in the South. The Mississippian thinks that the Yankees will soon find out that Southerners possess "a wonderful gift at fasting." The difficulty to be provided against is not the want of sufficient food in the Confederacy to feed the population, but the want of transportation; and this is, if possible, to be remedied by growing food on every available acre in every county of every State. The absurdity of drawing any deductions from the prices at certain places was exposed by Mr. Henry in a recent debate in the Senate on the Impressment Bill. He said the "market price" was of all standards the most fallacious, and as an instance he observed that "Richard, when down in the dust and blood of Bosworth field, offered his 'kingdom for a horse.'" A Senator asked if there was any other bid? Mr. Henry replied that "there was no other bid, and that even without competition, that was the market value of a horse at that juncture." There is, however, little probability of the Confederate troops suffering much more from half rations. The call of the President has been responded to with alacrity. In an extra session of the South Carolina Legislature, out of six acts passed four had reference to the supply of food. One act was to amend and to increase the stringency of "An Act to prevent and punish the planting and cultivation in this State over a certain quantity of cotton during the present war;" and another Act was to suppress the distillation of spirituous liquors.

Now that all has been done that can be done to secure abundance, the Southern papers cease their urgent appeals, and find space for reports that promise superabundant supplies. The Rome Courier (Georgia), says, "The wheat crop is looking fine, and promises well." The Savannah Georgian says, "We have seldom seen the wheat crop present a more promising appearance at this season of the year, than it does now. In going and returning from Milledgeville by different routes, we did not see a single sorry field of wheat." A farmer writes to the Chattanooga Rebel, from Middle Tennessee, as follows:—"There has never been, in my recollection, a season which afforded us so much hope. The wheat is coming up beautifully, fresh and lively. I calculate to raise a large overplus beyond last year." The editor adds, "others, verbally and by letter, confirm this statement." The Charlotte Bulletin, North Carolina, says, "An immense crop of wheat has been planted in our section. We trust there will be a bountiful yield." The Richmond Enquirer, in an article on the crops, says, "The Jackson papers state that the wheat crop in Mississippi looks very promising—in fact, it could not look better. There is a large surface of soil in wheat, promising flour in abundance after the May harvest." The Richmond Sentinel says:—"A gentleman just from North Alabama gives a cheering account of the condition of affairs there. He represents the country as plentifully supplied with provisions, which can be procured at reasonable rates, compared with the unnecessary high prices in Virginia. We are assured that if North Alabama can be protected from the inroads of the enemy, she is now and will continue to be able to furnish a large surplus of supplies." The same paper, referring to Virginia, observes:—"The farmers are making preparations to plant a large crop of corn, oats, beans, and potatoes; thus far, the season has been very propitious, and we look forward to the corn crop with hope. We are glad that our farmers are fully alive to the importance of putting in large crops of spring seeds. Everywhere are they busy preparing the ground." These extracts are, we presume, sufficient to satisfy any one but the sanguine Yankees that there is no probability of the South being starved out.

Many, too, are the patriotic efforts being made to avert the partial sufferings that are incident to a state of warfare. Seven of the Banks of Savannah have acceded to a proposition made by the President of the Marine Bank to loan the city $10,000 each, without interest, and one a loan of $5,000, to be invested in provisions, which are to be sold at prime cost to the needy and others of Savannah. Mr. G. B. Lamar, of the same city, is selling rice at 10 cents per pound, by the single tierce, to the families of soldiers in actual service, or of those who died in the military service of the Confederate States. The soldiers are also doing their best to help their country by fostering its resources, as well as by fighting its battles. Last week we stated that at permanent camps, when off duty, they employ their time in cultivating vegetables; and we have now to record another instance of devoted and, we think, unprecedented patriotism. Both officers and privates in many regiments have commenced to deny themselves the pleasure of the social glass, and to invest the money thus saved in Confederate bonds, so that they may help to reduce the redundancy of Confederate notes and mitigate the distress caused by the abnormal state of the currency. We agree with the Knorrville Register, that this fact is "more encouraging than Northern peace rumours, or any possibility of foreign intervention."

Even the barbarous edict of the North that makes medicines contraband of war—the medicines that the sick and wounded Northern prisoners are allowed to share—is being rendered nugatory by the energy and patriotism of the people. Dr. W. H. Anderson, who is at the head of the Confederate States' Medical Purveyor's office in Montgomery, besides purchasing and distributing immense stocks of medicines and supplies of all sorts for the military hospitals, has improvised at small expense a chemical laboratory, where he is making medicines which either cannot be bought at all, or which are very scarce and high priced. During the last summer and fall he advertised for medicinal barks and plants, the growth of the Southern forests, and these were brought in to him in large quantities, from far and near, and at a trifling cost, for women and children were engaged in the work. The barks and plants are now being manufactured into extracts, tinctures, and other articles indispensable for hospital use. Many other medicines are being manufactured besides those made from domestic plants. Tannin, a very scarce article, and worth in the market $8 per ounce, is produced at the cost of $12 per pound. Chloroform, an article of prime necessity in surgery, is made for $4 per pound, the market price being $20. Sweet spirits of nitre, an article much used in the army, and exceedingly scarce, and bringing in the market $6 per pound, is made at less than ninety cents a pound. The laboratory, says the Mobile Register, has been got up with simple apparatus and great economy. The whole has not cost the Government more than $1000.

We also notice that a "Confederate quinine" has been prepared, which is said to be efficacious as a remedy.

The ladies throughout the Confederacy are cultivating the garden poppy. They slice the capsules, collect the juice on plates or glass, dry it, and forward it to the nearest medical purveyor. By this means a considerable quantity is secured of the medicine most needed by the army.

Every exertion is being made to obtain an adequate supply of paper. The Montgomery Mail gives a list of twenty paper mills in operation within the limits of the Confederacy:—one in Alabama, three in Georgia, five in South Carolina, eight in North Carolina, two in Virginia, and one in Tennessee. The mills are much impeded from the difficulty of procuring the raw material. But the South is not starved for paper. If there was anything like a complete dearth of that necessary article, we should not have to record that a new and ably-conducted daily paper, called the Sentinel, which takes for its motto,—"Let all the ends thou aimest at be thy Country's, thy God's, and Truth's," has been started in Richmond, and that the publication of the North Carolina Christian Advocate was resumed on the 1st of April. Of course papers are dearer. Those published in Richmond have been compelled to advance their prices. The Enquirer and Examiner have gone up to $15 for twelve months, and $8 for six months. The Whig has advanced to $12, and the Despatch to $10. The Sentinel is mailed at $10 per year. These rates are moderate when we consider that paper is nearly $1 a pound. The scarcity of paper stops the free list. The Charleston Mercury gives notice that single copies can be obtained at the office for 10 cents, but that the proprietors "can no longer afford to give out any copies gratuitously."

But for the war and the blockade, the South would never have known how thoroughly independent she is. Even ink has been a scarce and, therefore, a dear commodity, but now a "cheap ink" has been discovered. A black, free-flowing ink is made by boiling in water the bark of the bay or dwarf magnolia. The Wilmington Journal says—"This ink appears to us to be equal in every respect to any other we have seen, and is easily made from a material obtainable almost anywhere in the low country." A still more important discovery has been made by Dr. Parkes. It is that the wood of the mesquite tree, which abounds in Texas, is as good for tanning as the gum catechu of the West Indies.

It is stated by Dr. Parkes that a hide properly prepared can be tanned by it in twenty-four hours.

A fresh supply of salt has been discovered in Alabama. It has been found out that there are fine salines at the head of Bon Secour Bay; by digging down a few feet an inexhaustible supply of water can be obtained of the richest kind. It yields one bushel to sixty gallons. The Mobile Tribune says:—"The first day's boiling of this Bon Secour water is sufficient to do the work complete. It has been thoroughly tested, and several gentlemen are preparing to erect their kettles immediately. At the point alluded to the sea tide, for centuries, we suppose, has been impregnating the soil, which is found to be honeycombed by that queer little animal called the fiddler. In its reflux the salt has been deposited in these minute holes, and the result is that the water beneath the surface is a strong brine. It is easily reached, and, as we have said, is no doubt inexhaustible."

We are not surprised that the Confederates, thus thrown on their own resources, and left without aid or sympathy, to fight against the attempts of the North to subjugate them, should not desire to show undue leniency to foreigners. The bill for the conscription of aliens residing in the Confederacy is warmly advocated. The Richmond Enquirer hopes that Congress will pass the bill if it is constitutional. Foreigners living in the Confederate States, carrying on business, enjoying the protection of the laws, and of the armies which protect their property, as well as all other property, from pillage and confiscation, have not such an interest and duty as the citizens, who have national honour and national existence at stake; but "they have both an interest and duty strong enough and binding enough to impel them to fight for the land they live and thrive in; and quite strong and binding enough to justify us in making them discharge that duty if they be unwilling. At present, they exempt themselves from our military service by pieces of paper called protections, issued by gentlemen who are consuls under the enemy's Government, and who are liable to be controlled in their actions, and even discharged—as some of them have been—in consequence of complaints made to their own Governments by the Secretary of State of the public enemy."

We have put into italics the last four lines of our quotation from the Enquirer, because we wish to especially direct attention to one of the cases referred to, and which is, we submit, disgraceful and unpardonable, assuming that the facts are as stated.

Mr. James Magee, who has for upwards of thirty years occupied the post of British Vice-Consul at Mobile, has just been removed by the British Government, on account, it is alleged, of his sympathy with the cause of the Confederates. Well, how has this sympathy been manifested? The Governor of Alabama was anxious that the war should not hinder the English creditors of the State from receiving their interest in due course, and he arranged with the Bank of Mobile for £40,000 in gold to be transmitted to London. Upon being applied to Mr. Magee requested the captain of Her Majesty's steamship Vesuvius to call off Mobile to receive the treasure and carry it to England. The British captain before so doing obtained the permission of the Federal captain, Hitchcock. When the gold came to this country the Times, in its money article, remarked that it was honourable for Alabama to pay her interest so punctually under present circumstances. The Mobile Register says that Mr. Adams, seeing the remarks in the Times, "communicated the fact to Mr. Seward, and it is supposed that he must have demanded the recall of Mr. Magee. The British Government, in mean subserviency to the Lincoln Government, has complied with the request. Thus has an honourable man been dismissed from an office he has filled with credit to himself and advantage to his country, for performing an act of benefit to that country, after having received permission to do so from an officer of that Government at whose suggestion he has been removed." We understand the annoyance of the Federals that British subjects should be paid what is due to them, but we cannot understand the action of our Government.

The Confederates are determined that foreigners who reside in the South shall not, except under special circumstances, obtain the rights and privileges of citizenship. The object of this is twofold. First, to keep from the Confederacy the refuse of Europe, the emigrants who, in the United States brought nothing with them, and forthwith became the tools of political demagogues. Secondly, to prevent the Yankees from becoming Confederates by the simple expedient of taking the oath of fidelity to the Confederate States. In regard to this, the Richmond Whig observes:—

We have vastly more to fear from the Yankees after than during the war. They cannot conquer us by arms, but leave them free to enter our domain and enjoy there rights equal with our own, and they will pour over our borders in such numbers that all that we may have gained by successful war will be lost; we will be suffocated by numbers, debauched and Yankeeized by the contagion of their presence. For our part, we could see but little reason for continuing the terrible war in which we are engaged, if we knew that it was to end with the free and full privilege of citizenship left open to the Yankee. God knows we have enough of Yankee laws and institutions now, have been already sufficiently demoralized by their influence and presence to satisfy the most cosmopolitan politician. Let us for the future keep the sangre azule of the South free and pure from the base admixture. Let us have a citizenship of which we may be proud, and religion, laws, education, manners, and social habitudes uncorrupted by the leprous infusion of Yankeeism.

The Legislature of South Carolina has adopted a joint resolution of thanks to, and confidence in, General Beauregard and the forces under his command. In announcing this to the army in a General Order, dated April 10th, General Beauregard observes:—"The happy issue of the action on the 7th instant—the stranded, riddled wreck of the ironmailed Keokuk—her baffled coadjutors, forced to retire beyond the range of our guns, have inspired confidence in the country that our ultimate success will be complete. An inestimably precious charge has been confided to your keeping, with every reliance on your manhood and enduring patriotism."

A court of inquiry, consisting of Generals Hindman, Gardner, and Drayton, will soon meet at Jackson, Mississippi, to inquire into the conduct of Major-General Lovell in reference to the fall of New Orleans.

The George Chisholm, Captain Swann, has reached a Southern port, from Nassau. The Etna and the Anna arrived at Charleston on the 10th of April, from Nassau, with a cargo of merchandise, including a large quantity of Havannah sugar. On the 13th of April, a steamship arrived at Charleston, from Bermuda, with a cargo of army equipments for the Government.

Hard as the Confederates are working, it is not all work and no play in the South. On the 7th April—the day of the Charleston victory—a horse race took place at Mobile, under the auspices of the Magnolia Jockey Club. The Reporter of the Charleston Mercury says the attendance was large, the course in good condition, and all the backers confident. The favourite was "General Twiggs," a horse that was in the battle of Shiloh, in April, 1862. The old veteran won after a hard tussel. In the six, one mile, heats he was three times first, twice second, and once not placed. Southern horses can stand a campaign without being taken off their racing legs.

All kinds of amusements are advertised. Mr. Walter Keeble, "the favourite young tragedian," and Miss Helen Mayne, "who has now considerable reputation as a tragedienne in Mobile, Montgomery, and Nashville," are doing a good business at the Richmond "Varieties." Mr. John R. Thompson, Librarian of the Virginia State Library, has been lecturing on the "Ocean and the Mountains." Those who will think of nothing but war have been delighted with a moving panorama of the scenes of the war in Virginia. The programme of a grand instrumental concert embraces selections from "Norma," "Lucie di Lammaroor," "Lucretia Borgia," "La Sonnambula," and several airs from Donizetti. The music of Italy is evidently preferred to that of Germany. At Wilmington, the members of the Thalian Association have been playing the "Heir-at-Law" and "Did You ever send your Wife to Smithville," for the benefit of the poor of the city. The Wilmington people have no lack of dramatic amusement. At the Wilmington Theatre on the 11th of April the Bailey Troupe were to take part in the drama of "Ben Bolt." This was to be followed by a comic interlude entitled "The Conscript," and the performance was to conclude with a pantomime called the "Lazy Family."

FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

ALTHOUGH the season is far advanced, the London publishers have still many works to issue. Amongst the announcements, that made by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett of a new novel, by the Hon. Mrs. Norton, entitled "Lost and Saved," will awaken an unusual interest amongst a large class of readers. The name of Mrs. Norton recalls the period when Queen Victoria was in her girlhood, and when, though it is only twenty-five years ago, the majority of our present literary celebrities were unknown to fame. The same firm will publish next week a work, which, if we may judge of it from its title, should be pleasant reading. It is "Travels on Horseback in Mantchu Tartary; being a Summer's Ride beyond the Great Wall of China." The author of this book, which is to be illustrated with a map and fifty engravings, is Mr. George Fleming. Perhaps if we keep on good terms with the Tartar dynasty, or following the dictates of "manifest destiny," annex the Celestial Empire to the British Crown, the next generation may be nearly as familiar with the Great Wall and all about it as this generation is with the Rhine; but as yet China is almost a terra incognita, though the last few years have produced some able books of Chinese travel. There was long since a rumour that Sir Harry Parkes intended to write on the customs and literature of the Chinese, and his knowledge of the language and his official position would undoubtedly enable him to compose an instructive book.

Mr. Bentley may be sure that "The Life of Father Lacordaire," by the Count De Montalembert, will run through several editions. The career of Father Lacordaire, who was one of the finest orators of the Gallican Church, is sufficiently romantic to make a charming biography. The Count De Montalembert is a brilliant and fascinating writer; and from his peculiar studies, and his strong religious sentiments, no subject could have been selected that would better suit his pen.

Mr. Bentley will publish this month, "Incidents of the Last Maori War. By Colonel Sir James E. Alexander," and "Narrative of the Late War in New Zealand. By Lieut.-Colonel Carey." We shall be glad to learn something about our last little war, for which we presume we have had to pay the usual little bill. Some persons suppose that the conflict might have been avoided, and many, who do not dispute the justice of the war, are anything but satisfied with the way in which it was conducted. "An Errand to the South in the Summer of 1862. By the Rev. W. W. Mallet," announced by Mr. Bentley, has likewise, we imagine, something to say about warfare.

Possibly Mr. Kinglake and Dr. Colenso may feel gratified by the number of assailants that their works have called forth. We beg to remind those gentlemen that to provoke criticism by shocking the popular notions of propriety and religion, is not a proof of genius. Blondin the acrobat, and Joe Smith the Mormon have done the same thing, but for all that they are not heroes or martyrs. We should think that Mr. Kinglake must now begin to have a faint suspicion that he cannot impose his tirade of abuse against the Emperor of the French on the world as history. Sir Francis B. Head, who wrote a friendly biography of Napoleon III. at the time when it was the fashion to abuse his Majesty, has written an answer to Mr. Kinglake, which Mr. Murray will publish. Sir F. B. Head is familiar with the subject, and from his antecedents the necessary official documents have no doubt been placed at his disposal.

Messrs. Rivington have in the press "The Inspiration of the Book of Daniel, and incidentally of other portions of Sacred Scripture. With a correction of profane and an adjustment of Sacred Chronology," which we expect is a strictly orthodox work. There is also a book announced by Messrs. Macmillan and Co., written by the Rev. F. D. Maurice, called "The Claims of the Bible and Science." Mr. Maurice is what may be termed an ultra-theological radical, and the orthodox public will be agreeably disappointed if they do not find something in his book that betrays what our fathers would have called scepticism, but which we in this liberal age call "Neology."

Messrs. Macmillan have just ready a novel that will probably sell as well, if not better, than Mr. Maurice's book. It is "Austin Elliott," by Mr. Henry Kingsley. The first work of this author, "Geoffrey Hamlyn," found readers on account of the great reputation of his near relative, Professor Charles Kingsley, but it had enough intrinsic merit to justify the publication of his next novel, "Ravenshoe," in Macmillan's Magazine. If "Austin Elliott" is as superior to "Ravenshoe" as that work is to "Geoffrey Hamlyn," Mr. Henry Kingsley will take a high rank amongst our popular novelists.

Messrs. Trubner and Co. will immediately publish, "By her Majesty's Gracious Permission," a translation from the German of "Meditations on Life and its Religious Duties. By Frederica Rowan." This is a companion volume to "Meditations on Death and Eternity," and is dedicated to the Princess Louis of Hesse. It is not courtly flattery to say that the taste and judgment of the Queen are excellent, and that we anticipate that the work will in itself merit the attention that the Royal patronage will necessarily ensure it.

Madame Hugo has prepared a Life of M. Victor Hugo, which is to be published in London and Brussels. The book is to include a drama and other unpublished works of the poet. If it is half as well written and not half so long as "Les Misérables," it will be popular and deserve its popularity.

Mr. Newby announces "Yesterday and To-day," being a Sequel to "Fifty Years' Revelations," by Cyrus Redding. The gossip of a literary veteran is always pleasant and amusing. Mr. Newby has also just ready "Anecdotal Memoirs of English Princes," by Mr. W. H. Davonport Adams, who is a painstaking and graphic writer.

We will conclude this notice of a few of the forthcoming books, by a brief notice of a work that has been published, but not much read. We refer to a Parliamentary return which gives some interesting statistics of our Colonial Empire. We learn that our colonies (excluding India) comprise altogether an area of 3,350,000 square miles, and cost us for management £3,350,000, being at the rate of £1 per square mile. They have an aggregate revenue of £11,000,000, and a debt of £27,000,000, or just two years and a half's income. They import goods to the amount of £60,000,000 yearly, and their exports amount to £50,000,000, of which three-fifths come to this kingdom. The population of our colonies is under 10,000,000, of which only one-half are whites.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

RICHMOND, March 26.

The "ides of March" are come and gone, and, as yet, no fresh demonstration has been made upon the Capital, no attack upon Charleston, the "cradle of the Rebellion." The transfer of troops, of which I wrote you a month ago as having been made from Fredericksburg to Fortress Monroe, did not include more than 25,000 men, and had no reference, as we supposed, to a change of plans of "Fighting Joe Hooker." They have been replaced by new levies, and the army of "Fighting Joe Hooker" is now believed to be stronger than ever. His purpose holds to march upon Richmond, it is said, and nothing but the impassable condition of the roads has delayed his advance till this time. The first week in March was dry and blustering—high westerly winds prevailed, which, with clear skies, gave promise of a speedy stiffening of the winter's mud; but since the 8th of the month we had one continued succession of rains and snows, and the earth is now more thoroughly saturated with water than at any previous period of our inclement season. On the 10th inst., there was a heavy fall of hail and sleet, which was succeeded by several days of intense frost, with the mercury as low as 20° of Fahrenheit; after this we had drenching rains, and on the morning of the 16th, the meteorological phenomenon of a grand thunder-storm, lighted up by incessant vivid flashes of lightning, the temperature all the while being below the freezing point, and the water which fell congealing on house top, tree, and pavement, and coating everything with ice. On the 19th and 20th we had a fall of snow to the depth of ten inches, the last white patches of which have just been carried off by a copious rain, and now James's River is again above its banks, and threatening a destructive inundation. This résumé of the weather during the past four weeks will convince you that the roads of Stafford are at this moment no better than they were in early February, when the whole mighty "army of the Potomac" just escaped being swallowed up, with its chariots and horsemen, in a Red Sea of Virginia clay. Last week, according to a deserter, General Hooker attempted to move a 32-pounder siege gun, by attaching fifty horses to the carriage, but the animals, though urged with goad and thong to the utmost exertion of their strength, could not start it an inch. Accounts from Fredericksburg inform us that the Yankee army has given of late unusual signs of activity across the river, marching and countermarching from point to point, making the midnight air scintillant with rockets and vocal with the strains of their fine military bands. The balloon man makes his ascensions daily, and the pickets on the river bank are more than usually vigilant to prevent the interdicted exchange of newspapers: all this means simply nothing at all. The Chinese tactics of the enemy, as you may well imagine, will have no effect on our Commander-in-Chief. While the two armies have thus lain in the mud awaiting their opportunity, the cavalry of either side have been on the alert, our own horsemen especially distinguishing themselves in daring reconnaissances. In the latter part of February, General Fitzhugh Lee, at the head of 500 men, consisting of detachments of the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Regiments of Virginia Cavalry, fell suddenly upon a considerable body of the enemy's dragoons, near Harwood Church, six miles above Falmouth, in the county of Stafford, and drove them in confusion for several miles down the turnpike road, until they found protection behind a large infantry force. Though all our men engaged behaved with gallantry in this running combat, it was the 2nd Virginia Cavalry, under the personal lead of Colonel Thomas T. Munford, that rendered the most effective service, charging the enemy with the most admirable audacity, in the onset, and following close upon their flying squadrons, until these latter reached the safe refuge of their entrenched lines. Our loss was but three killed and four wounded, while that of the enemy was not less than fifty, left dead on the field or disabled by wounds, and 150 prisoners were sent to this city, among whom were five commissioned officers.

On the 17th of March a force of Federal cavalry under General Stoneman, variously estimated at from 3,000 to 7,000 strong, but believed by General Stuart to be the latter number, attempted to force our lines upon the Upper Rappahannock, for the purpose, as some think, of effecting a passage for a heavy column to the rear of Lee's army, or else with the bold design of pushing forward to destroy the Virginia Central Railway and the Confederate Commissary Stores at Gordonsville. They effected a crossing of the river at Kelley's Ford, after losing 200 men from the deadly fire of Major Breckinridge's Sharpshooters, of Fitzhugh Lee's Brigade, but were subsequently met and repulsed by the gallant sabreurs of this famous leader, supported by the Stuart Horse Artillery, commanded by the heroic Major Pellam, whose single loss in the action far outweighs the injury, great as it was, inflicted upon the enemy. As the affair at Kelley's Ford has been claimed by the Federal General and the Northern press as a brilliant victory of Yankee against Confederate horse, all the more precious because a decided novelty in the way of success, I send you herewith a statement from one who participated in it, which, though it must be taken with the allowance demanded by all ex parte accounts, seems to present truthfully the result of the encounter, and the incidents accompanying it. Our casualties were: killed, 10; wounded, 87; missing, 34.

The expedition against Charleston still remains in Port Royal Harbour and at Hilton Head, the huge vessels of war rolling idly upon the wave, and the generals on shore occupied with no more important business than the difficult one of making efficient soldiers out of the negroes stolen from the adjoining plantations. Hunter is now in chief command of the land forces. Three weeks ago Admiral Dupont wrote to Washington that Charleston was really impregnable from the sea, and that nothing was to be expected in the way of its reduction from the iron-clad armada. Notwithstanding which reasonable expectation of disaster, the naval attack will probably be hazarded in the moon's first quarter of the month of May, when the state of the tide and tranquil condition of the water will be more favourable to the undertaking.

It is evident enough that to Vicksburg the Lincoln Government now looks with the deepest interest, and the liveliest confidence for success in the military operations of the spring. Nothing can be more important for them in every point of view than to establish an uninterrupted communication by the river with their forces at New Orleans; and by their own confessions, they have no hope of subjugating the Confederate States as long as the Confederate batteries command the channel of the Mississippi. No energies have been spared to open the navigation of the river. The canal across the Vicksburg peninsula has been a work which they have conducted quite "regardless of expense." All other matters in the West have been subordinated to the capture of Vicksburg, and it is doubtless for the purpose of strengthening the army before it that Rosecrans has just withdrawn his forces from Murfreesboro'. Up to the present moment the progress of the Yankees has not been in the highest degree encouraging to President Lincoln. The canal is declared un grand succes by the New York papers, but it does not appear to afford a ready passage for their gun-boats; meanwhile these formidable engines of war have come to grief, above, below, and immediately opposite the city. On Friday, the 13th March, the Federal flotilla, which had pushed its painful way through the intricacies of Yazoo Pass, from the Mississippi to the Tallahatchie river, made an attack, supported by a land force, upon Fort Pemberton, situate at the point of junction of the Tallahatchie with the Yazoo, and was driven back badly crippled, and the supporting column considerably cut up, to make their way sorrowfully to the Mississippi again; and on Saturday the 21st, another fleet of gun-boats was repulsed in the Sunflower River, thirty miles above its confluence with the Yazoo, three of the number having been destroyed. General Frobisher was in command at Fort Pemberton, and Colonel Ferguson had charge of the batteries on Sunflower River. On Sunday morning, March 15, before the dawn, a large naval expedition, fitted out by Farragut at New Orleans, attempted in the darkness to pass the guns of Port Hudson. The vigilant garrison at once opened fire upon them with such effect that the United States' sloop-of-war Mississippi, carrying nine heavy guns, was burned to the water's edge, a companion vessel was completely riddled, the flag-ship Richmond was forced to drop down stream disabled, and all the rest were driven off except the Hartford and the Monongahela, which succeeded in getting by, very badly damaged. As nothing has been heard from these vessels since, it is conjectured that they are in no condition to ascend the river further, and they will sooner or later be captured by our own river navy, or sunk by the batteries of General Pemberton on shore. We have telegraphed information from Vicksburg this morning to the effect that yesterday two Yankee gunboats tried to run by the city, going down the river, and were demolished, the one sinking to the bottom and the other driven ashore, where the fire of our artillerists was knocking her to pieces. Thus you will see that the defence of the Mississippi is heroically maintained. Three months hence, when the subsidence of the waters will have left their big ditch dry, and our natural ally, the climate, shall have begun to decimate the ranks of the Federal army, the attempt to open the way to New Orleans must be postponed till another winter, thus affording us time to strengthen the river fortifications and increase our own local naval armament. But then, long before three months have passed away, the Union is to be restored, and the "blessed flag" is to wave from the Passamaquoddy to the Pascagoula, and all along the mighty Mississippi, from the falls of Minnehaha to the blue ripple of the Mexican gulf. I had, indeed, for the moment, quite forgotten this.

After two months of talking, both houses of Congress have taken to business of late with highly commendable energy. The most important measures which have been decided upon by final vote, are the Supreme Court Bill, the Currency Bill, and the Bill regulating the Impressionment of private property for public use. The Supreme Court was organised in accordance with the views of Messrs. Clay, Wigfall, Yancey, and others, as given in a former letter, without an appellate jurisdiction over the Courts of the several States. The Bill for the better regulation of the Currency combines the features of the two leading financial propositions submitted to Congress,—the one by Mr. Baldwin, of Virginia, in the House of Representatives, and the other by Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, in the Senate. It provides for the funding of outstanding Treasury notes in bonds on registered stock of the Confederate States, and fixes the maximum of circulation at $175,000,000, with a provision authorising the issue of notes of the denomination of $1 and $2 and 50c. to the extent of $15,000,000. The Impressionment Bill makes legal the seizure of private property for Government use, whenever the exigency of the army in the field shall require it, and provides for compensation to the owner in every case, the same to be adjusted where the property is in the hands of the producer, or has been purchased for private consumption, by two loyal and disinterested citizens of the vicinage, one chosen by the owner and one by the impressing officer; and where the property is held for purposes of sale and speculation, by two Commissioners in each State, to be appointed under the terms of the act, one by the President of the Confederate States, and one by the Governor of the individual State. The Bill as passed, was designed to harmonise conflicting opinions as to what constituted "just compensation," some gentlemen contending for an arbitrary award by appraisers to be appointed by the President, others declaring that the market value in all cases was the true amount of damages.

Yesterday the Tax Bill passed the House of Representatives, in secret session, by a vote of 50 to 30, and was at once sent up to the Senate for its concurrence, but has not as yet been acted upon by that body. The details of the bill have not, of course, been made public; but it is known to impose very heavy burdens upon all classes of the community, and it is supposed to look to the immediate raising of not less than Two Hundred Millions of dollars for carrying on the war and meeting the expenses of the Government. Some little excitement was produced a fortnight ago by the introduction in the House of Representatives of a resolution by Mr. Barksdale, of Mississippi, to empower the President, at his discretion, to suspend the Habeas Corpus, with the view, as was explained, of reaching disloyal and dangerous persons in various parts of the Confederacy, who could not be secured in any other manner, but the matter was laid upon the table, and it is not likely that it will ever be taken up. There is a very natural and rational distrust among our people and their representatives, of giving up, even in time of war, any of those constitutional muniments of personal liberty which have, one and all, been swept away by the reckless military despotism at Washington.

There has been an animated discussion in the journals of Richmond, and other cities of the South, with regard to the policy of holding out inducements to the States of the North-West to withdraw their troops from the Lincoln army, under the assurance that the Confederate States would gladly enter into commercial treaties with them, which would greatly promote their future prosperity. Mr. Foote, of Tennessee, may be considered the father of this policy, which he unfolded at some length several weeks ago in a letter addressed to a political friend in Georgia, although it is approved by many of the most eminent statesmen of the Confederacy, and was ably supported by the Richmond Whig, under the editorial management of an original Secessionist and strong thinker, Alexander Moseley, Esq. The Richmond Enquirer, in a series of leaders marked by much piquancy of style and richness of illustration, bitterly attacked the policy, charging that it harboured an arrière pensée of restoring the Union, and that it was a weakness little short of disloyalty to speak of holding any terms with men who were in arms against us, and at the time overrunning the valley of the Mississippi with fire and sword. The articles of the Enquirer were eagerly snatched up by the press of New York, and, as the Enquirer was regarded at one time, properly or improperly, as a sort of semi-official organ of the Administration, were spread broadcast over the West as the deliberately-uttered opinions of Jefferson Davis, whereas they were only the opinions of John Mitchell, for some weeks past, and at the present moment, the editor and redacteur-en-chef of the Enquirer, a brilliant writer and excellent citizen, but, as many think, not a very prudent counsellor. The controversy led to the introduction, in the House of Representatives, by Mr. Barksdale, of Mississippi, of a series of joint resolutions, the amount of which was a guaranty, to such States of the North-West as should desist from the prosecution of the war, of the free navigation of the Mississippi River. As this was one of the very first measures adopted by the Provisional Congress at Montgomery, Mr. Barksdale's resolutions cannot be considered as of great interest or value; but while there is not a public man of any weight in the Confederacy who advises, or would consent, to any, even a partial, reconstruction of the old Union, there are very many, I am satisfied, of the highest position and popularity, who would go much further than Mr. Barksdale in overtures to that great section of the North American Continent, whose outlet to the ocean is the Mississippi; and who, by the irreversible and unchangeable laws of geography must of necessity trade with the Confederate States when this weary war is over.

Much excitement and controversy were produced in the city three weeks ago, by the action of the Commissary-General, under the authority of the Secretary of War, in seizing for the use of the army, at prices fixed by the Commissary General himself, all the flour held for sale by the millers and produce dealers of Richmond. These prices were greatly below the market value of the article, and involved in many instances a heavy loss to the holders. One William B. Isaacs, a respectable merchant, from whom flour to the value of $22,000 had been taken by the impressing officers, sued out an injunction in the Hustings Court of Richmond to prevent the authorities from removing his property. The case was heard by Judge W. H. Lyons, who rendered an able opinion, granting the injunction, in which he held that the Government had no right to impress private property, except on great emergency showed to exist, and then only by making "just compensation" therefor, which he defined to be the market value of the article taken. This decision would have the greater significance had not Congress, by its Impressionment Bill, which I have already mentioned, provided an ample remedy for any injustice that may arise in future.

As the legitimate result of the decision of Judge Meredith upon the liability of foreigners to the Conscription laws, there has been an immense rush of this element of our population to the Northern States since the date of my last letter. The maladie du pays never more powerfully affected the Swiss mercenary upon hearing the strains of the Rue des Vaches in a strange clime than the desire to get back to the "ould country," the yearning for Fatherland, the love of the dulce et natale solum has melted the hearts of the unnaturalized at the promulgation of Judge Meredith's doctrines touching the Conscription. All the O's and the Macs, the Guisepes and Giacomos, the Ludwigs and the Levis besieged the office of the Provost Marshal for days afterwards, asking for tickets of leave. It amounted almost to another Exodus of Israel. The immediate consequences of this flight of the tribes was a sudden and alarming rise in the price of gold and sterling, which are yet held by the brokers at the enormous premium of 400 per cent. Great as is the depreciation of our currency, it cannot be doubted that this exaltation of specie is factitious and temporary, and that when the foreigners have left us, the money market, under the operation of the Currency Bill and the Tax Bill, will undergo a salutary reaction.

Notwithstanding the privations of the period, involving distress among all classes of the community, the spirit of the people is as high as ever, their hearts as buoyant as after the memorable battles of the Chickahominy. There is a little park of twelve acres around the Capitol building, upon the crest of the highest of the hills over which Richmond is scattered, in the very midst of the town. Here upon fine afternoons there is a dress parade of the City Battalion—a military organization of 500 men for local police and home defences—and the crowds which assemble to witness the display and listen to the music of the band, impart to the grounds much of the air of a Continental pleasure garden. The intelligent Englishman looking on at the sight, as the familiar strains of "Martha" or the "Barbieri" floated through the trees, would with difficulty apprehend the fact that the men and women before him had eaten but scanty dinners, and that many of them knew not whence should come the breakfast of the morrow. The Yankees make merry over the prospective famine among "the rebels," and trust to it, with far more confidence than to their armies, for the triumph of their cause. They little know the Southern character, or the intensity of hatred which hunger will only make more bitter in the Southern heart.

It is altogether probable that Congress, before its adjournment, will adopt a flag and seal for the Republic. The flag will be the battle ensign, which has been baptized in the best blood of our people upon a hundred glorious fields, symbol at once of victory and of hope. The device is simple, on a red field, a blue saltire, with white stars. The design for the seal, which seems to secure universal approval, is the figure of Washington on horseback, as it appears in the equestrian statue of Crawford. We are eminently a horse-riding people, and the image is therefore appropriate, while the effect will be artistic. The horseman upon the Great Seal has been familiar to the English people since the days of William the Conqueror.

I have mentioned the editorial connection of Mr. Mitchell with the Richmond Enquirer. You will, perhaps, like to know of other changes in the journalism of the capital. Mr. Moseley has retired from the conduct of the Whig, intending to devote himself to the cultivation of grain for the remainder of the war, upon his farm in Nelson county; and Dr. George W. Bagby, a gentleman well known in Southern letters, has succeeded to the editorial duties of that paper, in conjunction with Mr. James McDonald, who has been upon its staff for several years. A new journal, entitled The Sentinel, edited by Mr. Richard M. Smith, formerly of Alexandria, but more recently engaged upon the Enquirer, made its appearance about the beginning of March. Its issues are daily, and it bids fair to attain a wide circulation. Another daily paper is announced to appear in the month of April, under the name of the Evening Gazette. The literary weekly, the Illustrated News, is steadily increasing in value and public favour, and a rival hebdomadal, the Magnolia, has recently been enlarged and greatly improved, under the charge of Mr. O. P. Haines.

The month of March has been marked by two serious disasters in this city. On the morning of the 11th, a fire broke out in the large buildings, near the river, known as "Public Warehouse," and before it could be extinguished, had consumed property to the value of a million of dollars. The principal use of the warehouse was the storage of tobacco, on which the State is an insurer, but it has been occupied in part of late by the Confederate Government as a dépôt of commissary stores. Eight hundred hogsheds, including the tobacco held by Mr. Belmont, of New York, for the MM. Rothschild, and three hundred bags of grain were destroyed.

At half-past 11 a.m. of Friday, the 13th, a terrific explosion, resulting from the careless handling of a friction primer, took place in the cartridge factory on Brown's Island, at the foot of 7th Street, by which thirty-three persons, mostly young women, were instantly killed, and thirty-five others, more or less severely, wounded. Ten or twelve of the latter have since died of their wounds. The distress occasioned by this most appalling calamity was among the poorer class of the community, many aged parents depending upon the wages received by their children in the factory, wages which were high on account of the perilous nature of the work. A liberal subscription has been taken up for the benefit of the wounded sufferers and the impoverished surviving relatives.

You have doubtless received intelligence of the death of James L. Petigru, the eminent lawyer of South Carolina, which sad event took place in Charleston, on the 9th instant. Virginia mourns the loss of an accomplished scholar and most estimable gentleman in the recent death of Lewis Minor Coleman, late Professor of the Latin Language and Literature, in the State University at Charlottesville. At the breaking out of the war, he left the Professor's chair for service in the field, and bore an honourable part, as an officer of artillery, in the operations of Lee's army down to the Battle of Fredericksburg, where he sustained his death wound. He lingered in great agony for three months, but bore his affliction with the serene fortitude of the Christian soldier.

There is an active competition going on for the office of Governor of Virginia, the election for which will be held on the fourth Thursday in the month of May. Several candidates are already in the field, among whom are William Smith, of Fauquier, an ex-Governor and sitting Member of the House of Representatives, and George Wythe Mumford, the present Secretary of the Commonwealth, and son of the translator of the "Iliad." The latter will probably be elected, and certainly the choice of the people could not fall on a better man.

General Toombs has resigned his commission in the army.

The letter from our Mobile correspondent on the Southern War Songs is unavoidably displaced by the news letter from Richmond. It will appear in our next impression.

FURTHER SOUTHERN ACCOUNTS OF THE BATTLE OF CHARLESTON.

(From the Wilmington Journal, April 13.)

The Charleston papers and the despatches to the Associated Press have already given all the essential details of the recent attack upon the defences of Charleston, and leave little to be added in that way.

The attack commenced at about three o'clock on the afternoon of Tuesday, the 7th inst., and closed at about half-past five of the same afternoon, at which time the last of the iron-clad fleet had retired out of range, the batteries and forts having thus succeeded in repulsing an attack made by eight Monitors, one Whitney battery, and one iron-clad frigate. The two last named, the Keokuk and Ironsides, were so severely handled that the former sank not long after, and the Ironsides was evidently disabled.—The injury to the Monitors is not definitely known, but the disappearance of the Passaic, probably gone to Port Royal for repairs, with the repairing operations seen to be progressing on another boat, which has remained, combine to account for the failure of the enemy to renew the attack on the next or any other day of last week, and force us to the conclusion that they must have been very severely injured.

A telegraphic despatch received on Tuesday evening, caused us to leave for Charleston on Wednesday morning, for the purpose of bringing away a young relative at school in that city. A desire to see anything that might occur kept us there until Friday evening, but without having the opportunity of seeing a single shot exchanged. The enemy's iron-clads were still, at the latest dates, lying inside the bar, but round the point of Morris Island, so as to be invisible from the city. Our own two boats, the Chicora and Palmetto State, were cruising in the harbour. The Quartermaster's boats with rations, &c., for Mount Pleasant, James Island, &c., were crawling around the harbour. The Confederate flag still floated proudly from Sumter, Moultrie, Johnson, Batteries Bee and Beauregard, as well as from Fort Ripley and the works on Morris Island. The city, as we saw it, was quiet; people went about as usual, and little indicated the fact of a recent cannonade or the presence of a hostile force inside the bar. Outside, the masts of the blockaders were occasionally just visible. But the calmness which prevailed in Charleston was evidently not that of carelessness. The attack had been long expected, people had made up their minds and completed their arrangements, and were glad to have the suspense put an end to. Business of all kinds, however, might be said to stand still. The banks were closed and their business removed, and the stores presented a beggarly array of empty shelves. He, she, or it, who might go a shopping along King Street would find little to buy and much to pay.

The hotels were full, and at the Mills House or the Charleston Hotel might occasionally be seen many distinguished military men, either actually on service at Charleston, or drawn there by the reported attack. General Beauregard puts up at the Mills House, and has his headquarters on Broad-street, below Church. He looks well and cheerful, and, as we were informed, expressed himself fully satisfied, indeed, highly gratified by the result of the contest of Tuesday evening. General G. W. Smith, an intelligent-looking middle-aged gentleman, with a firm and decided cast of countenance, having resigned his commission in the Confederate army, is in Charleston in plain black clothes, having come on to make himself useful in any way. He is a Kentuckian by birth.

The Charleston papers say that the iron-clads came within fourteen, twelve, and eight hundred yards of Sumter. Gentlemen who were spectators of the scene from James' Island and from Sullivan's Island told us in Charleston that in their opinion none of them approached nearer than fourteen or sixteen hundred yards, and the fact that all or nearly all the shots from the Monitors were made to ricochet—that is, to strike the water and rebound before striking the fort, seems to us to show that they could not have been much less than a mile distant, otherwise it is difficult to understand why ordnance of such weight and range should not have been fired directly at an object like the fort, presenting a height of over fifty feet and a largely extended front. If, indeed, the Whitney boat, the Keokuk, did venture much nearer, she paid dearly for her temerity, and it is not likely that the others will soon repeat the experiment which proved so disastrous to the pet invention of the worthy New York ironmonger. Still less will they be inclined to attempt to run past the fort, since to do so they must pass within short pistol range, and under a plunging fire upon their decks, which are only protected by two-inch iron. Several of the shots fired at the Fort ricocheted over it, and were seen to strike the water beyond.

Of course there are always rumours of all sorts afloat about damage done, and of course such rumours were afloat in reference to Sumter, the parapet of which had several bricks knocked off, but without interfering with the working of the guns or the strength of the work. Other parts of the wall are decidedly pitted, but neither rent, crack, nor breach made, nor anything like it. The injury to the parapet has been repaired, and the whole work is believed to be as strong as it was at 3 o'clock on Tuesday, when the first gun was fired.

If, as stated, only eighty shots were fired at the fort, in two hours and a-half, by some thirty-four guns, it would indicate very slow firing on the part of both the turreted vessels and the Ironsides, even allowing one half of the shots fired to have been directed against the other forts and batteries, giving, as it would, only five discharges from each gun, which would go to confirm the reported difficulties in the way of managing the monster guns in the turrets. The correspondent of a Northern paper said that the invulnerability—the defensive power of the Monitors had been settled—their power of attack had yet to be proved. It certainly has not yet been proved either at Fort M'Alister or Fort Sumter, while the result of the attack upon the latter fort throws serious doubts upon their assumed invulnerability. The question of the offensive and defensive power of Monitors as opposed to forts has not yet been fully decided, but the result of the experiment, so far as it has gone, has been highly encouraging to us. Of course it is not to be supposed that the attack on Charleston will be abandoned so soon, or until every means has been exhausted. The Yankee preparations have been too long planned and carried out at too great an expense to permit their being thrown aside while a hope remains of success. We will hear of other and more desperate attacks both by land and water, which we believe will be repelled. It is difficult to feel any absolute confidence of any future event, all the issues of which have not been tried, still we can say that in the present aspect of this attack upon Charleston, we see many grounds of encouragement, if not absolute confidence.

We are not aware of any landing having yet been made, except on Coles' Island, which is barely separated from James Island by a marsh and creek, over and through which we believe there had been, if there is not still, a bridge and causeway. There are not probably more than 6,000 men there yet. From our look-out station on James' Island a large number of transports were visible last week at Coles', most of them white painted Northern river steamers. We think our forces on James' Island, with the works there, sufficient to repel any force that the enemy could bring forward against them. There is no place on the island whereupon to manœuvre 10,000 troops in attack.

Morris' Island contains the point of land nearest Fort Sumter—Cumming's Point. South and west of Morris Island, and separated from it by a narrow channel, is Folly Island. It was supposed that the enemy might land upon Folly Island and erect batteries on the end next to Morris Island, with the view of taking our works on the latter island in reverse, compelling their abandonment, and thus obtaining a foothold on land for the purpose of erecting batteries to bear upon Sumter. Our military authorities are not asleep as to this probable movement of the enemy, which will not succeed. There was also a rumour in Charleston last week, that the enemy was landing or attempting to land troops at Bull's Bay, some distance north of Charleston. We do not think that this report is worthy of attention, inasmuch as it would be the height of folly for the Yankees to even think of such a thing—the very thing which our people would prefer that they should do.

The Sea Islands along the South Carolina coast are certainly fair and fertile spots, and it is painful to see their rich fields lying waste and their comfortable homes desolate. On last Thursday afternoon we visited James' Island, and passed the night at the camp of the 61st N. C. T., belonging to General Clingman's brigade. We were glad to meet many old friends among our troops there, and to find them in good health, generally speaking. Pneumonia and typhoid fever seem to be the prevailing diseases, although to our surprise we found a few cases of measles among those, conscripts or others, who had recently joined. Colonel Radcliffe, Lieut.-Colonel Devane, Quartermaster Anderson, Surgeon Harris, Captain J. F. Moore, Lieutenants Van Amringe and Lippitt, and, indeed, all our friends from this section were well, or if anything ailed them it was nostalgie, home-sickness. If any one doubts the devotion of North Carolinians to their native State, just let him visit one of their camps in another State. None would think of leaving before the fight at Charleston is over, and all who do their duty well and bravely, but they do want the long agony to be over, so that they may return to North Carolina to assist in driving the invaders from the borders of the old North State.

The war correspondent of the Charleston Courier, under date of Charleston, April 12, says:—

The great Yankee armada is taking its departure. Early this morning a vessel, similar to the one which left immediately after the battle to carry despatches to the North, arrived in the fleet, and soon after it became apparent that important intelligence had been received. It being the anniversary of the first battle of Fort Sumter, the belief had generally gone abroad that the enemy would this day make their grandest efforts to reduce our fortifications and recapture the city. But when the afternoon arrived, and it was discovered that instead of advancing to another attack the Yankees were slowly picking up their anchors and moving away, hopeful anticipation gave way to disappointment, and a universal feeling of regret pervaded the entire community.

Notwithstanding the sinking of the Keokuk and evident damage to various members of the fleet, few among the officers in command were of the opinion the enemy would not give us a second trial, and when the several vessels got under weigh few thought the cowardly foe was about to take his departure. Yet it was even so, and at sundown the majority of the fleet were fading from view on the distant horizon. Of the iron-clads, one alone remains—the frigate New Ironsides—which is anchored off the bar. The others took a southerly direction, as did also the wooden vessels of the squadron, and by the time these notes are read, will probably be safely anchored in Port Royal. The Ironsides was towed to her present anchorage, and one of the Monitors was in the same manner conveyed from her moorings. Whether this argues an inability to move of their own accord, is a matter of doubt.

Twenty-four transports, supposed to be loaded with troops, have left the Stono, and the enemy are reported to be evacuating Folly Island. The latter rumour should be received with caution.

With reference to the injury inflicted on the Monitors during the late battle (excepting, of course, the sunken Keokuk) there is no definite information, save what has been obtained from a prisoner captured on Little Folly Island, Friday night, by Lieut.-Colonel Dargan, of the Twenty-first South Carolina Regiment, and a squad of men. The name of the prisoner is John MacDonald, and his regiment the One Hundredth New York.

Although an intelligent man, he tells some of the biggest lies that ever is used from the lips of mortal man, and a careful examination only served to involve him in a tissue of fabrications and exaggerations, which spoiled his entire story. The statement he made is, that none of the iron-clads were seriously damaged, and that the attack was designed simply to test the strength of the Fort—a sort of reconnaissance en force—and was regarded by naval men as eminently satisfactory. They now feel assured of their ability to reduce Fort Sumter in ten hours with two iron-clads—and intend to do it. MacDonald adds that they have altogether a fleet of twelve Monitors, seventeen or eighteen vessels which are iron-clads, and a large flotilla in the Edisto, on which are mounted the heaviest mortars.

With reference to the Keokuk, he states that her turret was not materially injured, and that she sank, not from the effect of our fire, but from the concussion of her own guns, which "broke her back."

Such is the Munchausen account of the prisoner. The only valuable part of it is that which refers to the concussion of the enemy's heavy guns. Taking the recent confession of a Northern correspondent who was on the Montauk during the bombardment of Fort M'Alister, in connection with the above, the inference is almost conclusive that the Monitors cannot safely withstand the shock of their own guns sufficiently long for a protracted bombardment. The effect on the systems of the men is not less than the effect on the vessels themselves, so that were it probable that the latter may hereafter be constructed in such a manner as to remove one part of the difficulty, ventilation and personal concussion are two obstacles that are insuperable in boats of that character. Four or five hours in battle, and firing at intervals of twenty minutes, is the most they can endure.

The destruction of the Keokuk is by no means a satisfactory test of the strength of the other Monitors, as the latter are constructed upon an entirely different principle. The Keokuk was an experiment, which failed. Had we sunk one of the single turreted monitors, we should then have known something of the invulnerability of the others of her class. As it is, we are as much in the dark as ever.

On Saturday the city was filled with conflicting rumours as to the sinking of the Ironsides. Several gentlemen with good glasses observing the ship from the cupola of the Custom House, averred that she was surely settling by the stern, while a dummy engine was seen briskly pumping out water or lowering her guns to the boat which lay alongside. No subsequent revelation has verified the correctness of these observations, however, and the probability is that the frigate is still comparatively sound. If not, why is she outside the Bar?

The firing on Saturday evening about sundown is said to have been an effort by the enemy to shell Morris Island.

The future movements of the fleet are enveloped in mystery. It is barely supposable that after two years of preparation the Abolitionists will be satisfied with the result of a two hours' bombardment. But they encountered what they did not fully anticipate, lost faith in their boasted prowess, and may have simply retired to gain strength and time, and organise another base of operations. Perhaps they will now give Savannah or Wilmington a trial, hoping, if successful, to wipe out the disgrace of their present defeat; but that they will return to Charleston eventually, I believe there is little doubt. PERSONNE.

(From the Charleston Courier, April 9th.)

Yesterday passed without any further demonstration on the part of the enemy's fleet.

At nine o'clock the glorious news reached the city that the double-turreted Monitor, Keokuk, the last built, and by far the most formidable of the enemy's iron-clads, had sunk just one hour before, off Morris Island, and about 1,000 yards from the beach. It is supposed that she was kept afloat during the night succeeding the engagement by the steam pumps, but that the water gained steadily on her pumps, and soon after daylight all hope of saving her was abandoned. Just previous to her sinking a tug sent from the fleet took off her crew. The Keokuk now lies in the position where she sank, her smoke-stack and pilot-house being still visible above the water.

It was noticed on Wednesday morning that one Monitor, besides the Keokuk, was missing from the fleet, leaving only seven Monitors and the Ironsides remaining. It is believed that the missing Monitor was so badly injured in the action as to render it necessary to send her to Port Royal for repairs. Altogether, the evidence is complete and satisfactory that the Yankee iron-clads, whatever other merits they have, are not invulnerable.

The haste and confusion of the enemy in his retreat may be inferred from the fact that he did not take time to secure the machine which he had brought with him for the purpose of feeling for our torpedoes. This nondescript contrivance, or "devil," as the Yankees term it, floated ashore on the Morris Island beach on Wednesday forenoon, and fell into the hands of our troops. We learn that it is simply a long and substantially built scow, having a bow beautifully supplied with hooks, etc., and with a forked stern, so constructed as to fit the prow of one of the Monitor gunboats. In coming up the Main Ship Channel to the attack, the Monitors advanced in single file, the Pascata slowly leading the way, and pushing forward this same "devil," with the hope of causing a premature explosion of our submarine defences. The Monitors, in delivering their fire, steamed around in an elliptic course in front of the east face of Sumter, the closest range into which they came being estimated at six hundred yards.

All the batteries in the harbour were commanded by General Ripley, admitted to be probably the best artillery officer in the Confederate service, whose approved arrangement of works and of guns for the defence of the water approach to Charleston have at length been put on trial.

General Beauregard himself, accompanied by General Jordan and staff officers, was a radiant and confident spectator of the fight from the East Bay battery promenade. This successful repulse and first destruction of the dreaded iron monster of the deep, must add new laurels to the fadeless wreath he already wears, and again unite his own triumph with the distinguished and so far successful services of General Ripley to the people of South Carolina and Charleston.

At dark last evening the Monitors were still within the bar. The heavy reports, however, heard about 11 o'clock last night were not caused by any night engagement.

THE FINALE OF THE FIGHT FOR THE HARBOUR.

(From the Charleston Mercury, April 13.)

Proudly this 13th day of April, the second anniversary of the surrender of Fort Sumter, dawns upon the City of Charleston. The boasted iron-fleet, which was in three hours to have reduced our defences and pulverised the walls of Fort Sumter, battered and discomfited by our skilled artilleryists, after tarrying five days within our bar, probably to repair damages and get orders from Washington, has gone. Abiit, excessit, evasit, erupit!

Yesterday afternoon at three o'clock the Monitors crossed the bar—three of them steaming, the other three towed by wooden vessels. Most of them passed southward, and were soon lost to the view. It is likely that they have gone to Port Royal, whither one of their number, worse injured, probably, than the rest, had preceded them four days ago. The Ironsides frigate was also towed beyond the bar, and at dark yesterday had resumed the position she lately occupied as the flag-ship of the blockading squadron. It is stated, however, by observers that her steam pump has been kept steadily in motion, that her water line has been raised by the removal of a portion, at least, of her armament, and that she has been careened, evidently undergoing repairs on one side.

From the Stono River we also get intelligence that twenty-four of the transports, recently anchored in that stream, have disappeared—whether to remove troops, or only to bring more to Folly Island, with a view to the capture of Morris Island, we know not. But, at any rate, the progress of the great Yankee movement towards Charleston, both by land and sea, has been suddenly stayed in the first and most dreaded advance, and our people, while they may not rejoice in the expectation that their final ordeal is passed, can at least enjoy a breathing spell from anxiety concerning the water approach, while every exertion should be given towards the security of Charleston otherwise.

In announcing to the public this almost ludicrous, hardly expected, and most gratifying conclusion of the vaunted attack of the steel-plated Yankee armada, crippled, defeated and driven back in an engagement of not two hours and a half with a few admirably served batteries, we cannot forbear to invoke a proper spirit of profound thankfulness to the Giver of Victory, and of humble, prayerful trust in Him for a continuance of the providential mercies which, beginning with the reduction of Sumter two years ago, have signally marked the progress of operations in this quarter.

(From the Charleston Mercury of April 13.)

The Morris Island batteries that participated in the recent engagement with the iron-clad fleet were battery Wagner and the Cumming's Point Battery. They were ordered not to open fire until the last of the attacking fleet had come within range, and hence it chanced that their first fire was directed against the doomed monster Keokuk. The firing at these batteries, like that at all the others which were engaged, was highly creditable—a large proportion of their shots having hit the mark. We have heard the manner in which the guns at the Cumming's Point Battery were handled highly commended. In entering the fight, by way of Ship Channel, the Monitors passed battery Wagner with closed ports; but when withdrawing, baffled and disappointed, from the contest, every turret vomited forth its huge missiles against the defiant sand fort. Battery Wagner was commanded by Major Cleland K. Huger, and was manned by the Mathewes Artillery, Captain J. Raven Mathewes, and the Gist Guard, Captain C. E. Chichester, who hastened from a sick bed to participate in the fight. The Cumming's Point Battery was commanded by First Lieutenant Lesene, and manned by a detachment from his regiment, the 1st South Carolina (regular) Artillery. Neither battery was damaged by the enemy's fire, and the only casualties that occurred were those resulting from the accidental ignition and explosion of an ammunition chest.

THE COMBAT.

(From the Richmond Enquirer.)

The campaign of this year is upon us in earnest. This very moment the grand, combined, long-awaited for assault on the city of Charleston, by sea and land, is raging with transcendent hate and fury. Grey old Sumter, that has lain sternly quiet for two years, as the crater of an extinct volcano, has suddenly awakened into furious eruption, and belches forth flame and red-hot iron like a throat of the bottomless pool. The parent city of the Confederacy feels that she is the object of the dearest vengeance to the black heart of the common foe. She has known well that all the resources of science, all the appliances of wealth and ingenuity, all the gathered hatred and rage of half a century, have been concentrating themselves for the effort to abolish every home and hearth, every tower and temple of the proud and scornful city of the South, to plough up her foundations, to manure the smoking field that once was her pleasant site with the best blood of her sons, and to plant between the Ashley and the Cooper a monument to certify to posterity that once an accursed city stood there—that she defied the Yankee nation, and that, like Sodom and Gomorrah, she was consumed by fire from Heaven—or from Hell.

Whatever be the destiny of the Confederacy, this is the day of fate for Charleston. The very hour that strikes is pregnant with that great supreme trial which is to make her the most glorious of towns, or to wipe her off from the face of the earth. If the ruffian of the North indeed make a serious attack, it will be of terrible power and proportions, but it will be fiercely and desperately met. Envious and malignant rage, on the one side, will encounter, on the other, the haughty, disdainful gallantry of Southern gentlemen, who, even if driven to the wall, and fighting to the death in the last pool of blood, of the last forlorn hope, in the last crashing and burning street, will scorn the base foe whose brute mass crushes them to the earth. There will be a gallant death to die! un bon trepas; an Authanasia worth living for! Far better than the death-in-life of our unhappy people of New Orleans, where manhood pines and withers, and the iron enters into the soul and corrodes it; and the whole being is drowned in shame and horror; far better this grim rapture of battle, wherein, having done all that man can do for country and glory, "you pour out your full soul in a hot torrent of red, raging blood, triumphant defiance in your eye, and an appeal to Heaven's justice on your lips." But by Heaven's blessing it shall not be so. Let us trust in the devoted patriotism of our armies, and in the star of Beauregard.

THE RICHMOND PRESS ON THE RECALL OF THE CONFEDERATE COMMISSIONERS.

On this subject, which is again being most earnestly mooted both in the Congress and by the press of the Confederate States, the Richmond Sentinel—a new paper, but which appears to have already taken a conspicuous stand in Southern journalism—in its impression of April 9 says:—

Some days since a resolution was offered in the House of Representatives, declaring its opinion that if the President shall withdraw Mr. Mason from Great Britain, the country would approve the proceeding. Thirty-nine members voted to suspend the rules to entertain this resolution, and thirty-two in the negative. So the thing fell to the ground for the time.

We are at a loss to understand how this resolution failed to receive a more decided rejection. The President certainly does not need any lectures or monitions on this head. He probably has more information on the subject than the members of Congress, and some, perhaps, that it would be a flagrant breach of trust to divulge.

Why make an issue with him? Is it to be assumed that he is so defective in a sense of honour and a regard for the public interests, that he cannot be trusted with this matter? Of all subjects this is one that he should be trusted upon, and if on this he cannot be trusted, we ask what point remain on which he can be confided in? There is no disguising or cloaking the real nature of this business. It is a direct issue with the President on a matter which the country has willingly, unanimously confided to him, and a deliberate effort to constrain him to do an act which he regards as wrong and injudicious. Now this is a very serious position for members to take, and we feel sure that the responsibility to be taken in breaking down the President's policy will not be found a light one by those who undertake it.

We have no wish to impeach, even by indirection, the motives of those who sustained this resolution. Many, if not all, were doubtless governed by the most patriotic feelings, and probably had no intention of putting any undue pressure upon the President, upon a matter where all must feel that he is peculiarly the proper person to act; having all the lights before him, and reasons, possibly, of a most forcible nature, which are not of a public nature. The responsibility of determining whether Mr. Mason can be safely recalled, is one that the people are perfectly willing to leave to the President. With some opportunities to gather public opinion, we can assure Congress that the great mass of the people are ready to do anything to carry on this war successfully, and that they prudently consider that a very essential step in the business is to stand by the President of their choice, and to give him a cordial and fair support. If mischief should come from an interference with the President upon a matter where he is possessed of all the facts and Congress are not, the people will hold those who have favoured such interference to a strict accountability. We are sure that the able and useful body of representatives who make up the present Congress, will feel that to press this matter would be unjust to the President, and that it would be more safe to leave it with him than to attempt action upon it themselves. A little moderation, now and then, does more good than rash men are willing to acknowledge. Certainly, we are not so weak at this time, that it is necessary to resort to what may be looked upon by the world as a piece of bluster. Why make ourselves ridiculous by imitating Seward and Lincoln? And why do an act which would please them more than anything we could do, except submitting to their power?

For contrast, the Enquirer, which is supposed more especially to represent the views of the Administration, a few days later, takes the Sentinel sharply to task for what it terms its indiscreet and uncalled-for defence of the President against Congress, and concludes:—

For our own part, we openly profess the opinion, contained in Mr. Swann's resolution, which is certainly shared by the House, and possibly by the President also, that the time has arrived when it may well be carefully weighed and considered whether Mr. Mason ought not to be recalled—whether every hour we retain him in London we are not submitting to humiliation and inviting affront; and, finally, whether any secret reasons of State, no matter how important, can ever be reasons good enough for continuing Mr. Mason in London, and British Consuls in our ports.

On the whole of these questions, we are willing, as Congress also is, to defer implicitly to the President.

THE PLAN OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR FOR SUPPLYING THE ARMIES.

The following is the plan of the Confederate Secretary of War for supplying the Confederate armies with food, to which President Davis makes allusion in his address:—

1.—Let the people in each county, parish, or ward, select at a public meeting, as early as convenient, a committee of three or more discreet citizens, charged with the duties hereinafter mentioned.

2.—Let it be the duty of the committee to ascertain from each citizen in the county or parish what amount of surplus corn and meat, whether bacon, pork, or beef, he can spare for the use of the army, after reserving a supply for his family and those dependent on him for food.

Let this committee fix a price which is deemed by them a just compensation for the articles furnished, and inform the citizens what this price is, so that each may know, before delivery, what price is to be paid for the articles furnished.

Let this committee make arrangements for the transportation of the supplies to some convenient depot, after consultation with the officer who is to receive them.

Let the committee make delivery of the supplies on receiving payment of the price, and assume the duty of paying it over to the citizens who have furnished the supplies.

3.—Where the duty of the committee is performed in any town or city at which there may be a quarter-master or commissary, no further duty need be required of them than to deliver to the officer a list of the names of the citizens and of the supplies which each is ready to furnish, and the price fixed; whereupon the officer will, himself, gather the supplies and make payment.

4.—Where the supplies are furnished in the country the cost of transportation to the depot will be paid by the Government, in addition to the price fixed by the committee.

5.—As this appeal is made to the people for the benefit of our brave defenders now in the army, the Department relies with confidence on the patriotism of the people that no more than just compensation would be fixed by the committee, nor accepted by those whose chief motive will be to aid their country, and not to make undue gains out of the needs of our noble soldiers.

JAMES A. SEDDON, Secretary of War.

THE NEW ORLEANS PRESS.—The Memphis (Tennessee) Appeal is furnished by a friend with the following facts relative to the press of New Orleans:—"Before the fall of New Orleans the editorial corps of its six daily papers had contributed the following respectable quota in the Confederate army: two colonels, two lieutenant-colonels, one major, three captains, one lieutenant, and one colour sergeant. The composition, press, and counting rooms had furnished so many officers and men that after engaging all the outside force available the establishments had a barely sufficient number to carry on business. And this, it must be remembered, was the voluntary contribution of a class exempt from military duty. When the Yankees took possession of the city the Crescent was confiscated; then the Bulletin followed suit, its editor being sent to Fort Jackson; next the Delta met the same fate, its only remaining editor taking a trip to Ship Island. The Picayune and Bee bent the neck, and after having been suspended they appended Butler's vanity by apologising for an inadvertent exhibition of manliness, and are allowed to continue. The True Delta, falling under the exclusive control of its old editor, Dr. Hugh Kennedy, has affiliated with Butler and Banks, and displayed a cloven hoof, the existence of which had been suspected for years.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

THE reports that have appeared in the New York papers fully explain the strategy of General Hooker, and the several movements by which he proposed to surprise, outflank, and simultaneously threaten and attack the flank and rear of the Confederate army. The Confederate line behind Fredericksburg extended from North to South—in describing the position without the aid of a map for reference, we are not able to be geographically accurate—that is, the van was facing the Rappahannock, and the rear towards Richmond. The distance from Fredericksburg to Richmond is sixty miles, and the length of the Confederate line was about five miles, that is, from the immediate rear of Fredericksburg to St. Marye's Bridge. We speak of the main line, and not of the batteries and rifle pits, which were extended to the banks of the Rappahannock. The first operation of Hooker was to push across a small part of his forces in such a proximity to Fredericksburg that he hoped to lead the Confederate commander to believe that he was about to repeat Burnside's plan. To further this ruse de guerre, after his troops had crossed with trifling opposition, he marched and countermarched some divisions so as to make it appear that he was about to follow up the advance with the rest of his army. Meantime the other movements, of which those we have spoken of were intended to be a cover, were being pushed forward as rapidly as possible. Whilst the corps under the command of General Sedgwick and a portion of Reynolds's corps, under the command of General Wadsworth, were crossing by two bridges below Fredericksburg, the main part of the army was moving up the north bank of the river. On the morning of the 29th of April Howard's corps, Slocum's corps, and Meade's corps, crossed the Rappahannock at Kelly's Ford, which is about 27 miles from Falmouth, and therefore rather more distant from Fredericksburg. As soon as they were on the south side of the river the Federal forces marched in a southerly direction in two divisions. They were thus marching parallel to the Confederate line. Upon reaching Germania Ford on the Rapidan, the Federals faced to the east and proceeded to Chancellorsville, where the two divisions effected a junction (the connection between them being kept up during the march by the Federal cavalry under General Pleasanton) one division having crossed the Rapidan by Eley's Ford, a place some miles lower than Germania Ford. This circuitous march brought the Federals in a line with the United States' Ford on the Rappahannock, a place only distant twelve miles from Falmouth, and which being now covered by the Federal forces, afforded a safe passage for another corps, Couch's, which had been waiting there for three days. On the 1st of May, Hooker occupied the position he desired. His army was facing what had been the Confederate flank. His line was considerably extended and his right wing thrown back. We may here refer to the cavalry expedition under General Stoneman, which was despatched to cut the railroad bridges near to Richmond, and so prevent supports and reinforcements from coming up to the Confederate army. What became of the expedition we have not at this time any intelligence, but inasmuch as reinforcements and supplies have come up to the Confederates by railroad, we know it did not succeed in its mission.

General Lee immediately changed his position, and took up a line that brought him face to face with the enemy. General Hooker's plan was to engage the Confederate army with his centre, supported by his left, and having made some impression, to swing round his right wing upon the enemy. So far, that is, before the fighting commenced, all seems to have happened as Hooker expected. He had crossed the Rappahannock without any serious opposition; he had come on the flank of the Confederates, and he had compelled a change in the Confederate line, and the abandonment of certain strong positions. Whilst eagerly watching his own game, he did not expect, or did not prepare for certain strategy on the part of the Southern Commander. When he was making ready for a great battle with his left and centre, a determined attack was making ready for his right wing. General Stonewall Jackson had, with marvellous celerity, moved a body of troops,—we do not know the number, but we have reason to believe it was little if any more than 20,000—so as, on the afternoon of the 2nd, to fall upon Hooker's weakest point, his right wing. Practically, Hooker had in turn been outflanked. The movement of Jackson's corps could not be altogether concealed, but its destination and object were not suspected. The assault on the Federal right, consisting of Howard's division, was successful. Whole regiments, we are told, threw down their arms and fled towards head quarters. The rout was complete, despite gallant efforts on the part of the officers to check it. Hooker seems to have acted promptly. He immediately sent his own division, under the command of General Berry, to stop the Confederate advance. Jackson had executed the task assigned him—he had defeated and driven back the right wing. The late hour in the afternoon when he made the attack, and the smallness of the force with him—small, we mean, compared to the bulk of the Federal army, which he must have encountered if he had continued to push his advantage—would necessarily prevent his further pursuit of the defeated troops.

The next day (Sunday) a great battle was fought. The Confederates advanced and maintained a fight for six hours, when the Federals fell back towards the river about a mile, and the engagement ceased. We have no details of this battle, but its duration shows that it was fiercely contested, and the falling back of the Federals that the Confederates were victorious. On Monday Hooker was engaged in throwing up intrenchments. In the afternoon he brought on an engagement. He pushed out a column to ascertain the position of the Confederates, and followed this by the advance of his main body. The action lasted half an hour, when the Federals fell back in some disorder, and retired to their main line.

It is reported that the losses in the two battles were very heavy. General Berry was killed on Sunday, and there is a rumour that General A. P. Hill is killed; but this requires confirmation.

General Sedgwick's corps commenced operations on Saturday (the 2nd inst.), took possession of the town of Fredericksburg, and the next day assaulted the Confederate position on St. Marye's Hill. After a hard contested fight the position was captured. The Federals admit a loss of 1,000 killed and wounded. They claim to have taken 800 or 1,000 prisoners. The Confederate defences were naturally strong, and were held, we expect, by a small body of troops, and the report that all those who were not killed were captured may be strictly true. General Sedgwick was not destined to long hold possession of the place. He was attacked on Monday, and so badly cut up that he determined to recross the river. This movement was undertaken at night. The bridges were commanded by the artillery of the Confederates, and the Federal losses were heavy in crossing. Added to this, he was hardly pressed and incessantly harassed in his rear. Sedgwick's force is said to have been about 20,000, and it was disastrously defeated. Although the position of St. Marye's Hill is in comparative proximity to Hooker, that General could render no assistance.

On the morning of Tuesday it was found that the Confederates had taken up a position on the hills on the south bank of the Rappahannock, two miles below the "United States Ford," the point where a Federal division had crossed a few days before without molestation. The Confederates were able to shell the Federal trains lying on the north side of the river.

Such is a brief outline of the Northern version of these great movements and battles. The next mail, which will probably be in before we go to press, will give us further information, but we must wait awhile for Southern accounts.

The rest of the war news brought by the Persia is meagre, though not unimportant. The Confederates who recently occupied Morgantown have destroyed the railroad bridge which spanned the Monongahela, near Fairmount, after defeating the Federal force that was in charge of it. General Banks has occupied Opelousas, in Louisiana. A Federal attack on Grand Gulf, at first said to have been successful, is now reported to have failed, and that the Federals were signally repulsed. General Marmaduke is reported to have returned to Arkansas, where, it is said, Generals Sterling Price and Kirby Smith are collecting an army to resume operations in Missouri. General Marmaduke obtained large supplies.

There is a report in New York that the Confederate steamer Retribution has been captured off Saint Domingo. It is said the Alabama has captured the Punjaub from Boston. The vessel was released upon giving bonds. A Federal war sloop has been burnt off Pensacola.

The Hon. C. L. Vallandigham has been arrested at his residence at Dayton, Ohio, by order of General Burnside, for making disloyal speeches. The military force sent to take him had to batter down the doors of his house. It is evident that Mr. Vallandigham is not the only "traitor" in his State, for a band of friends attempted to rescue him from the custody of the military, and his arrest was followed by a riot in Dayton, during which the telegraph wires were cut, and the Journal office set on fire.

In the case of the Peterhoff an application has been made to the Prize Court to allow Mr. Redgate, one of the owners of the cargo, to testify in his own behalf. It was stated that Mr. Redgate was born a British subject; that he was an enemy of the Confederate Government; that his portion of the cargo had been legitimately consigned to his partner at Matamoras, and that he desired to be and remain a citizen of the United States, provided he could thereby receive the restitution of his property and damages for unlawful capture and detention; but, if he were to be treated as an alien enemy, he demanded that he be regarded as a British subject, and as such he should claim protection from the British Government. The Court refused the application.

The price of gold at New York on the 5th of May was 50½ per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

The pauperism of Lancashire has, as we learn from the Poor Law returns, diminished by another 5,000. The whole diminution since the tide first began to turn amounts to 87,000; and though a large deduction must be made from this number, as we pointed out at first, for mere transfers from the roll of the Poor Law guardians to that of the Relief Committees, we may fairly consider that there has been a real reduction of some 60,000 or 70,000 in the number of persons actually dependent on alms within the manufacturing districts. Some of those, however, who have withdrawn thence to seek work elsewhere during the summer, will probably return again as the winter comes on; and after September it is much to be feared that we shall again see a weekly increase in the muster rolls of pauperism. We do not hear that any progress has yet been made towards the realization of Mr. Villiers's scheme for the employment of the operatives in draining lauds, improving the towns, and executing other works which, though much needed in Lancashire, would not, in the ordinary course of events, be carried out for many years to come. We fancy that the practical working of the plan will be found to be beset with more difficulties than were at first sight apprehended, and we believe that such is the opinion of those who best know the circumstances of the case, the condition of Lancashire, and the character of the people.

The death of Mr. Western Wood, late M.P. for the City of London, has left a vacancy which is pretty sure to be fiercely contested. Of late the Liberals have monopolized all the four seats allotted to the City; though the Conservatives constitute at least a very powerful minority of the electors. Mr. Wood was returned in 1861, on the occasion of Lord Russell's elevation to the peerage, by a majority of only 300 over his Conservative opponent, Mr. Cubitt, then Lord Mayor. Since that time some hundreds of Conservative votes have been added to the register, and some hundreds of Liberal votes struck off. But on the other hand Mr. Cubitt was exceedingly popular, and Mr. Wood but little known. It will be difficult for the Conservatives to find so likely a candidate again; and the Liberals may easily choose a better. Those at present named on their side are Mr. Hodgson, the Governor of the Bank of England, already in Parliament, and Mr. S. Morley, a notorious Radical and Dissenter; famous chiefly for his connection with the Liberation Society, whose business it is to stir up quarrels in parishes and provoke discussions in Parliament with a view immediately for the injury, and ultimately to the overthrow of the Established Church. We have not yet heard the name of any probable Conservative candidate.

Parliament has adjourned for the Derby and the Whitsuntide holidays, after a rather busy week. Lord Clarendon called the attention of the House of Lords to the proceedings of the Federal cruisers and Prize Courts, and the tame endurance of their proceedings by the British Government; eliciting a feeble and not very distinct reply from the Foreign Secretary. A curious incident occurred in the China debate in the House of Commons, which gave rise to a good deal of angry discussion. The debate had arisen on the motion for papers, made upon the question that the Speaker "do now leave the chair," in order that the House might go into Committee of Supply. Some other motions requiring the attention of the foreign department were also on the paper, and Mr. Layard conceived that the question before the House being that of going into Committee, he could only speak once before the Speaker left the chair. This mistake resulted in the motion for papers being prematurely put and negatived, greatly to the disgust of those members who took an interest in the subject. Mr. Layard was fiercely rated by Mr. Cobden and other members, and though he explained, and the error was clearly natural and involuntary, he was not readily forgiven. Two discussions very damaging to the credit of the Government have also taken place—the one on the course pursued by the Admiralty in the case of the Vigilant, the other on that of the Treasury in regard to Mr. Churchward's contract for carrying the mails from Dover to Calais and Ostend. The Vigilant had a pilot on board, and his carelessness ran her aground: the Admiralty therefore had a Court of Inquiry held in the absence of the captain, censured him, and dismissed him his ship no penalty whatever being inflicted on the pilot. This made the naval men in the House very angry, and as the case in a common sense point of view was strongly against the Admiralty, and as that office is always getting into similar scrapes, the effect of the discussion was very damaging to the Ministry. In Mr. Churchward's case the facts were pretty clear, but the Government had the support of the Radicals, and so carried the day. Mr. Churchward had had the contract for the mails from 1854; he obtained an extension until 1870 from Lord Derby's Government in 1859, it being understood that he should vote for the Conservative candidate at Dover. He did so; and to avenge themselves for their defection, the Liberal Ministers ordered a Committee of Inquiry, which, being composed of their friends, reported against Mr. Churchward, and rescinded the contract. It was clear, however, that a Court of Law would enforce it; and to prevent this Government endeavoured to obtain the sanction of the House to the rescission. They prevailed by a majority of only eight; but the matter will have to be discussed again, and it is not improbable that the decision may be reversed.

The rain did not prevent the usual migration of London to the Epsom Downs to witness the Derby. The announcement that the Prince of Wales intended to be present was an additional attraction. His Royal Highness, accompanied by Prince Louis of Hesse, was not deterred from going by the unfavourable state of the weather. There were thirty-one starters, and the race was well contested. In consequence of the wet weather the course was somewhat heavy, and under such circumstances strength as well as fleetness is necessary for success. Still the favourite (Lord Clifden) did not lose his place in the betting. Before the race Lord Clifden stood at 7 to 2, and Maccaroni at 7 to 1. The last-named horse came in first, beating Lord Clifden, who was second, by half a length. The excitement in the ring was interrupted and protracted by the judge putting up the wrong number for the third horse.

The Prince and Princess of Wales are making the season of 1863 one of the gayest that has been known in London for some years. In the past eight days there has been a levee, a drawing room—the first held by the Princess of Wales for the Queen—an evening party at St. James's Palace, besides visits to the Theatres, to the Philharmonic Concert, the Polytechnic, and the Times' office. These doings give a great impulse to trade, and the West-end shopkeepers are, we should suppose, making up for the unprecedentedly dull season of 1862.

The Queen has gone to Balmoral. It is said that Her Majesty has sent to M. Guizot a copy of the speeches of the late Prince Consort. M. Guizot wrote a preface for the first edition. The volume is bound in white morocco, and upon the page preceding that of the title the Queen has written with her own hand—"To M. Guizot, in memory of the best of men, and with the expression of gratitude for the sincere homage he has rendered to him; from his unhappy widow, VICTORIA."

EUROPE.

If the Governments of England, France, and Austria have resolved upon any action with reference to the Russian reply to their intervention, they have been careful to keep their conclusions to themselves. The probability is that they have not yet come to an understanding; and, indeed, although they may nominally come to one, they are hardly likely to take any decided steps in concert. They cannot go further together, because their views are dissimilar. Austria is said to profess her satisfaction with the Russian notes, and the statement is likely enough to be true, inasmuch as Austria cannot regard the idea of an independent kingdom of Poland, or even of a Poland with the constitution of the Emperor Alexander, with any pleasure. She would like to see Poland mercifully governed; but she thinks that a Poland with a national army, and a Diet with large powers would be very troublesome to all the partitioners. Meanwhile, as nobody is in possession of any facts, rumours have the public ear all to themselves.

There is much talk of a Congress, and, undoubtedly, if a Congress could be called at once, and would despatch its work, it might be the best expedient of settling the question; but it will take a long time to get a general agreement to a Congress, and a longer time to define its functions. And if the Congress is not to meddle with the Polish insurrection only, but is to settle the Roman and Schleswig-Holstein questions, to reform the German Confederation, and mediatise half-a-dozen German princes, as we are seriously assured it has been seriously proposed, it will require some years before its final act is signed, and the Russians will by that time have been driven out of Poland, or the Poles will have ceased to be a nation. In view of this contingency, Earl Russell is credited with a proposal so absurd, that we should say it was impossible did we not remember the famous invitation to the Pope. The Russians and the Poles are to conclude an armistice upon the basis of the uti possidetis for twelve months, and Europe is to use the interim to accommodate them. In the first place, the Emperor would never assent to such a proposal, assuming its practicability, since he would thus not only accept the Poles as belligerents, but give them the means to make head against him when the armistice expired; and in the second, one cannot tell how the division is to be made between Russian and Polish possessions, or how the Government is to be carried on, unless we assume that England and France supply an army of occupation, and undertake the administration. We leave the responsibility of the story to its authors. There is another story, which we are almost as unwilling to believe, to the effect that the French Government appealed very urgently to the Sublime Porte to make diplomatic representations at St. Petersburg on behalf of Poland, and that the Porte at first declining, on the ground that it was not a party to the Treaty of Vienna, ultimately yielded to the representations of M. de Moustier. The intervention of Turkey can have no other effect than to irritate the Russian Government extremely, and we cannot attribute to M. Drouyn de Lhuys a measure which, although a good joke, might have very mischievous effects. A worthy pendant to the story is the assertion that the Shah of Persia has been invited to lend the Poles his influence at St. Petersburg. We shall hear next that the Emperor of China, the Khan of Bokhara, the August Sovereign of Thibet, the Prince of Monaco, and the Chief of the independent Circassians, have also been requested to point out to Prince Gortschakoff that the benevolent character of the Czar justifies the hope that he will take measures to restore durable peace to Poland, and thus remove a danger to Europe.

The approaching elections divide with Poland and Mexico the interest of France. Probably the electioneering excitement is by no means so great as the prominence which the Parisian liberal papers, many of whose editors are candidates, give to the subject might induce us to believe; but, at all events, it is far greater than it was six years ago, and the number of opposition candidates is not only much larger, but includes very many men of considerable position, who have hitherto abstained from taking any part in the politics of the Empire. M. Thiers, after several refusals, has consented to stand for Valenciennes and Paris, where nine opposition candidates are arrayed against nine recommended by the Government. M. Berryer has also consented to stand for Marseilles, and MM. Remusat, Odillon Barrot, St. Hilaire, and other men prominent in the legislatures of the monarchy and the republic are candidates.

Paris has been much astonished by a warning given to La France, the journal of M. de la Guéronnière. The intimate relations of this Senator with the Emperor, and the circumstance that he has several times been selected to reveal to the world the Imperial views, had induced the belief that La France was safe against the summary measures of the Minister of the Interior. La France was warned on account of an article on the elections.

The partisans of Poland, having little at home to comfort them, borrow cheer from England, and assure themselves that the English people mean to do something because a meeting—of which very few Englishmen have heard—was held at the Tailors' Repository, Southwark, and was addressed by Messrs. Locke and Hennessey, members of Parliament.

The Moniteur has published the despatch of General Forey to the Minister of War, as well as the general's diary, kept for the information of the Emperor. As, however, the despatch is dated the 2nd of April, and the diary only come down to that date, they possess but little interest, except, in ætensio, for those who wish to acquaint themselves with the details of the conflict. The news from Puebla comes down to the 10th, at which time the French were in possession of the larger part of the city. The official documents only tell of the capture of Fort St. Xavier. The Mexicans have displayed a courage and tenacity for which no one had given them credit.

The days of grace given by the Czar have expired. The Poles, buoyed up by the hope of Foreign aid, have refused the amnesty, and declared their resolve to drive the Muscovites out of the whole of Old Poland. As the Revolutionary Committee of Lithuania puts it, "the struggle is to be maintained until the last Muscovite soldier is driven from the Polish provinces, or the last Polish heart has ceased to beat. The telegrams speak of several very decided successes, some in the government of Kowno, and others again on the Prussian frontier. But we cannot trust these accounts until they receive some confirmation. The insurgents have not ventured to claim any successes in these districts for some time; indeed, they admit that their largest band in the government of Kalisch has sustained a defeat almost as signal as the Russians claimed. But if we turn to the telegrams and despatches from Cracow and Lemberg, we find in the general admission of the crushing defeats sustained by the bands recently despatched from Galicia conclusive evidence that in the whole south-east and southern part of the kingdom the Russians have given the insurrection a decided check, and are beginning to re-establish the Imperial authority.

These unfavourable events may appear to be fully compensated by the stories of a general outbreak in Volhynia, Podolia, and Kiew, which are sent us from Lemberg, Cracow, and Brody. But the difficulty is to believe the reports. We have been told the same story so often. Volhynia and Podolia have risen en masse several times within the last three months according to the Poles, and we can see no good reason to believe that they have really done it this time. Indeed, an examination of the telegrams themselves is sufficient to throw very great doubt upon their story. It seems to be built upon reports of the appearance of two or three bands upon the frontier of Volhynia, and in every case in which the locality of the movement has been fixed by one telegram, we have the announcement by a subsequent telegram emanating from the same source of its suppression. The fair conclusion is that there are some small bands of insurgents in these provinces. There remains the insurrection in the Ukraine, which, we are told, has risen, to use the favourite phrase, en masse, with the exception of two districts where the nobility are favourable to Russia, and has proclaimed an independent republic, to be in close alliance with independent Poland. All we can say about this story is, that although it may be true, it has not at present the slightest claims to credence.

The Chief of the Provisional Government of Warsaw has issued an order of the day, in which he states that whilst the struggle every day assumes larger proportions, men of little faith, from fear or selfishness, "pass the frontier and dishonour us by their shameful inaction." He, therefore, decrees that no person shall quit the country without the permission of the National Government, and summons Poles abroad to return home at once.

Miss Pustowjoff, the Polish Amazon, has commenced legal proceedings against the editor of a German newspaper, who had described her as the mistress of Langiewicz.

There is a story to the effect that the Russian Government had ordered the wives of officers and civil functionaries to retire as speedily as possible into the interior of Russia—a precautionary measure, perhaps, if the story be true, before the commencement of the war of extermination.

The Prussian House of Deputies has adopted, as we last week assumed it would, the report of the committee recommending the rejection of the demand put forth in the Ministerial letter. In this step it was almost unanimous, only 20 members voted against the resolution, which had 295 votes in its favour. The minority was composed of the dozen members of the Junker party who have seats in the House, and a few of the Catholics; the old Liberals, as they are called, that is, the liberal ex-ministers, and Herr von Vincke and his friends, supported the proposal of the committee. Count Schwerin, the late Minister of the Interior, addressed the House in favour of that course, although he regretted that the dispute should have arisen, and could not help allowing that the language of Herr von Sybel towards the Minister of War had passed the fair bounds of discussion, and so excused the vehemence of Herr von Roon. The next step gave rise to a complete division of the previous majority. The President of the House, Herr Grabow, proposed that the Ministers should be informed of the resolution of the House, and invited to attend the next sitting. Herr von Forckenbeck moved that they should be summoned to attend in virtue of the 60th Article of the Constitution, and his resolution was carried by 167, against 138 votes. The Ministers were accordingly summoned to attend on Monday, but they did not appear. They sent a letter stating that they did not ask that the President should relinquish his right of interrupting them, but should declare that he has no disciplinary privileges over them. This did not satisfy the Chamber, which adhered to its resolution—and determined, moreover, to remove the question of the army reorganization from the order of the day until the Ministers should make their appearance in the House. We confess that we cannot see the wisdom of the course adopted by the House in rejecting the advance of the Ministers, implied in their admission of the right of the President to interrupt them. The contention of the Ministers is this:—They say the Constitution exempts members of the House from legal consequences for anything they may say in the course of the debates, but subjects them to the disciplinary powers of the President; on the other hand, the Ministers are responsible—nominally, for the means of enforcing that responsibility are not yet provided—for all that they say and do before the law, and, therefore, they object to the authority of the President, as imposing a double and unjust restraint upon them. The concession was one which the House should have accepted.

An address to the Crown, proposed by Herr Virchow, is to form the first subject of discussion in the House. The address is a long indictment against the ministers, and an appeal to the King to dismiss them. It is doubtful whether the more moderate Liberals will accept it, and the result of this energetic move will not probably be a great dissension in the House, and a corresponding triumph for the Ministry.

A Vienna newspaper, reputed to express the intentions of the Austrian Government, declares, according to the telegraphic agencies, that to avoid a European conflict, Austria intends proposing the adoption of more coercive measures than a Federal Execution against Denmark. The object of these measures is to guarantee the execution of the stipulations of the London protocol of 1851-52, relative to the succession to the Danish monarchy. Surely, for more we ought to read less, and for guarantee repudiate. How a European conflict may be averted by employing more coercive measures against Denmark than Federal Execution—itsself likely enough to lead to war—or how Austria and Germany can be in a position to take those more coercive measures we cannot understand. And how Austria, which is using the Schleswig-Holstein question against Prussia, can suppose that Germany will be pleased by a guarantee of stipulations of which Germany pretty unanimously demands the repudiation, is beyond our discernment. The telegraphic clerks must have made a great mistake, or the Austrian journalist must have contrived, as German journalists sometimes will do, to express one-half of his thoughts with tolerable clearness, and I have involved the other half in inextricable obscurity.

The condition of Greece is deplorable. To such an extent has the brutality of the soldiery been carried, and so perfect has been the impunity with which their atrocities have been committed, that the English and French Ministers have addressed strong representations to the Ministry and the National Assembly. Both M. Bouree and Mr. Scarlett enumerate shocking outrages, which the Minister of War would take no steps to punish, amongst them a most horrible crime, committed by some thirty soldiers and sub-officers upon an unhappy woman of Austrian nationality. Mr. Scarlett goes so far as to declare that "anarchy, under the most hideous form, reigns at Athens;" and threatens an immediate departure from the capital if immediate and energetic measures are not at once taken to suppress the disorders. The National Assembly at once declared to both Ministers its deep regret at the occurrence to which they referred, and ordered the Government to punish the guilty persons with the utmost rigour, and restore order and security.

The order is much easier given than executed. The army has been demoralised by the belief that it has the fate of the monarchy in its hands. The Assembly is split into factions. About fourteen persons have claims to be leaders. It has been postponing important business to discuss the question whether it should not examine the papers of King Otho, and only desisted from the examination on account of the remonstrances of Foreign Ministers. There is, in fact, no hope of order in Greece until the king arrives at Athens. His authority alone can impose peace upon the turbulent pretenders to power.

And unfortunately for Greece it is now less than ever probable that Prince William will take the throne. The Greek deputation, kicking its heels at Copenhagen, has appealed to the Danish Government to fix a time within which the answer should be given, and the Danish Government has postponed the answer until the 1st of June. Really the British Government, which by undertaking to find the Greeks a king, is responsible for all this anarchy, ought to insist upon an immediate answer from the Prince, and if the answer is a refusal make another effort to find a king.

The Italian Parliament has been occupied in replying to the accusations of mis-government in Southern Italy, brought in the recent debate in the House of Commons. Very much indignation has been expressed, and some very small errors, committed by Lord Henry Lennox, have been made very much of; but Signor Peruzzi, who, on the part of the Government, has vindicated the policy pursued towards Naples, has a great deal overdone his case. He declares that throughout Naples the people are favourable to the new regime; "that they enjoy the most liberal laws in the world;" that the liberty of the press, for instance, is complete. If the population of Naples is favourable to the Government, what need can there be for the rigorous system pursued? Why are the prisons full, and an army of 90,000 men unable to extinguish the brigandage?

The loss of life and property caused by the earthquake at Rhodes was terrible; not a building has escaped without serious damage; some of the finest edifices of the city were levelled to the ground. The number of persons killed is estimated at 300. The misery of the unfortunate inhabitants of the island was aggravated by the occurrence of slight shocks upon two or three days succeeding the great catastrophe.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, MAY 14.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

This being the festival of the Ascension, the House of Lords did not sit.

THURSDAY, MAY 14.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to Mr. Dawson, the President of the Board of Trade said that no detailed report of the loss of the Anglo-Saxon had yet been received at the Board of Trade. Last year the Associated Press of New York made a proposal to erect a fog-trumpet on Cape Race in Newfoundland, but it was the opinion of the Government, both at home and in the colony, that it was not desirable to confer that power upon a foreign country. The Board of Trade had, however, urged upon steamship owners the propriety of undertaking the work, but they had declined to act upon the suggestion. The Government had the power of erecting a signal themselves, and to impose a passing toll to meet the expense, and it was now for them to consider whether, as the shipowners had given a refusal they would take any action in the matter.

The Marquis of Hartington moved the second reading of a Bill to improve the efficiency of the Volunteer force, by better regulation of the permanent staff of sergeants and adjutants attached to the service, and by grants of money—20s. for every effective volunteer who reached a certain standard of proficiency, and 10s. for every one who attained a certain further standard. Some remarks were made by various members, generally in commendation of the measure, and the bill was read a second time without opposition.

A debate on the Metropolitan Improvements followed, on the consideration of the Thames Embankment and London Wine and Coal Duties Continuance Bills. After some further business had been transacted, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 15.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Earl of Ellenborough asked whether the Government consented to produce any further correspondence relating to the Schleswig-Holstein question, and especially whether they were prepared to communicate any representations which might have been made to the Danish Government by Austria and Prussia with regard to the King of Denmark's proclamation of the 31st of March last. The noble earl regretted to be obliged to call attention to a danger which, if not met at the outset, might seriously threaten the peace of Europe, so soon as the state of Poland would permit the Prussian and German powers to take up the matter. A most extraordinary despatch was published last autumn, in which Earl Russell had reversed the policy of this country, and had threatened the integrity of Denmark. That despatch was much to be condemned, for Denmark had made all the concessions which Germany was entitled to ask, and the sympathy of this country was due to her in her attempt to maintain the connection with Schleswig, which had been a portion of her dominions for 400 years. With regard to Holstein, he held that the recent proclamation by which Denmark had conceded the demands of the German Diet ought to have been deemed satisfactory. He believed that it was the design of Prussia and Germany to obtain possession of Schleswig, and argued that the diplomatic engagements imposed on Denmark were not binding, and that they ought to be altered by the Great Powers, if Denmark was again to assume her just position in Europe. He hoped that her Majesty's Government, in conjunction with France, would insist upon the designs of Germany being abandoned. If that course were not adopted, he saw no alternative but the reference of the question to a European Congress, as in its present condition it was a source of danger to the tranquillity of Europe.—Earl Russell said that it appeared to him that both Germans and Danes, being heated by their differences, had alike fallen into error, and made demands and done acts which were not to be justified. Germany was wrong in her demands, and Denmark was wrong in not redeeming the engagements into which she had entered. He had proposed that Schleswig and Holstein should be divided and have a separate budget, but this recommendation had not been adopted. It should be remembered that all Germany was united in declaring that the German subjects of the King of Denmark were oppressed, and that it was a disgrace to Germany to suffer them to be so any longer. He was sorry to hear the noble earl countenance the policy that the engagements of 1850-51-52 should be set aside, and that there should be a return to the state of things which existed in 1846. For his part he could not recommend that these diplomatic engagements should be discarded in order to improve the position of the Danish kingdom.—The Earl of Derby complimented the Earl of Ellenborough on his clear, temperate, and judicious speech, and expressed his astonishment that the Foreign Minister having charged Denmark with not preserving faith in regard to her diplomatic engagements with the Federal Diet. His noble friend who had called attention to the subject had not argued that England should interfere by force of arms, but that we ought not to allow Prussia and Germany to join together for the oppression of Denmark. The difficulty as regarded Holstein was the absolute refusal of the Duchy, backed by German influence, to prevent the conclusion of any arrangement. In these circumstances Denmark had made grave concessions to the German Diet for the sake of peace; and the only question that now remained was in reference to Schleswig, over which the Diet had no more control than any other power in Europe. The fact was that Schleswig had been made a stalking-horse for gratifying the ambition of Germany, and there was no pretence for saying that the duchy ought to be disconnected from Denmark because the German and Danish population did not agree respecting mutual rights and privileges. He looked upon the independence of Denmark as a matter of vital interest to this country, and he hesitated not to declare that there was no alternative which he was not prepared to accept in supporting that power, by no means a contemptible ally of England in the event of a European war, against the aggressions of the German Powers.—Lord Wodehouse observed that, if Denmark was bound in honour to fulfil her engagements, Germany was equally bound in honour not to interpose obstacles in the way of that fulfilment. This, however, was precisely what Germany had done. He was of opinion that we were fully justified in supporting Denmark in her efforts to maintain her ancient connection with Schleswig. At the same time he could not approve of her conduct in refusing to concede to the inhabitants of the duchy the rights and privileges enjoyed by the people of Denmark proper.—Earl Russell declined to produce the correspondence asked for at present, and the subject dropped. Some formal business was disposed of, and their Lordships adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 15.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to Mr. Darby Griffith, Lord Palmerston replied that the Sultan and the Pacha had agreed to put an end to all forced labour in Egypt, and of course that determination applied to the Suez Canal as well as to other works. This decision her Majesty's Government entirely approved, and they had assured the Sultan and the Pacha that they would receive the most energetic and active support of England in enforcing that which was obviously a wise and humane law for the Turkish Empire.

Sir George Bowyer asked what were the proofs for the statement of the Prime Minister on a former evening, that there existed at Rome a committee of two hundred persons, by whom bands of murderers were organised, and sent into the Neapolitan territory to commit every sort of atrocity, and whether the noble lord would lay upon the table any official correspondence in support of that statement.—Lord Palmerston replied that at the time he made the statement he declared that he had no positive proof, though he believed it to be true; consequently he had no documents to produce. The truth was that he was in the habit of receiving very interesting information with regard to men and things in various parts of the world; but if he were to mention in this House the names of the persons from whom it was derived he should soon know as little as the hon. baronet himself. He would mention, however, that he had that day seen a statement which he took to be correct, that on Sunday, the 3rd of this month, a certain Jesuit Father Cucci preached in the Church of San Spirito, in Rome, by selection of Cardinal Sforza, Archbishop of Naples, a sermon to the King of Naples and his whole Court, in which the preacher told them he was sorry to find they could not submit to the decrees of Providence, and that by promises of money and inflammatory writings they kept stirring up the ignorant masses in Southern Italy, and hounding them on to blood and slaughter; and that while they were ready to pay for the outfit of brigands they would not give a single penny to their suffering countrymen in Rome, who, but for the charity of the Romans, would die of starvation.

In answer to Mr. Blake, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said it was not his intention to proceed with that part of his budget which related to the imposition of legacy duty on bequests for charitable purposes in Ireland.

Lord Palmerston announced his intention to propose, on Tuesday next, that the House should adjourn until the Thursday week following.

On the order for going into Committee of Supply, Sir F. Smith brought before the House the condition of the regimental quartermasters of the army, who, he complained, were put in the position of gentlemen without receiving such a scale of pay as enabled them to maintain it. He also moved for memorials and correspondence relating thereto.—The Marquis of Hartington opposed the motion with regret, after the pathetic appeal which had been made to him by the gallant general. The sole grievance was that of inadequate pay, and two schemes regarding it had been laid before the Secretary for War; but both involved such a large expenditure that neither could be approved. Moreover, if increased pay were allowed in the case of quartermasters, the House could not refuse to listen to similar applications which would be sure to come from ensigns, lieutenants, captains, and every other grade in the army.—After a few observations from Colonel Dunne and Sir J. Ferguson the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. Liddell called attention to events in China, with a view of obtaining an expression of opinion by the House upon the course of policy pursued by her Majesty's Government in that country. The hon. member contended that that policy was neither more nor less than a system of active interference by force in the internal affairs of China for the purpose of propping up an effete and corrupt dynasty against its own subjects, who were bent upon its subversion, and had evinced a strong desire to cultivate friendly relations with foreign powers. Yet it was this very dynasty, which she was now supporting, that England had done more than any other nation to weaken and degrade in the eyes of the Chinese people. Such a policy, with the existence of the joint protectorate of England, France, and Russia, would, he feared, be attended with endless embarrassment, and the only excuse that could be urged in justification was the necessity of giving adequate protection to trade. But even this plea utterly failed of its aim against the representations of the British merchants at Hong Kong and the treaty ports, who complained in their memorials of the Customs House regulations, under whose operations the burden of the indemnity to be paid by China fell, not upon the Chinese Government, but upon the English trader. He would not say whether our conduct was a violation of the principles of neutrality or not, but he believed that much would have to be said and written in our defence before we should obtain a clear and absolute verdict in our favour at the bar of public opinion. In conclusion the hon. gentleman moved for further papers and correspondence.—Mr. Baillie insisted upon the necessity of the House being informed what was the real object of the Government in prosecuting these desultory naval and military operations in China. What cause of complaint they had against the Taipings he was utterly at a loss to understand, unless they made the grievances of the French Jesuit missionaries, who were hated by the Chinese insurgents, and those of the opium merchants, their own. Ministers had, in fact, placed themselves by their policy in an altogether false position. They would find it equally difficult to advance or recede, and in their over anxiety to preserve the trade with China he believed they had adopted the very course that would, in all probability, lead to its utter destruction.—Mr. Baillie having resumed his seat, and no other member rising to address the House, the Speaker put the motion for papers, which was negatived. The Speaker then put the question, "That I do now leave the chair," upon which Mr. Cobden rose, and in an indignant tone rebuked the conduct of the Government in maintaining so marked a silence, and in not replying to the able speech of Mr. Liddell, as unprecedented throughout the whole of his parliamentary career. Not only mere routine, but common decency and respect to the House, ought to have dictated to the Premier or the Under Secretary the duty of offering some observations upon the important statement of facts that had been laid before them.—Mr. H. Seymour indignantly proclaimed that he had never witnessed such conduct on the part of a Government, and that the House had been treated with studied and gross disrespect.—Lord Naas also declared that the course pursued by Ministers in treating so important a question in this cavalier manner was most reprehensible, and gave notice that on an early date he himself would call attention to the subject of affairs in China.—After a few words from Mr. White, in defence of Government, Mr. Layard explained that as there were several other questions upon the paper relating to foreign affairs he had reserved his reply to the speech of Mr. Liddell until he came to deal with the whole of them seriatim. For upon the order to go into Committee of Supply he could not have risen to speak on the other questions had he first spoken on this.—Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald said that Mr. Layard had misapprehended the usage of the House. The motions put on the order for going into Committee of Supply were distinct motions, and any member could speak on each of them separately.

After a few more remarks the discussion dropped, and the House went into Committee pro forma, but immediately resumed. Some business on the paper was disposed of, and the House adjourned at a quarter past 8.

MONDAY, MAY 18.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Marquis of Clanricarde moved for copies of any reports from our consular or diplomatic agents in North America of the decisions or proceedings of the Prize Courts of the United States. He observed that the conduct of the United States' Government, which professed to be on terms of amity with us, was so contrary to the recognised law of nations in reference to the seizure of ships engaged in the commerce of this country, that it was absolutely necessary that her Majesty's Government should take more active steps in the matter than they had hitherto done. At the present moment it was impossible to effect insurances upon vessels trading to the western hemisphere, owing to the constant seizures made by American cruisers. If there were any ground to hope that the existing state of things would soon pass away, or that the United States would evince a sincere desire to respect the law of nations, he should be disposed to make every allowance for them; but these seizures had now gone on for a considerable time, and he saw no prospect of a satisfactory change taking place unless her Majesty's Government adopted more energetic and decisive measures.—Earl Russell said that so far from disputing the law of nations Mr. Seward, in all his communications, had fully acknowledged it, and had stated that in every case there must be a legal cause of capture before a ship could be seized. Her Majesty's Government had instructed Admiral Milne to send a sufficient naval force to the neighbourhood of Matamoros in order that British shipping might be protected from unjustifiable seizure, and the admiral had reported that that harbour was crowded with vessels engaged in the pursuits of commerce. It would, therefore, seem that the proceedings of the United States' cruisers had not interfered with vessels that were employed in legitimate trade. Numerous complaints had, no doubt, been addressed to the Government by the owners of vessels which had been seized, and every such case had been referred to the law officers of the Crown, who had reported that there was no rational ground for objection with regard to the decisions of the Prize Courts. There was no disguising the fact that many vessels, built purposely for speed, were actively engaged in breaking the blockade, and he was afraid that when one of those vessels happened to be captured it was the custom of the owners to come at once to the Foreign Office, with all the air of injured innocence, and demand redress. On the other hand the Americans were much incensed at what they considered the unjustifiable conduct of England in fitting out and sending forth the Alabama to prey upon their commerce; but, he believed, there was a very general and sincere desire on the part of the English people not to interfere unfairly in the contest that was now going on.—The Earl of Derby concurred in the opinion of the noble earl that we ought not rashly to assume that the Supreme Court of the United States was not an impartial tribunal, and he also agreed with him with respect to the temper in which both parties ought to look upon this question, and to make every allowance which it was possible to make. He did not wish to enter into the question at all, but there were two points on which he should be glad to hear a word of explanation. He understood the noble earl to say that there were captains who had instructions from their owners to break the blockade, and that the very papers showed those instructions on the face of them. He could hardly imagine that such was the case. Apart from the utter folly and absurdity of placing on the ship's papers such a statement, he thought it was of so glaring a case in itself that his noble friend must have been misinformed. He admitted that a strong feeling was excited in America in consequence of the extent to which contraband trade was carried on, and he had no doubt that a large amount of the trade to Matamoros was intended to be made the subject of illegal traffic between that port and the United States. (Hear.) It might be suspected that a large portion of a cargo proceeding to Nassau and Matamoros was intended for the Confederate States; but on account of that suspicion an American cruiser would not be justified in doing more than ascertaining what was the immediate destination of the vessel. If a vessel were proceeding bond fide from this country to Nassau, whatever might be the nature of her cargo, no American cruiser had a right to interfere with her; and, no matter what might be the ultimate intentions of her owners, even though it were meant that she should herself subsequently proceed from Nassau to the Confederate States, and endeavour to break the blockade, that would afford no justification for her seizure by an American cruiser previously to her entering the harbour of Nassau. He hoped the noble earl had not made to the American Government any concession to the effect that an American cruiser had a right to interfere with such a voyage, or to send such a vessel before a prize court. He trusted that he had misunderstood the noble earl upon that point; and if that were the case, he was sure it would be satisfactory to their lordships that the noble earl should set himself right on the subject. (Hear.)—Earl Russell said that in regard to the first point raised by the noble earl he had to observe that he believed that it was quite true that in one case, at least, an American captain had found in the papers—he would not say the regular papers—of a ship an order to break the blockade. With regard to the other, and much more serious case, he had to state that the noble earl had certainly misunderstood him if he supposed that he had meant to say that a vessel going to Nassau, and intending afterwards to make a further voyage to the Confederate States, could be lawfully captured. (Hear, hear.) What he had meant to refer to was the case of a simulated declaration, or that of a vessel declaring that she intended to proceed to Nassau, but in reality destined for a Confederate port.—Lord Cranworth (formerly Lord Chancellor), said that the question to which the noble earl had just referred had been raised in a celebrated case, which was decided by Lord Stowell. In the course of our war with the first French empire a ship proceeded from Lisbon, which was a neutral port, with a cargo apparently destined for China. She carried a number of French officers, and she was seized in the Eastern seas on the ground that she was proceeding with them—they being, of course, contraband of war—not to China, but to some French or Dutch island. Lord Stowell, in deciding upon the case, stated that if she were going to China he had nothing to do with her, but he came to the conclusion that the alleged destination was but a pretence, and that she was really on her way to a French or Dutch port; and on that account he justified her seizure. There could be no doubt that that was the law of the case, and that a neutral vessel carrying contraband of war could not be stopped on her way to a neutral port, whatever might be her subsequent destination.

Lord Clanricarde withdrew his motion, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, MAY 18.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Urquhart asked whether the Brazilian Minister had demanded his passports or made any communication to her Majesty's Government to the effect that he had instructions which might require him to suspend diplomatic relations between England and Brazil.—Mr. Layard said the correspondence between her Majesty's Government and the Brazilian Minister was still pending, and it would be inconvenient at that moment to make any communication to the House upon the subject.

A question put by Lord J. Manners as to a statement made by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs on a former evening relative to the state of things prevailing at Rome, elicited from Lord Palmerston the emphatic declaration that her Majesty's Government declined to furnish any materials out of which a quarrel could be got up between Mr. Odo Russell and the French or Papal Governments.

The Prison Ministers Bill, after some debate, was then read a third time and passed.

In Committee of Supply, Mr. Peel proposed a vote of £250,000, "on account," for the packet service in part of the sum of £956,878, required for the year ending the 31st of March, 1864, which sum included provisions for payments to Mr. Joseph George Churchward for the conveyance of mails between Dover and Calais, and Dover and Ostend, from the 1st of April, 1863, to the 20th of June, 1865, but no part of which sum is to be applicable or applied in or towards making any payment in respect of the period subsequent to the 20th of June, 1863, to the said Mr. Joseph George Churchward, or to any person claiming through or under him by virtue of a certain contract, bearing date the 26th of April, 1859; or in or towards the satisfaction of any claim whatsoever of the said Joseph George Churchward, by virtue of that contract, so far as related to any period subsequent to the 20th of June, 1863. The right honourable gentleman explained that the terms of the resolution, so far as it related to Mr. Churchward's contracts, had been prepared in conformity with a vote of the House in 1860, to the effect that it did not consider that the contract ought to be fulfilled, having regard to the circumstance that he had resorted to corrupt expedients for the purpose of inducing the Government to grant his application for an extension of the contract. He did not mean to imply, however, that the Government were influenced by or even cognisant of such expedients. The peculiar circumstances which led the House to come to that vote were these. In 1859 Mr. Churchward was the contractor of the mail service from Dover to Calais and from Dover to Ostend, and his contract, supposing a year's previous notice were given, would have expired in the month of June next. Under that contract he was paid £15,500 a year for the ordinary service, and at a fixed rate for extra service. At the beginning of 1859 he appeared to have become dissatisfied with the rate of his remuneration for the latter service, and claimed that the contract should be prospectively extended from June, 1863 to the year 1870, and also that he should be paid for his extra services a commuted fixed sum at the rate of £2,500 a year. These proposals were favourably entertained by the Admiralty and sanctioned by the Treasury; and a new contract was made annulling the previous contract, taking effect in April, 1859, and extending until the middle of 1870, and providing that he should be paid a subsidy of £18,000 a year. At the time of these proceedings it happened that a general election was going forward, and when the new Parliament met a Select Committee was appointed to investigate the general subject of packet and telegraph contracts, who reported with regard to Mr. Churchward's contract that it had been proved before them that he had offered Captain Carnegie, then a Junior Lord of the Admiralty, to sell his political interest in Dover for the price of an extension of his contract. In the subsequent session Captain Leicester Vernon, a member of the committee, moved a resolution to the effect that the House was of opinion that the contract of April, 1859, ought to be performed; but that resolution was negatived by a majority of 45 in a House of nearly 300 members. He argued, therefore, that it was due to the public service and the dignity and character of the House that contractors should be discouraged from placing reliance upon any expedients but those of honest fair dealing in anticipating contracts. Supposing the House might not consent to grant any funds for carrying on Mr. Churchward's contract longer than next June, the Government had long given him a year's notice to terminate the contract, and had advertised for tenders. In consequence they had received an offer from the Belgian Government to perform that part of the night service between Dover and Ostend which was now discharged by Mr. Churchward, for £4,000 a year; and that offer had been accepted conditionally on the House declining to make any provision for Mr. Churchward's contract after June. For the Dover and Calais service a tender had also been accepted from Mr. Harrington upon the same condition, the contract to be made for seven years for £5,000 a year, and £3,000 a year as a premium for expediting the East India and China mails. Thus the two services would come to £12,000 a year as against the present payment of £18,000 a year.—Sir S. Northcote, in moving as an amendment to omit all the words of the resolution which related to the contract of Mr. Churchward, observed that the mode in which the question had been put before the committee would lead to the supposition that by the proceedings of the select committee and the vote of the House the merits of the case had been virtually decided, and that the House had nothing to do now but to confirm or reverse a decision already arrived at; but that was by no means a true view of the case, for the question was not concluded either by the committee's report or the vote of the House. In the debate upon Captain L. Vernon's motion in 1860, Mr. Laing, the Secretary to the Treasury, himself stated that in 1863 Mr. Churchward would be in as good a position as any one else, and be able to compete with others, or his contract might be renewed from year to year until the Government called for new tenders. This statement was confirmed and strengthened by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who gave an assurance that this year the merits of the case would be reopened; and that was the position in which this question now stood. If, however, the Government thought it necessary to set aside the contract, their proper course would have been to show that it was their positive intention to do so. They well knew that the contract was legally binding, and that if they went into a court of law, they would have considerable difficulty in setting it aside. They ought, therefore, to have brought in a bill to put an end to the contract. But instead of that, they allowed the service to continue under the contract of 1859, called upon Mr. Churchward to build new ships, kept the matter in abeyance because they thought that contract was more convenient than the preceding one, and had then turned round, thrown him overboard, and given the contract to others. They had not, therefore, fulfilled their promise to put him in the position of coming forward and making a tender; and he believed that if they went into a court of law they would have no good and valid defence against any action that Mr. Churchward might institute, for there was no pretence whatever to say that he had not performed his service efficiently and well. With regard to the bargain with the Belgian Government, no doubt it would save the country some money, but Mr. Churchward had some time ago offered to perform that service for the same sum, whilst by the arrangement with Mr. Harrington the actual saving, he believed, would not be more than £100 a year. The fact was that the Government, by their proposition, were bringing about a collision between the House of Commons and the courts of law; they were seeking to establish a precedent under which persons would find it impossible to enter into contracts with them; and they ran the risk of causing great detriment to the public service without the prospect of any corresponding advantage. In conclusion, the hon. baronet condemned the conduct of the Government as casting a slur upon a man upon whom a stigma ought not to rest, and as being equally unfair and un-English.—Sir M. Peto was of opinion that Mr. Churchward ought to be permitted to continue the contract so long as he executed the service satisfactorily.—The Attorney-General defended the proposal of the Government to proceed by resolution in committee of supply. He admitted that the proceeding was special and unusual, but so was the transaction to which it related.—Mr. Malins characterised the proceeding of the Government as shabby and unbecoming, and hoped the House would refuse to give it their sanction.—Mr. Cobden, who was chairman of the select committee on the packet service, said that the whole question depended upon the evidence of Capt. Carnegie, and if that were correct, Mr. Churchward had attempted to suborn a high functionary, by inviting him to accept a bribe. It meant that or nothing, and he would rather agree to vote money to enable Mr. Churchward to establish his claim by a trial in a court of law than vote the money required to carry on his contract after the report of the committee.—Sir H. Cairns observed that the course the House was now asked to pursue was without precedent in the annals of Parliament. The committee of supply had no more to do with the conduct of Mr. Churchward than with the Reform Bill. Mr. Churchward had been told that he could bring his action at law, and if the House did no more than they were requested to do by the resolution, and Mr. Churchward brought an action, he would be certain to recover damages for breach of contract and for being interrupted in the performance of the service. If, however, the Appropriation Bill were passed, then the Government would be found pleading that in their defence.—Mr. Hubbard was of opinion that the interests of the taxpayers had been overlooked by both the last and the present Governments in the arrangements with Mr. Churchward; but he did not think that the best way of punishing men for political immorality was to break one's bargains with them. Looking at the transaction in a commercial point of view with great disapproval, he should be glad to find a fair and honourable opportunity of cancelling it; but he could not, as a man of honour, consent to set the example of an infraction of a contract in reference to which he had nothing more to allege against the contractor than a distrust of his political honesty.—The Solicitor-General said that what the resolution asked was that the House should confirm its former decision. The present was the proper time to determine for what the money should be voted, and when it had been voted it would find its way into the Appropriation Bill; and it was to carry out the purpose of Parliament, as declared in 1860, that the vote assumed a form which, if agreed to, the Government in their consciences believed would be a complete answer to any action for damages or breach of contract, for there could be no damage or breach of contract where an essential condition of the contract was that no money was to be paid unless voted by Parliament.—The amendment was negatived—176 to 168—and the resolution passed.—The other business on the paper was disposed of, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 19.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In answer to Mr. Warner, Mr. Layard stated that when the blockade of the Southern ports was established the United States Government gave liberty to English ships of war to pass through the blockade and communicate with those ports, upon the distinct understanding, however, that they were employed solely on official business; but Mr. Magee, who had acted as consul at Mobile since 1861, had taken advantage of the presence of the Vesuvius there to ship a quantity of specie, keeping Lord Lyons in ignorance of his proceedings until too late to stop them. In consequence, the Government had dismissed Mr. Consul Magee, feeling that his conduct was not becoming the agent of a neutral power, and deserved the severest condemnation. The action of her Majesty's Government had been taken without any communication with the United States Government on the subject.—Sir J. F. Russell asked whether the money placed on board the Vesuvius was not the interest due from the State of Alabama to British subjects, whether it was not so shipped because there were no other means of transmitting it, and whether other consuls had not sent specie in a similar manner and not been dismissed.—Mr. Layard said there were various reports as to the destination of the money shipped by the Vesuvius, but he could not make any positive statement on the subject, neither could he say that other consuls had acted as Mr. Magee had done.

On the motion of Lord Palmerston that the House at its rising should adjourn till Thursday, the 28th instant, Mr. Hennessy called attention to the conduct of the Prussian Government in relation to the insurrection of Poland. He contended that Prussia had been guilty of a breach of international law in having permitted the Russian troops to cross and recross her frontier and supplied them with arms and ammunition, and expressed the hope that the Prime Minister would give the House an assurance that he had addressed a remonstrance to the Prussian Government on the subject.—Lord Palmerston replied that the duty of a neutral power whose territory was continuous with that of a belligerent was not to allow an armed force of that belligerent to make use of neutral territory for the purpose of more advantageously attacking its opponent. Another duty, when a belligerent force was driven to take refuge in neutral territory, was that it should be disarmed as soon as it had passed the frontier; but he was not aware that the neutral had any right to confiscate its arms or baggage; on the contrary, he believed that, having disarmed and reconducted the belligerent force to the frontier, the arms and baggage were to be restored. There was, therefore, no breach of international law if Prussia had merely restored to the Russian troops their arms and baggage upon their repassing the frontier into Russian territory. With regard to Prussian subjects furnishing ammunition to the Russian troops, he apprehended there was no violation of international law in that Mr. Fitzgerald observed that if the noble lord laid it down as a principle of international law that it was no breach of neutrality for a neutral Government to supply ammunition to a belligerent force taking refuge in its territory, there was no foundation or precedent for such a dictum.—Lord Palmerston explained that his statement applied to the subject of a neutral power supplying the subjects of a belligerent. He could not off-handedly say that the same privilege was enjoyed by Governments.—Sir H. Verney commented on the circumstance that the noble lord had omitted to say whether the so-called neutral Government of Prussia had treated both belligerents alike. Supposing the course pursued by Prussia led to a war, say with France, was the noble lord prepared to stand by her in a contest so provoked?—Mr. Peacock drew attention to the inadequate and unsatisfactory manner in which the most important departments of the Government were represented in that House, and complained that in foreign affairs particularly the House was degraded to the level of a village debating club, and was possessed of no more political authority than a parish vestry.—Mr. Layard defended the arrangements of the Government, and said that in relation to foreign affairs that department was sufficiently represented by the noble lord the Prime Minister.—Mr. Bentinck was of opinion that ample opportunities were afforded for the discussion of foreign affairs, as was apparent from the state of the order paper on almost every day in the week. And what was the result? Why, that members were constantly rising and urging views upon the affairs of Poland and other countries which, if carried out, would speedily involve us in war.—The discussion was continued by Lord R. Cecil, Mr. Milnes, and Mr. Cochrane.—Sir G. Grey reminded the House that the fact of the Minister for Foreign Affairs sitting in the House of Lords was by no means an uncommon circumstance, and instanced the cases of Lord Aberdeen, Lord Malmesbury, and other chief secretaries who had sat in the Upper House. The right hon. baronet stated that the first business on the re-assembling of the House on the 28th of May, would be to report the vote come to on the previous night relating to the Dover mail contract.—Captain Jervis brought under the notice of the House the question of the constitution and proceedings of naval courts of inquiry, in connection with the censure recently pronounced by the Board of Admiralty upon Lord Elphinstone for running her Majesty's ship Vigilant upon the Swin sands.—Sir J. Pakington severely condemned the course pursued by the Admiralty towards Lord Elphinstone, who, he said, ought not to have been censured or deprived of his command until he had been tried by a competent tribunal and heard in his own defence. Several members connected with the Navy censured severely the conduct of the Admiralty, which was defended by Lord C. Paet and Mr. Collier.

Some formal business was disposed of, and the House rose; standing adjourned to Thursday the 28th inst.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, May 20, 1863.

THE past week has witnessed a succession of dull, dragging markets; 18d. for fair Dholerah, the figure that has so often checked further advance on previous occasions, has again had the same effect.

Our last report closed on a steady market with fair Dholerah at 18½d. On Thursday and Friday more disposition to sell was apparent, but little giving way in prices; the sales reaching 6,000 and 8,000 bales.

The Persia's news were to hand on Saturday morning, giving a confused account of a series of engagements in the neighbourhood of Fredericksburg, between the Confederate and Federal armies. From these it appeared that the main body of the Federal army having crossed the Rappahannock, twelve miles above Fredericksburg, was attacked on three successive days by the Confederates, under Lee, their right wing turned, and their whole force driven back several miles; at the same time a detachment of Hooker's army, which had, at first, gained a good position above the city, had been driven over the river with great slaughter. At the latest dates the Federal army was opposed in front by the Confederates flushed with victory, while in their rear was a deep and rapid stream. Great fears are consequently entertained for their safety and vague rumours, apparently without foundation, have been floating about, to the effect that Hooker had surrendered, and more recently that an armistice had been proclaimed. To these almost no credence is granted, but their effect has been to bring business here to a standstill; there is, however, little pressure to sell, and a general indisposition is shown by holders to force cotton, or by buyers to purchase at a slight decline.

The sales on Saturday and Monday were 5,000 bales. On Tuesday 2,000, and to-day 3,000, at an irregular decline in the week of ½d. in Surats, and ¾d. in Long Staples. We can do Middling Orleans 22½d., and Fair Dholerah and Omrawatee 17½d. to 18d. In cotton to arrive business has been done at a decline of ¾d. per lb.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, May 19.

Our market for yarn and cloth during the past week has been very quiet, with only a very small business doing from day to day; still there has been very little inclination shown by spinners and manufacturers to give way at all in price—more so on the part of manufacturers, who, as a rule, are well in orders and not anxious to increase their orders for the present, but would rather look on and watch the course of events.

On Friday the market was inanimate, owing to the tenor of the telegrams from Calcutta and Bombay, dated 28th of April, advising dull markets, with the prices of Manchester goods drooping; also to the anxiety to know the result of the anticipated encounter between the Federals and Confederates, in the neighbourhood of the Rappahannock.

Yarns of all kinds, whether for home trade or shipment, were very flat; yet in some cases, where purchases were made, the prices of last Tuesday were paid.

Cloths of all descriptions were very quiet, but exceedingly firm, manufacturers being careless about selling; and as for buying at lower prices, shippers could make no headway.

To day our market has been almost a blank, the news by the Persia having put a stop to business for the moment. Various rumours have been circulating through our Exchange during the day;—one was to the effect, that an armistice had been proposed by the Federals; another was, that Hooker's army had been entirely cut up, and that the Confederates would be marching on to Washington.

All this tended to put people into a state of excitement, and to make them anxious for the news by the steamer due on Wednesday.

THE SECOND FEDERAL ADVANCE IN WESTERN LOUISIANA.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, April 25, 1863.

SIR,—You have, of course, already received and published an account of the Federal operations in this department at and near Port Hudson on the Mississippi, resulting only in the passage of two gunboats by the batteries; the loss of the ship Mississippi; and the return of General Banks's army, after a little skirmishing, to Baton Rouge.

Beyond the fact of a desire on the part of Admiral Farragut to run up the river with a portion of his fleet for the purpose of blockading the mouth of Red River, and the possibility that Banks's movement by land might have been intended as a diversion while the boats were passing, no mortal being has yet discovered the object of the advance upon Port Hudson. It was not a "diversion," for the fighting on shore—the very little that was done—was ended six or eight hours before the fleet weighed anchor to attempt the passage, and the army was on the way back to Baton Rouge before it was certainly known whether two or six of the gunboats had run by the batteries.

It was the old story, "The King of France, with twenty thousand men," &c. It was well known here, before the expedition started, that Banks did not intend to attack Port Hudson, but that the entire movement was at the instance of the authorities at Washington, who, for weeks, had been "hounding" General Banks to "do something." Why not? He had a comparatively large command; all his regiments were supposed to be in readiness for almost any immediate action in the field; and the country, the North that is, was crowing for a movement which promised a result, or indeed for one that indicated life. So the army moved towards Port Hudson, diverted the public mind a little, and then returned to rest at Baton Rouge. But it could not rest in peace. An army of "occupation" must needs do something, and a new movement was projected.

As for Farragut, who ran the fearful gauntlet of the batteries with two gunboats only, his object was sufficiently evident. He could blockade the mouth of Red River, and thus cut off the supplies of provisions coming from Texas and Western Louisiana; this done, the "rebels" at Port Hudson were to be "starved out" in a week.

With this pleasing programme for the next performance, Farragut, instead of blockading Red River, ran up the Mississippi, to see how near he could get to Vicksburg without destruction, and had small engagements with wayside batteries in going up and coming down again. Meanwhile, the Confederates moved a large body of troops from Port Hudson, via Red River, to the Teche region, concentrating a considerable force at Franklin and New Iberia, and compelling General Weitzel, who commanded a brigade at Berwick City on Berwick Bay, to fall back to Bayou Boeuf, lest the enemy should, by burning the bridge in his rear, cut off his retreat, and follow up the operation by "cutting off" his entire command.

All this called for a new and perhaps not immediately intended movement on the part of Banks. General Grover's division was at once ordered to cross the river from Baton Rouge to Donaldsonville, and proceed down Bayou Lafourche to Thibordeaux, where cars were in readiness to transport them to the relief and reinforcement of Weitzel. At the same time, Emory's division also came down the river to Algiers, opposite this city, and were sent by rail to Berwick Bay. Then every soldier that could be spared from New Orleans, ten or twelve field batteries and a large body of cavalry, altogether nearly 23,000 men, were concentrated at Brashear City, to make, in conjunction, with five or six gunboats, an offensive movement on the Teche.

This is the second attempt on Bayou Teche. The first, when Weitzel went with 9,000 men and burned a steamboat (the Cotton), returned after losing several men, including Buchanan, in command of the gunboats, and actually accomplished nothing more;—all this is familiar to your readers. This time Banks commanded in person, and he evidently meant to do something.

Moving across the bay with this army—large in comparison with the opposing Confederate force, and nearly double the number of men employed at any one time in the American-Mexican war—Banks has had little difficulty in "marching along." Within the past ten days, he has fought several sharp skirmishes, losing some men, and repulsing the Confederates. He has destroyed two or three gunboats, which were captured some time ago from the Federals; and he has rendered useless the large salt works at Petite Anse Island, eight miles south of New Iberia.

There is also a vague rumour that Farragut, with three gunboats, has run up Red River, and that he has taken Alexandria. Banks is said to be there, and when he has destroyed whatever may assist the Confederate arms, he will return to New Iberia and hold the place—if he can. But little more, if anything, can be done by the land forces in this department till autumn; it is already too warm for military movements in the field; and with the death-bringing nights, the malaria of the swamps, to say nothing of the expected yellow fever, the coming summer will be a fearful enemy to the unacclimatised Northern troops.

The peculiarity of the present movement in Western Louisiana is the profusion of plunder which presented itself all along the line of march. One of the great inducements for the expedition was—not the "suppression of rebellion," for that, in comparison with wholesale stealings of sugar and cotton, is "of no account" in this department—but the extraordinary richness of the region, for it is the garden of the South—a very paradise. For the first time in the history of the war, the Federals fed themselves from the farms of the country they passed through. The Federal army has passed over the fair fields, and nothing worth gleaning is left; and this is another chapter in the system of "conciliation," another effort towards the "restoration of the Union." The Federals may possibly believe that patriotism and plunder mean one and the same thing; but it will be difficult to convince a "Secessionist" that he can be made a good Union man by stripping him of every farthing he has in the world, and then administering the oath of allegiance.

Lieutenant-Commander McDermot, of the Federal gunboat Cayuga, killed while making a reconnaissance at Sabine Pass last week, was buried from Christ Church, in this city, to-day.

"A FOREIGN RESIDENT AT NEW ORLEANS."

THE UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF COERCION.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—The following extracts from Mr. Madison's reports of the debates in the Federal Convention that framed the Constitution, show that the policy of coercion was twice mooted in that body, and was disapproved of on both occasions:—

Tuesday, May 20, 1787.—Mr. Randolph (Virginia) proposed "to call forth the force of the Union against any member of the Union failing to fulfil its duty under the articles thereof."

Thursday, May 31, 1787.—Mr. Madison (Virginia), in reply to the above clause, observed, "that the more he reflected on the use of force, the more he doubted the practicability, the justice, and the efficacy of it, when applied to people collectively, and not individually. A Union of the States containing such an ingredient seemed to provide for its own destruction. The use of force against a State would look more like a declaration of war than an infliction of punishment, and would probably be considered by the party attacked as a dissolution of all previous compacts by which it might be bound. He hoped that such a system would be framed as might render this resource unnecessary, and moved that he clause be postponed." This motion was agreed to, nem. con.

Friday, June 15, 1787.—Among a series of resolutions offered by Mr. Patterson (New Jersey) was the following:—"And that if any State, or any body of men in any State, shall oppose or prevent the carrying into execution such acts and treaties, the Federal Executive shall be authorized to call forth the power of the Confederate States, or so much thereof as shall be necessary to enforce and compel an obedience to such acts, or an observance of such treaties."

Saturday, June 16, 1787.—Mr. Randolph, who seems to have changed his views on the subject, remarked:—"Coercion he pronounced to be impracticable, expensive, cruel to individuals. It tended also to habituate the instruments of it to shed the blood and riot in the spoils of their fellow citizens, and consequently train them up for the service of ambition."

Wednesday, June 20, 1787.—Mr. Mason (Virginia) said:—"It was acknowledged by Mr. Patterson, that the plan could not be enforced without military coercion. Does he consider the force of this concession? The most jarring elements of nature, fire and water themselves, are not more incompatible than such a mixture of civil liberty and military execution. Will the militia march from one State into another, in order to collect the arrears of taxes from the delinquent members of the republic? Will they maintain an army for this purpose? Will not the citizens of the invaded States assist one another, till they rise as one man and shake off the Union altogether? * * * * He took this occasion to repeat, that notwithstanding his solicitude to establish a national Government, he never would agree to abolish the States Governments, or render them absolutely insignificant."

Mr. Luther Martin (Maryland) "agreed with Colonel Mason as to the importance of the States governments; he would support them at the expense of the general Government, which was instituted for the purpose of that support. * * * * At the separation from the British Empire, the people of America preferred the establishment of themselves into thirteen separate sovereignties, instead of incorporating themselves into one. To these they look up for the security of their lives, liberties, and properties; to these they must look up. The Federal Government they formed to defend the whole against foreign nations in time of war, and to defend the lesser States against the ambition of the larger. They were afraid of granting powers unnecessarily, lest they should defeat the original end of the Union; lest the powers should prove dangerous to the sovereignties of the particular States which the Union was meant to support, and expose the lesser to being swallowed up by the larger. He conceived also, that the people of the States, having already vested their powers in their respective Legislatures, could not resume them without a dissolution of their governments."

Mr. Sherman (Connecticut), followed in the same strain; and added:—"To consolidate the States, as some had proposed, would dissolve our treaties with foreign nations, which had been formed with us as Confederate States."

The matter of coercion was then dropped. The only clause in the Constitution giving the Central Government control of the military, to be used except in a foreign war, is contained in Article IV., Section 4, viz.,—"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of Government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence."

The Constitution concludes by stating:—"Done in Convention, by the unanimous consent of the States present." This is incorrect. Colonel Hamilton was the only signer from New York; his colleagues, declaring that they had no authority to overthrow the Articles of Confederation, withdrew from the Convention; and Mr. Randolph and Colonel Mason, of Virginia, and Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts, refused to subscribe their names to the document. Nor did the Constitution receive the signatures of the following delegates who attended the Convention:—Caleb Strong, of Massachusetts, Oliver Ellsworth, of Connecticut, William C. Houston, of New Jersey, John Francis Mercer and Luther Martin, of Maryland, George Wythe and James McClurg, of Virginia, Alexander Martin and William R. Davie, of North Carolina, and William Pierce and William Houston, of Georgia. Patrick Henry, of Virginia, refused even to attend the Convention.

Your obedient Servant,

WECCACOE.

THE "BREAD RIOT" AT RICHMOND.

The Richmond correspondent of the Times, in a letter dated April 7, thus refers to the riots which have been so greatly magnified in the Northern papers:—

But, if the general ignorance about the South has appeared amazing, occasionally incidents of little significance have in the Northern journals dilated into dimensions so stupendous that a resident here has asked himself whether he is not unconsciously sleeping on a volcano which may at any moment burst and scatter havoc and destruction around. Such an incident, which, long before this letter reaches England, may have been represented to your readers by the New York press as a Lord George Gordon riot, an upheaving of the lowest strata of society, occurred in this city on the 2nd inst. It should be remarked that a pressure in regard to the daily supply of the necessities of life, under which one-half of the population of England and a still larger proportion of the populations of France and Belgium are contented to live year after year, has been so unheard of and unknown upon this continent that it is a marvel that the poorer classes in the Confederacy, and especially the foreigners, who care, comparatively speaking, nothing about the guiding principles of the war, should have murmured so little under a destitution which has cut them off from all but the barest necessities of existence. Simultaneously with much hardship and privation, busy rumour has pointed out persons who in various trades have amassed enormous fortunes during the last two years. The excitability of a naturally restless population and the unsettling of ordinary relations of life which war invariably engenders have combined to make the lowest classes uneasy and dissatisfied, because, when so many around them were adding house to house, and laying field to field, they were not able to do more than keep body and soul together. Therefore, under the guise of "bread riots," there have in many cities been emeutes of the population, in the form chiefly of mobs of women, who demanded flour and corn-meal at the principal stores, and trusted that if they were refused a riot would grow into an irresistible outbreak, which would place all the stores and property of the wealthier classes at the mercy of the lowest. Such emeutes have occurred at Salisbury in North Carolina, at Atlanta in Georgia, at Mobile in Alabama, and at Petersburg in Virginia. They have in no case been serious, because everywhere ample resources for relieving cases of unquestionable destitution have been at hand, and such cases have been found to be very rare, as might be expected when it is mentioned that no man who is willing to work at any kind of trade has difficulty in earning from $5 to $6 per diem. I have been assured, on the authority of several of the most eminent clergymen, some of whom have resided in Richmond for many years, that never in their recollection was there such abundance of want and suffering among the lowest classes in Richmond as during this winter. But it was not to be expected, after the occurrence of such outbreaks as I have described in the smaller cities of the Confederacy, that Richmond should wholly escape the contagion. There are persons who see in every contretemps which occurs in the Confederacy indications of Yankee malignity, just as there are others who, whenever a fire or robbery occurs, whisper ominously the word "slaves," though, perhaps in the Confederate States, and certainly in the State of South Carolina, which is the very heart or nucleus of slavery, there are fewer fires and robberies than anywhere else upon earth among populations of a similar size. It is beyond question that fire and robbery in the northern towns are vastly more frequent. It is not, therefore, wonderful that some persons should have imputed to Yankee emissaries a restlessness of the population which seems to me explicable by many other causes. On the 2nd of April, in a low quarter of this town, chiefly inhabited by the Irish of the South and West of Ireland, a mob of unruly women, perhaps 200 in number, broke into several stores, some of them containing flour and provisions, but chiefly repositories of boots and clothing and cheap articles of jewellery. There were many women among them whose husbands are earning from $6 to $8 a day. The clear object of the emeute was to inaugurate a carnival of cupidity, which, gathering strength from the explosive and dangerous population of a city which has seen two years of unparalleled warfare, might place all the wealth of Richmond at the disposal of a lawless and predatory mob. But the outbreak in question never got enough headway on to become alarming. President Davis and Governor Letcher paid the insurgents the compliment of going among them and addressing them; but it seemed little less than mockery to address the offscourings of Ireland and Germany as "Women of Virginia." There is, however, not the slightest occasion for fearing that the riot will be repeated. Whatever may be Governor Letcher's other qualifications for the office which he now holds, there are not two opinions about his firmness; and it is with him more than with the President that the repression of future and similar riots will rest. Except upon the 2nd inst., and, in a much less degree, upon Good Friday, the 3rd, all tendency to insurrection has disappeared, nor is it likely to be resumed.

THE BRITISH CONSULATE AT MOBILE.

[The following is the article to which we referred last week]:—

It has been announced within a day or two to the great regret and no little indignation of those acquainted with the facts, that James Magee, Esq., her Britannic Majesty's Vice-Consul for this port, has been summarily removed from his office by the British Government. That Mr. Magee filled that place with credit to himself, honour to his Government and acceptably to this community, is not questioned by any one, nor is the contrary alleged by his Government as a cause for his removal. He has been marked for official decapitation for the same reason that caused the removal of Mr. Bunch, the English Consul at Charleston—to wit, his warm Southern sympathies. This is a crime which Earl Russell and Lord Lyons might have pardoned in a man who has lived thirty years among the people of the South, has been witness to their wrongs and knows the justice of their cause. The immediate pretext for Mr. Magee's removal grows out of the shipment, some months ago, of £40,000 from this port to England to pay the interest on the bonds of the State of Alabama, held by British subjects abroad. The Governor of the State, anxious to preserve the unsullied credit of the State, even in a time of blockade and war, arranged with the Bank of Mobile—through which institution the negotiation to place the State interest abroad has been uniformly made—to remit a sum to cover all the coupons due in England up to July, 1864. The British Consul was informed by the Bank that the State had in its possession £40,000 in coin for the purpose of paying the British bondholders, and inquired of him whether he would receive and forward those funds which belonged to subjects of the British Government. Mr. Magee, looking only to the interests of his countrymen, and not, like Lord Lyons and Earl Russell, having the fear of Billy Seward before his eyes, readily consented, and naturally believed that he was doing his duty in rendering a service to British subjects. The captain of the British war steamer Vesuvius, then at New Orleans, was requested to call off the Mobile bar and take on board the specie. The vessel came, and Mr. Magee, under flag of truce, went out on the steamer Crescent, with the coin on board, and safely transferred it to the Vesuvius. The specie reached England, and the English press remarked upon the punctuality of the State of Alabama as worthy of great commendation and praise. An important item of fact necessary to be known in forming a judgment upon the whole transaction is, that Commodore Hitchcock, commanding the Yankee blockading fleet, was cognisant of the shipment, and gave his free consent to it; for before receiving it the captain of the Vesuvius went on board the flag-ship, told Hitchcock what he came for, and obtained his ready approbation.

No sooner did the London Times inform the Yankee Minister at London (Mr. Adams) that an affair so creditable to the financial honour of a rebel State had taken place, than with the usual Yankee impudence he called upon the British Ministry for an explanation. Seward, on this side, thought it too good an opportunity to be omitted to bully Lord Lyons at Washington, and between the Yankee Minister at London and the Yankee Minister of State at Washington, Earl Russell and Lord Lyons were made to eat another very humble dish of very humble pie. These proud Aristocrats not only cried peccavi to their vulgar masters, but they engaged to commit an act of gross injustice to appease their offended Yankee-ships. The commander of the Vesuvius, a perfectly innocent man in the transaction, was at once informed that he had forfeited professional promotion which had been near and in store for him; and Mr. Magee was informed that the British Government had no further occasion for his services. Thus these two English statesmen, of whom the world expects a loftiness of tone, of justice and courage equal to their exalted rank and official position, have basely sacrificed two of their countrymen and Government officers to propitiate the smiles and to deprecate the anger of the contemptible Government at Washington. The transaction is not only mean and base, but it reflects disgrace upon the British name. It is another proof to sustain the general belief that Earl Russell is under Washington influence to a degree injurious to the dignity of the British crown, and that Lord Lyons has condescended to become the lacquey and the tool to the false and unprincipled Seward.

If the Yankee Government has suffered damage from this shipment of coin—and it undoubtedly has—there is but one man who can be justly held responsible for it; and that is the commander of the Yankee blockading fleet, who allowed it to pass the blockade. His consent removed every particle of responsibility from the shoulders of the British Consul and the British Captain; and as he was the representative of his Government, it shuts the mouth of that Government in every effort at complaint.

The blockade was clearly broken by the shipment, and it was done by the consent of the blockading force. And this is the pinching point at Washington. They raised the blockade for the passage of British property. Having done so, they have given the same right to all other neutral powers, and the latter have a clear title to claim it. The punishment of Mr. Magee and the commander of the Vesuvius does not, in the least, change or impair the right. Mr. Seward is a very wily diplomatist—the “cutest” Yankee of his tribe—but we hardly think that he can throw dust into the eyes of the Emperor Napoleon by so transparent a device. The fact stands forth—the Yankee Government has given passage to British coin, and Napoleon has a right to claim transit for French cotton and tobacco. We are mistaken in the man if he sleeps on his right.

This step of the British Cabinet demands the attention of the Confederate Government. Since the former makes it a point to remove from these States those of her officers who have sympathized with this people in their great and cruel struggle, it is fair to presume if these are replaced it will be by officers whose hearts are not with us—possibly by the spies and tools of the Washington dynasty. Foreign consuls have no right here—they are only tolerated. They hold their positions and are recognized only by sufferance, and through a courtesy greatly strained in order to cover their cases. Should not our Government declare that the functions of a British consul thus vacated, shall not be resumed by any other English appointee? We think self-respect clearly requires it. Great Britain shows by these acts that she is as regardless of all considerations of comity as she has been reckless of our rights as a power successfully struggling for independence. No man should be allowed to exercise the privileges and functions of an office from which Mr. Magee has been thus removed, until the power that fills that office recognizes the Confederacy as one of the Nations of the Earth.

Mr. Magee carries with him, wherever he goes, the respect of the community in which he has so long lived, and the warm regards of many friends to whom he has endeared himself by his bearing as a man and a gentleman. It is long since England was represented in this Consulate by one who knew so well how to sustain its dignity by a public and official courtesy, and a private and generous hospitality.

THE NAVAL ATTACK ON PORT HUDSON.

We subjoin an interesting account of the naval attack on Port Hudson, written by the special correspondent of the Memphis Appeal, which journal is now published at Jackson.

Port Hudson, Louisiana, March 15, 1863.

The long-expected contest between the Yankee fleet and our batteries took place before daylight this morning, the first shot being fired at ten minutes past twelve o'clock, and the last one at twenty minutes past two. It was short, sharp, and decisive. The enemy, possessing the best vessels of their navy, as well as manned and officered as their regular marine would permit, trusting to their superiority in force, weight of metal, and character of projectiles, and calculating the advantages of a surprise and the darkness of the night, staked their all upon the issue, and desperately fought it out. The result has been such as they little anticipated, and such as will even surprise many of our own people, who had acquired the disheartening conviction that gunboats could treat shore batteries with contempt. But let me return to my report, which must necessarily be brief, and comprehending only such facts as could be discerned on the spot by an eyewitness.

Yesterday (Saturday) a number of the enemy's vessels came within sight and anchored off the point at the head of Prophet's Island, about four miles down the river. The iron-clad battery Essex and a number of mortar boats anchored close up behind the point. Having calculated the range of our batteries, as accurately as might be under the circumstances, about three o'clock in the afternoon the mortar boats and the Essex commenced practice, throwing shells for an hour and a half, but without causing any damage or alarm on our side. All was then quiet, and the fleet awaited the hour of midnight for their surprise visit. The plan of the attack, as ordered by Admiral Farragut, was as follows:—

Six vessels were to comprise the expedition, divided into two divisions. The vanguard was to consist of the flag ship Hartford, a first-class steam sloop-of-war, carrying twenty-six eight and nine-inch Paixhan guns, leading, followed by the Monongahela, a second class steam sloop, mounting sixteen heavy guns, and the Richmond, a first class steam sloop of twenty-six guns, principally eight and nine-inch columbiads. The rear guard was composed of the first class steam sloop Mississippi, twenty-two guns, eight and nine-inch, and the gunboats Kinnes and Gennessee, each carrying three columbiads and two rifled thirty-two-pounders. The Mississippi was a side wheel steamer. All the others were screw propellers. The vanguard was commanded by Admiral Farragut in person, on board the Hartford. The rear guard was under the command of Captain Melancthon Smith, flying his pennant from the Mississippi. They were to proceed up stream in single file, the stern of one following close upon the stern of another, and keeping their fires and lights well concealed, until they should be discovered by our batteries, when they were to get by the best they could, fighting their passage, and once above they believed they would have the rebel stronghold on both sides, their guns covering every part of the encampment. The order in which they formed was as follows:—

1. Sloop Hartford ..... 26 guns.
2. Monongahela ..... 16 guns.
3. Richmond ..... 26 guns.
4. Gunboat Kinnes ..... 5 guns.
5. Gunboat Gennessee ..... 5 guns.
6. Sloop Mississippi ..... 22 guns.

Making six vessels carrying ..... 100 guns.

Besides this, the Essex and mortar boats anchored at this point, and supposed to have already acquired our range, were expected to play no mean part in the affair.

Shortly before midnight, the boats, having formed the line of battle as described, their decks cleared for action, and the men at their quarters, the Hartford led the way, and the others promptly followed her direction. At the moment of their discovery a rocket was to be sent up from the admiral's flagship, as a signal for the Essex and her accompanying mortar boats to commence work. Doubtless the men of this auxiliary fleet were willing enough for the battle to begin. Safely ensconced behind their headland, at a distance of two and three quarter miles from our lower batteries, they could purchase glory at a reasonable expense of sweat and no loss of blood. Whether the men on board the other boats were as anxious for the fight is a question that must be left to others to decide. Whatever their individual opinions, naval discipline effected its purpose, and they fought stubbornly enough.

Although there had been no indication of such a determined night attack by Farragut, the usual vigilant precautions were in force at our batteries. Every gun was ready for action, and around each piece slept a detachment of gunners. So dark was the night, however, and so lightly had the armed craft nosed their way up, that the flagship had passed some of our guns, and all the fleet were within easy range before their approach was known. Almost at the same time a rocket from our signal corps, and the discharge of muskets by an infantry picket, aroused our line. Quick as a flash, while the falling fire of our alarm rocket was yet unextinguished, there shot up into the sky, from the Hartford's deck, another. Then came one grand, long, deafening roar that rent the atmosphere with its mighty thunder, shaking both land and water, and causing the high battery-crowned cliffs to tremble, as if with fear and wonder. Every gun on the fleet and every mortar at the point joined in one simultaneous discharge.

One instant, and what a change in the aspect of affairs! Many thousand soldiers, springing to their feet at a bound, exchange glances with comrades, their eyes glistening with the light of a grim satisfaction. Instinctively muskets are grasped with a firm hand, and each soldierly heart, relieved of the weight of a long protracted expectation, throbs a glad echo to the startling peal of cannon. The batteries on the long line of bluff, but a moment before silent as the churchyard, now resound to the hurrying tread of men, while the quick, stern tones of command are heard above the awful din, and the furtively glancing rays of light from the battle lanterns reveal the huge instruments of death and destruction, and show the half-covered way to magazines.

Relying greatly upon the suddenness and vigour of their attack to disconcert and confuse the defenders of our cliffs, the roar of their first discharge had not died away upon the ear before it recommenced, and when the quick and irregular but unceasing volleys and broadsides showed that the crew of each Yankee gun were going with each other in celerity. The sheets of flame that poured from the sides of the sloops at each discharge lit up nearly the whole stretch of river, placing each craft in strong relief against the black sky. The noise was stunning to the ear, but they knew not yet the position of our batteries, and the shot and shell, fired at random, had no material effect. The shelling from the mortar-boats presented the finest scene of the two. First the distant flash and puff of white smoke, then the star of light rising by spasmodic effort—so its revolutions make it appear—up to the very firmament, while the more slowly travelling sound brings the hoarse roar of the mortar: then the now brightening star descending by the same spasmodic motion; next the ominous whirring, growing louder and still more clear, until—bang! right in your face it seems, a flash like that of sheet lightning—a sharp, terrible explosion—and then, thud! thud! thud! the rent iron strikes in every direction, burying its jagged fragments deep in the solid earth.

Minute after minute passed away, each driven to eternity distracted by the maddening roar of so many cannon, and the fleet kept its unchecked course up the stream. Amazement seizes upon the Yankee officers and men. Where were the long-talked-of batteries the rebels had been constructing with which to hold the Mississippi? Had they been abandoned in a panic, caused by the terrible bombardment of the fleet? The marine officer of the Mississippi, now a prisoner, tells me the query was seriously propounded whether the rebels had not evacuated their stronghold, and thus cheated the “brave Yankee tars” out of the glory they were expecting to reap. Only too soon did the enemy discover that we were but waiting to bring their whole fleet irrevocably under our guns before we went to work. For fifteen minutes had they plied at their monster cannon, and now they were commencing to relax, from sheer vexation, when a flash of light from the crest of a cliff lights the way for a shell to go plunging through the Hartford's deck. This was the Monitor, and at once the enemy saw a cordon of vivid lights as long as their own.

Now commenced the battle in all its terrible earnestness. Outnumbered in guns and outweighed in metal, our volleys were as quickly repeated and the majority of them unerring in their aim. It was speedily apparent to the enemy, that the fire was a great deal hotter and more destructive than had been expected, and the captains of the two gunboats and of the Monongahela doubtless resolved quickly that it would be madness to attempt to run such a terrible gauntlet of iron hail. Whether the commanders of the Richmond and the Mississippi had already arrived at the same determination, or came to it soon after, is not known, but they all, except the Hartford, undertook to put about and return the way they came.

For this purpose the Richmond sheered close in to the left bank, under the batteries, and then circled round, her course reaching nearly up to the opposite point. In executing this manoeuvre she gave our batteries successively a raking position, and they took excellent advantage of it, ripping her from stern to stem. From the crashing of timbers plainly heard during every brief interval of the din, and from the view had of shots that struck her, it was evident that her doom was sealed. Instead of making a run for it, down the river, hugging the opposite shore, she again turned her prow toward our batteries and ran right in under them. As she got this position, a voice from on board of her cried out—“Now let me see you strike me from those hills, G—d d—n you!” As if in answer to his blasphemous appeal, a battery above and below got his range, and while a shell crashed through his fore-castle, a double charge of grape swept his decks from the mizzenmast forward. It must have done fearful execution, and the same voice which had just before rung out an oath and a defiance, now exclaimed, in piteous accents—“For God's sake don't shoot any more! We are sinking.”

It was reported among a crowd of observers on the bluff that a voice from her deck had called out: “We surrender! We surrender!” If this was said it was not probably spoken by her commander, who, however, appealed to our batteries to cease firing upon her as the ship was sinking. As she was evidently drifting down in an unmanageable condition and apparently settling, the batteries let her alone, and turned their attention to other craft. Whether or not she sank I do not as yet know. Her commander may have used a Yankee artifice to escape by the mistaken humanity of the victors; but if she is not seriously disabled then many an experienced eye was greatly deceived.

The Mississippi undertook to execute the same manoeuvre of turning round and making her escape back to the point she started from. She had rounded and just turned down stream, when one of our shots tore off her rudder, and another went crashing through her machinery. Immediately after came the rushing sound of steam escaping from some broken pipe, and the now unmanageable vessel drifted aground directly opposite our crescent line of batteries. Her range was quickly gained, and she was being rapidly torn to pieces by our missiles, when the commander gave the order for all hands to save themselves the best way they could. At the same time fire broke out in two places. The prisoners we have taken are of opinion that she was set on fire by her own officers, but it is quite as likely that it was caused by our red hot shot, which were being poured into her uninterruptedly. At this time her decks were strewn with dead and wounded, according to one of her crew, with whom I have conversed, who thought one half her complement of men were included in the list of casualties.

In the meantime, I must account for the other vessels of the fleet. The three larger vessels had occupied most of the attention of the batteries, but the other craft had not by any means been overlooked. Two had turned round and started down stream. One of them apparently escaped without serious disability, but the other, which was probably the Kinnes, floated down past the batteries in an unmanageable condition, receiving our volleys without being able to return them; and from the confusion of voices and the mingling of oaths, execrations and orders heard from her decks, it was evident that great slaughter must have been made among her crew, else that the boat itself was in a critical predicament. A vessel, which was either the Tennessee or Monongahela, most probably the former, slipped by in the confusion, and joined the Hartford up the river.

Some fifty-five or sixty persons saved themselves by jumping overboard and swimming or wading from the Mississippi to the shore. Of these the major and the captain of marines and assistant engineer, with forty-five sailors and marines, have been arrested by our cavalry and brought across during the day. Some few others are reported to be hiding themselves in the swamp. The dead and wounded were left upon the Mississippi, which soon floated off and started down with the current. All the other vessels were now out of range, and the spectacle of the burning ship was a grand and solemn one, yet mingled with painful thoughts of the horrible fate of those mangled unfortunates who were being burned to death upon this floating funeral pyre. As the flames would reach the shells lying among her guns, they exploded one by one, adding to the novel grandeur of the sight.

When the burning Mississippi reached the point where the mortar boats and other craft lay, she created a perfect panic among them. Probably from the fear of her magazine exploding among them they speedily cast loose from their moorings and run before her, not making their appearance again until near the hour of noon to day. The light of the burning wreck could be seen, steadily increasing in its distance, for two hours and a half. At five minutes past five o'clock, when the Mississippi was probably within five miles of Baton Rouge, a sudden glare lit up the whole sky. The cause was well known to be the explosion of the magazine. After a considerable interval of time a long rumbling sound brought final proof that the Mississippi, one of the finest vessels of the United States' navy, which had earned an historic fame before the commencement of the present war as the flag ship of the Japan expedition, was a thing of the past.

Such are the particulars of this morning's fight at Port Hudson. For the time it lasted it was one of the most desperately contested engagements of the war. Our success is to be attributed to the coolness, gallantry, and skill of the officers and men engaged, but as well to the engineering ability and personal exertions of Major-General Frank Gardner, who remodelled the whole system of our water defence on his taking command of this district, and has been untiring, since then, in his exertions to render the position as nearly impregnable as possible. The fleet having been opposite that wing of our batteries commanded by Lieut.-Colonel P. F. De Gournay, the work and responsibility fell principally upon him, and the manner in which he has discharged both, forms one of the most satisfactory and brilliant pages in the history of the present war.

Lieutenant-Colonel de Gournay is an officer of great experience and ability, and was promoted to his present grade by the President for signal service in the heavy artillery at Yorktown, Virginia. He has been at the batteries here with his efficient command, the 12th Louisiana battalion, during five months, and has entirely devoted himself to the consummation so well reached this morning. Captain Kean, Lieutenant Allison and Shirmer, Lieutenant Castellanos, Captain Collin and Captain Seawell, in command of important guns, had the good fortune to distinguish themselves; but all of the officers of this battalion, as well as those of the 1st Tennessee battalion of artillery, Captain Fisher, under command of Colonel de Gournay, displayed great gallantry. The right wing, held by the first Alabama regiment, also played a conspicuous and honourable part in the engagement, and Colonel Steedman and his officers deserve high praise.

To Lieutenant-Colonel M. J. Smith, the chief of artillery, formerly an officer of the United States' navy, and peculiarly qualified for his present responsible position, too much credit cannot be awarded. Farragut found him ready and able to meet him, and had it not been for some of those accidental occurrences that cannot be foreseen or provided against, the Yankee rear admiral would have met the same fate as the commander of his rear-guard.

If the country is not satisfied with the Port Hudson fight, then it must indeed be unreasonable. Under all the circumstances the result has been as surprising as it has been gratifying. The relative loss of life is one of the most significant features of the affair. The loss on board the enemy's vessels must amount to at least 250 killed and wounded. On the Mississippi alone the loss was over 150. The loss in our batteries was one lieutenant, of the 1st Alabama, slightly wounded, and one man of the 1st Tennessee battalion, severely wounded.

It appears by the New York advices that the total shipments of specie from that port since the beginning of the present year have amounted to £3,760,000. This is more than double the average amount during the last eleven years, while at the same time it has been accompanied by a diversion to Europe of a large portion of the California consignments, owing to the alarm inspired by the Alabama and other Confederate ships of war.—Times' City Article.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MAY 21, 1863.

On the Rappahannock.

THE Federal army in Virginia has sustained another crushing defeat. General Hooker has shared the fate of McDowell, McClellan, Pope, Banks, and Burnside. The last movement "on to Richmond" has failed. On the first three days of the present month there was fought a few miles south of the Rapidan and Rappahannock, a battle which probably surpasses any former combat of the war in the numbers engaged on either side, and in the furious and obstinate nature of the struggle. Along a line of some ten miles the battle raged almost incessantly for two days, growing in intensity towards the close, and then only checked apparently by the limits of human endurance, or by the knowledge that a closer and deadlier grapple was yet to be encountered for which every arm would need its utmost strength. From daybreak to sunset the roar of battle rose and fell as column after column rushed with ringing cheers into the fight. The night brought with it no rest. All through the darkness the boom of cannon and the rush of shot and shell were heard, and a great duel of artillery was fought by combatants who could only tell each other's position by the flashes of their guns. Here and there a night assault added to the terrors of the field. And when the light came it dawned upon shattered brigades, still eager and defiant, and fresh divisions ready to resume the fight; upon a new line of battle formed, another vast field of death and carnage. There, then, again the horrible work was resumed; and all day along the broad roads, swept by shell and grape, and on the fields neglected in the presence of an enemy, in the deep gorges, and in the wild woods, just bursting into magnificent foliage, Federal and Confederate fought hand to hand, until the bright landscape was once more marred by the mist of battle. Let us hope that these hecatombs of brave men have not been offered up in vain, and that the battle may prove not alone the fiercest, but the most decisive struggle of the war.

Taught by Burnside's sad experience, General Hooker adopted a plan of campaign not without its obvious advantages, but not devoid of many serious defects. Leaving an entire corps d'armée threatening the heights of Fredericksburg, where the bulk of the Confederate army were supposed to be massed, he threw some 80,000 or 90,000 men across the Rappahannock, turning the left flank of the Confederates. At the same time he despatched a considerable cavalry force under General Stoneman, by a considerable detour to destroy some miles of the Richmond and Fredericksburg railroad, and so prevent the reinforcements from the South reaching General Lee's army. Had General Sedgwick's forces been strong enough to retain the heights of Fredericksburg and effect a diversion on General Lee's rear, whilst Hooker gave battle to him in front; had Stoneman's "raid" intercepted all communications, General Hooker's movement might have been a success, on the one condition that General Lee should fall in completely with the Federal arrangements,—move, and attack, and fight exactly when and where General Hooker wished the fight to come off. But, the Federal General saw only the one side, and forgot the commanders and men he had to deal with. He will hereafter, perhaps, have more respect for his enemies, and more consideration for his colleagues. The movements of the Federals appear to have been conducted with creditable rapidity and secrecy. The bulk of the army moved from the camp at Falmouth, along the northern bank of the Rappahannock, and crossed at the United States Ford and Kelly's Ford, some ten and twenty-six miles above Fredericksburg. From Kelly's Ford the right and centre crossed the Rapidan, principally by Ely's Ford, a division or two passing by Germania Mill's Ford. Once on the Southern bank of the Rapidan, they were south of Fredericksburg; they had turned its defences, and were threatening both Lee's army and Richmond.

On the 30th of April, nearly the whole of the Federal army was in line, and on the 1st of May Hooker began to develop his plans. He pushed his right and centre in a south-easterly direction, still striking at the Richmond and Fredericksburg communications, his head-quarters being at Chancellorsville, a large mansion at the intersection of three cross roads—the key to his whole position. On the 1st of May, his advance first felt the enemy in their front. By degrees he learnt that the Confederates had met him with a corresponding change of front, that he had in reality drawn Lee out of his works at Fredericksburg, and that his further advance would be resisted. Still he persisted in extending his line, and in pushing his right further southwards. A smart artillery fight took place during the day, and skirmishing on his centre and right showed the enemy to be in force all along the line. On the 2nd of May, he still seems to have had no definite plan of operations, but to have conducted the campaign, like an inexperienced chess-player, on the principle of trusting his enemy to make an opening. At noon he despatches a division to reconnoitre the position of the Confederates. He is still all anxiety, lest the enemy should escape him. By 5 o'clock his anxiety in this respect is over. He is told that Stonewall Jackson has attacked his extreme right with overwhelming numbers; that brigades, divisions, an entire corps, have been driven in hopeless panic from the field, and that the Confederates are pressing right on to his head-quarters. He sends his old division against them; but not until his line has been pierced, many guns lost, and the whole army thrown into confusion, is any firm stand made. Night is coming on. Favoured by the darkness, Hooker changes his line and shows a bold front to the enemy. His advanced divisions are withdrawn; fresh batteries brought up, the reserves moved into line. The Confederate advance is checked. But a terrible blow has been inflicted. A whole corps has disgraced itself, and is thoroughly demoralised; the prestige of success is gone, the old feeling of despondency is revived. The Confederates give them little repose during the night. A harassing fire of artillery drives Hooker from Chancellorsville, and a series of feints and alarms keeps the whole army watchful until sunrise. At daybreak the Confederates renew the attack, and again the Federals are compelled to yield. The battle is desperate, the carnage awful. Hand to hand the two armies mingle in the fray, by and by the Federal line is driven back. General Berry is killed. Hooker, stunned by a fall, is for a time disabled. Towards noon the fight languishes; and the Federals bring up fresh brigades, entrenchments are hastily thrown up, and heavy guns placed in position. Later in the day a final assault is made by the Confederates, but their ranks are mowed down by the deadly concentrated fire of the Federal artillery, and they make no impression on the Federal line. Night separates the combatants.

Meantime, on the extreme left, at Fredericksburg, Sedgwick has attacked the heights in force. They are held by a small force whose orders evidently are to hold them to the last moment, and then join the main body of the army. The heights are carried after a desperate contest, and at Washington it is reported that Lee's army is entrapped between Hooker's and Sedgwick's forces without possibility of escape. But the triumph was a brief one. On the 4th it was known at Washington that Sedgwick's forces had been compelled to recross the river with whole brigades cut to pieces, and that Longstreet with a powerful corps was in communication with Lee. It was known, too, that Stoneman's "raid" had not succeeded, and that reinforcements from Richmond, from North and South Carolina, must have come up to reinforce Lee's shattered battalions; and the worst was feared for General Hooker's army. We cannot speak with any certainty of the losses on either side. Both armies have suffered terribly, especially in general officers, but the results of the two days' engagements are tolerably clear. Hooker's army was retreating on the second day's fight, and solely occupied in providing for its safety by intrenchments on the third day. The Confederates were in force on both flanks. They had taken up a position commanding the United States Ford, the main or only channel of the Federal supplies, and were shelling the Federal trains. If reinforcements came up to the Confederate army there was nothing to prevent the latter holding the Federals at bay on the south side of the Rappahannock, whilst with their superior force of cavalry they scoured the country on the north bank and cut off all their supplies. At any rate, the advance upon Richmond is at an end, and many persons entertain the not unreasonable hope that General Lee will be able to strike such a blow at the beaten army as will speedily finish the campaign in Virginia. It will be a fitting retribution to General Hooker if to his leadership history shall ascribe a crowning disaster of the Federal armies—possibly that final triumph of Confederate gallantry which convinced the Northern Administration of the hopelessness of its object, and wrung from its fears the terms its patriotism would not concede.

American Aggression.—The Lords' Debate.

THE complaint made on Tuesday night, that the Foreign Office is represented in the House of Commons only by an Under-Secretary, hardly seems to us a just one. It is necessary that two or three of the five Secretaries of State should sit in the Upper House, and the Foreign Secretary can, generally speaking, be better spared from the Commons than any other of the great officers of State. The Prime Minister is of necessity well acquainted with all that goes on in the Foreign Office, and able to answer all inquiries at short notice, as well as to defend the policy of that department, which is not adopted without his knowledge and consent; and with the mere details of official business an under-secretary is quite competent to deal. There are times, moreover, when it is just as well that the Minister who is charged with the anxious and delicate duty of conducting our relations with jealous and susceptible allies or rivals should not be exposed to the temptations and provocations to indiscretion which are inseparable from the position of a member of the House of Commons. That Assembly is impatient, excitable, and apt to forget the convenience of the public service in the heat of party conflict or the vehemence of patriotic passion; and Ministers who sit there are liable to be hurried into saying things which had better be left unsaid. Sometimes they catch the contagious excitement of the Assembly, and give free way to their sympathy with its feelings of indignation against oppressors, or anxiety to interpose on behalf of the injured. Sometimes they are goaded by the taunts of an opponent into revelations necessary to their own vindication, but exceedingly dangerous to the success of pending negotiations. Occasionally, though more rarely, they damage their position with the House by a discourteous reply to an inconvenient question. Even so experienced a debater and so wary a diplomatist as Lord Palmerston is apt to make mistakes in each of these directions; and those who perceive what is likely to be the effect of his language, often must feel heartily glad that the much less discreet and guarded nobleman who is now at the head of the Foreign Office has been removed from the House, of which he was so long an ornament, to what the honourable and comic member for Liskeard called "another and a happier place." For the House of Lords is not only a less excitable, but a far more prudent and reserved body than its compeer. Few peers commit such indiscretions as are common in the Lower House: and when such errors occur, the tone and manner of the Assembly sufficiently rebuke the offender, and restrain the Minister who might be tempted to imitate his imprudence. On the other hand, as has many times been shown, the House of Lords is not unwilling, on fitting occasions, to assert its authority as a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, and to call to account a Minister who appears to have been careless in the performance of his duty, or forgetful of the honour and interests of his country. Several times during the present session Lord Russell has had to answer for his culpable laxity in dealing with American aggressions on our flag; and if the Peers have shown somewhat more caution in speaking of the Federal Government and the Northern people, and have used a somewhat less angry and more judicial tone than the Commons, they have known how to make the Foreign Secretary understand that they are not one whit less jealous of the honour of England, or more disposed to allow any Minister to betray that honour by weakness, by complaisance, or by an abject fear of war. It is probable that somewhat more effect might be produced upon the mind of the Foreign Secretary by the censures of the Lower House, inasmuch as an adverse vote therein would cost him his place; and perhaps, had he still a seat there, the tone of his despatches to Lord Lyons might be a little more consistent and dignified, and his answers to British merchants might be a little less curt and insolent. But on the other hand, it is not unlikely that in that case we should have been by this time pledged to a war on behalf of Poland. On the whole, therefore, we have reason to be glad that the Foreign Secretary does not sit in the House of Commons.

The discussion, which was brought on by the Marquis of Clanricarde, on Monday night, may serve as a warning to Lord Russell, if it do not produce any amendment in the behaviour of Admiral Wilkes. The Marquis is a close ally of the present Government, and has no wish whatever to do anything which may tend to embarrass or perplex his friends; and Lord Russell must therefore regard his speech as expressing the general feeling of the independent portion of the moderate Liberals upon the American question. It is quite plain that they are growing very impatient of the extravagant conduct of the Federal Government, and the complaisant forbearance of the Foreign Secretary. Lord Derby is known to be less hostile to the Federalists than his party generally are; and yet Lord Derby pressed home in a decided tone the question which has been most carefully evaded by our Government—the right of British vessels to absolute immunity in carrying on a trade, no matter of what character, so that it be bonâ fide from one neutral port to another. The Minister must be aware by this time that he cannot much longer trifle with that question. He has before him the authority of Lord Stowell, clearly laying down the law that there can be no contraband of war between neutral ports. He has the admission of the Federal Government that they have no right to interfere with vessels really trading between such ports. On the other hand, he knows that the Federal Government habitually do that which they have admitted that they have no right to do; and that recently the Prize Court of New York ordered the cargo of the Peterhoff, bound for a neutral port, to be landed, with a view to ascertain whether any part of it consisted of goods coming under the description of contraband. Lord Russell must be aware that he will not again be allowed to evade this matter as he did on Monday evening; he will be called upon to say whether or no he admits the right of the Federals to seize British ships and cargoes bound for Nassau or Matamoras on the ground of their conveying military stores or munitions of war; and he will be compelled to act upon his answer.

We do not wonder that Lord Russell is anxious, if possible, to avoid the responsibility of a war with the Northern States. His Radical proclivities probably incline him to sympathize with their cause; his Ministerial position exercises over him, as it does over every statesman who is worthy to serve the State, a sobering and controlling influence. It is just and right that the Foreign Secretary should be the most pacific man in Parliament; the least disposed to provoke animosity by unnecessary harshness of language, the least ready to accept provocation of this sort at the hands of others, the most resolute not to quarrel while a quarrel can be avoided with honour, the most careful to exhaust every means of bringing an enemy to reason, before resorting to the last and worst argument of nations. He, above all men, should be careful that when an appeal is made to the God of Battles, England shall come before that awful tribunal with clean hands and a good conscience. We will not inquire too curiously whether Lord Russell's policy has, at all times and in all quarters, answered to this description. We will not ask whether he has not, even in regard to America, forgotten the rule of suaviter in modo almost as often as that of fortiter in re. If he have bullied Brazil, hectoring Denmark, and insulted France, we will not therefore accuse him of insincerity or cowardice in his eagerness to keep on good terms with America. We would only remind him that there are things more sacred than peace; and that of these is the honour of England. And there are two ways in which we fear that her honour may unhappily be tarnished in his hands. He is apt to forget that there are two parties to this war; that England is bound to show no favour to one at the expense of the other; that above all she is bound not to do injustice to the weaker and the defending party in deference to the menaces of the stronger and the aggressor; and that the interpretation placed upon her neutrality, in order to diminish, as far as possible, the chances of angry collision with the North, has been such as already to inflict very serious and unequal inconveniences upon the South. He has shown himself somewhat oblivious, in his anxiety to conciliate the Federal Government, of the equal rights and much stronger claims of the Confederate States. Again, it is utterly impossible for a great nation to submit to insult and injury, not conveyed in words merely, but carried out in acts, from a Power which pretends to equality. It is dishonouring to England not to vindicate to the utmost the privileges of her commerce and the immunity of her flag. Lord Russell is very apprehensive of going too far in this direction; of denying to the Federal marine the rights which, as belligerents, we claimed and asserted ourselves. He need be under no fear on this score. No one proposes that a British vessel should be protected in an attempt to run the blockade of Charleston, or to carry contraband of war to any Confederate port whatever. No one asks even that the principles laid down in former days by American Secretaries of State shall be applied against the present Government at Washington. All that is asked is that those simple and undeniable principles of maritime law shall be impartially enforced. We demand—the Confederate States demand—the English merchants, people, and Parliament demand only this: that American cruisers shall not be permitted so to abuse their right of visitation and detention as to interrupt a trade which, however provoking and injurious to the North, is in strict accordance with law; that American Prize Courts shall not be allowed to aid and abet them in this wrong-doing; and that the absolute freedom of all bonâ fide trade between neutral ports shall be boldly asserted and maintained at all hazards. There is no question whatever that the right of detention has been so grossly abused by the Federal cruisers as to establish a virtual blockade of the British port of Nassau, and of the Mexican port of Matamoras;—to deny this, in the face of accumulated evidence, of public notoriety, and of the declarations of American officers, is simply to insult the good sense of the English nation, and outrage its feelings by a wilful and deliberate lie. Habemus confidentem reum; and an English statesman must not, like an unscrupulous advocate, continue the defence of a culprit who has openly avowed his guilt. The character of the Federal Prize Courts is also matter of notoriety; and if Lord Russell does not know that they are constantly in the habit of violating the law they are bound to execute, it is only because he refuses to trust the reports of their proceedings in their own newspapers, and takes no care to obtain any more authentic accounts. About the law that ships and cargoes bound to a neutral port are free, whatever their ultimate destination, there is no manner of doubt. It is Lord Russell's duty to inform the Federal Government that the vexatious exercise of its belligerent privileges must cease; that it must be held answerable for the illegal and iniquitous conduct of its Prize Courts; that it must cease to send before those courts vessels captured in neutral waters, or evidently on their way to neutral ports; and that it must allow arms, munitions of war, and similar cargoes to be freely exported to Nassau and Matamoras, as they are exported to New York and Boston.

Nor is it at all likely that by doing his duty in this respect he will provoke war; still less, that by shrinking from his duty he will be able ultimately to preserve peace. On the contrary, the firmer and more peremptory the attitude of England, the calmer will be the tone and more reasonable the conduct of the Federal Government; while by forbearing to assert our rights, that Government is tempted to fresh encroachments, and induced to put itself in such a position that at last a collision must occur, when it cannot possibly withdraw its pretensions, and we can by no possibility endure them. In dealing with a frantic people and a Government reduced to desperation, to shrink from war is to invite attack. To show a firm determination to punish aggression, is the only way to render possible the maintenance of peace.

Mr. Seward's Letter to the "Citizens of London."

On January 29th, a demonstration of the New Emancipation Society was held in Exeter Hall, of which the most remarkable feature was the absence of any person of note or influence—for in this country it is easy and usual to get at least one celebrity to attend a meeting in the Metropolis, whether the object of it be social, political, or religious. The speakers at the Exeter Hall gathering were the Member for Leicester; two dissenting ministers—who, in point of reputation stand in about the same relation to Mr. Spurgeon as a street acrobat does to Blondin; a writer who has some literary fame as the author of a capital boy's book; and a writer who has not become famous. These aspiring gentlemen, it seems, were not content with having their speeches fully reported in at least one paper; but, craving for transatlantic notoriety they transmitted a report "of the proceedings" to Mr. Seward, with a request that they might be laid before President Lincoln. After a considerable delay—that is, on the 25th of April—the Federal Secretary, being probably in the mood for letter-writing, was good enough to acknowledge the receipt of the "proceedings." That this letter was composed by Mr. Seward is certain, but we have no doubt, from the address thereof, that it was submitted to and revised by his Chief. It commences with one of Mr. Lincoln's best and, we may add, his most extravagant jokes. The epistle—if we knew of a grander word we would use it—is addressed "To the citizens of London who were convened in Exeter Hall on the 29th of January last." How imposing! We beg of our readers to endeavour to do justice to Mr. Lincoln's humour, in this instance polished and pointed by Mr. Seward. The member for Leicester, and the two dissenting ministers, and the gentleman who has a little literary fame, and the gentleman who is literary but not famous, are thus represented as calling a convention of the citizens of London.

It is really too bad of Mr. Lincoln. Surely he should not repay flattery with such a biting jest. Perhaps Mr. Lincoln has sufficient sense of dignity to regard it as a very gross impertinence on the part of the great but unknown five to send him their proceedings, and intended the ridicule as a rebuke. It is, however, highly probable that the sarcasm of Mr. Lincoln will be accepted as a compliment. In Mr. Dickens's very amusing description of a contested election we are told that Mr. Pott, or one of the candidates, was vociferously applauded by the ragged little boys when he addressed them as "men of Batonswill." The sentence, "to the citizens of London who were convened in Exeter Hall on the 29th January last," will, doubtless, be a source of intense gratification to the two dissenting ministers, and the two literary gentlemen who figured at the "grand demonstration."

Having thus done our part towards perpetuating and spreading the fame of the Tooley-street Tailors who convened the citizens of London in Exeter Hall, we shall only say a few words about the contents of the letter. Mr. Seward regrets that the insurrection—that term now seems to suit him better than "rebellion"—could not "have been confined within such bounds as to prevent its disturbing the prosperity or otherwise engaging the attention of friendly nations." We do not in the least question Mr. Seward's sincerity. It is likely enough that he wishes that the Confederacy was, as he described it a few months ago, "An insurrectionary party which is located and is chiefly adjacent to the shores of the Gulf of Mexico;" or that the Confederates were at the bottom of the sea; but wishing has no influence on the course of events.

Having thus indulged in the girl-like and touching weakness of wishing that things were as they are not, in order, no doubt, to make his communication pleasant and intelligible to the persons to whom it was sent, Mr. Seward then gives "the citizens of London who were convened in Exeter Hall" rather a curious enigma to solve. He says,—"It is, therefore, with sincere satisfaction that the President learns from the proceedings now under consideration, that a large, respectable, and intelligent portion of the British public have on unprompted investigation arrived at the conclusion that the existing rebellion violates the principles of political justice, and that they protest against it as a wrong to the human race, because it seeks to displace a Government which is based on the rights of man, to make room for the establishment of another which is to rest upon human bondage as its corner stone." Mr. Lincoln issued his emancipation proclamation as a war measure, that is, being unable to beat the Confederates in the field, he hit upon the expedient of stirring up a servile war. So far from condemning slavery in that proclamation, he strongly upholds it. The worst sin he knows of is "rebellion" against his authority, and he would punish this worst sin by the heaviest penalty he knows of—that is, he would, if he could, deprive "rebels" of their slaves. On the other hand, he esteems loyalty to his authority as the highest of human virtues; and how does he propose to reward it? By allowing loyal citizens to retain their slaves. How do "the citizens of London who were convened in Exeter Hall" reconcile these facts with the passage which we have quoted from Mr. Seward's letter? We will explain the riddle. So long as New England could make a profit out of slavery by trafficking in slaves, or, as that traffic is not allowed by the South, so long as they could grow rich on the proceeds of slave labour, slavery was an institution to be used, however much for a political purpose it might be convenient to abuse slaveholders. But "rebellion," that is, the independence of the South and free trade with all the world, deprives New England of the monopoly of the profits of slave labour, and therefore slavery becomes a wicked institution. It will thus be seen how logical is Mr. Lincoln's plan. Where the profit of slave labour is transferred through the agency of the Morrill tariff to the pockets of the New England manufacturers slavery is lawful—where there is no such transference, slavery is unlawful. This is what Mr. Seward means by political justice and the rights of man.

In conclusion, it is but just that we should direct attention to a very important announcement. Mr. Seward says Mr. Lincoln "believes that the ultimate and impartial judgment of mankind upon all such questions is entitled to universal respect and acquiescence." Far be it from us to look a gift horse in the mouth, and to point out that the ultimate and impartial judgment of mankind being universal must have universal acquiescence. Rather, let us express a hope that mankind will feel grateful to Mr. Lincoln for his patronage. When next the citizens of London are convened in Exeter Hall, let them magnify Mr. Lincoln's unheard-of liberality of sentiment and his gracious condescension.

THE FEDERAL COMPACT AND THE RIGHT OF SECESSION.*

In 1840, Abel Parker Upshur, then Judge of the General Court of Virginia, and afterwards Secretary of State in Mr. Tyler's Cabinet, published an elaborate review of Judge Story's "Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States," his main object being to vindicate the doctrine of State Sovereignty which is, to some extent, impugned, directly and by implication, in the work of that eminent jurist. Those who read "A Brief Enquiry into the Nature and Character of our Federal Government," must have been favourably impressed with it as a masterly exposition of constitutional law; but no one in 1840 could have deemed the issue therein dismissed as being of great practical importance. That in twenty-one years the doctrine of State Sovereignty would be openly denied by the Federal Government of the United States, was an idea that did not enter into the imagination of any man. So the work of Judge Upshur attracted comparatively little attention, and was nearly forgotten before the melancholy death of its author in 1843. After being buried for twenty years, it has recently been republished in Philadelphia. It is calculated to produce a deep effect on those Northern Democrats who have not sold their principles for a reversion to a share in the profits of Federal office. It must seem to them like a voice from the grave. If Judge Upshur had lived until this day, and he had been called upon to defend the sovereignty of the States, and, therefore, the right of secession, he could not have written more directly to the point, or more emphatically. We conceive that a brief notice of this book will not be out of place. We do not expect that an appeal to reason will be heard amidst the din of war; but it is useful from time to time to repeat that the South is fighting, not only for an inherent and constitutional right, but for a right which she has hitherto enjoyed, and of which it is now sought to deprive her. The South is not fighting to win but to defend her Independence.

Does the Constitution of the United States acknowledge the sovereignty of the States? Judge Upshur replies to this question by adducing the evidence of history, by a reference to the text of the Constitution, and by examining the nature and functions of the Government which is created according to the provisions of that instrument.

The American colonies of Great Britain were essentially distinct and separate communities. They were constituted by different grants and charters, their territorial boundaries were carefully defined, their systems of government were in many respects dissimilar, and the only political connection that subsisted between them was their common allegiance to the British Crown. Judge Story himself fully admits this. He says, "Though the colonies had a common origin and owed a common allegiance, and the inhabitants of each were British subjects, they had no direct political connection with each other. Each was independent of all the others; each, in a limited sense, was sovereign within its own territory. There was neither alliance nor Confederacy between them. The assembly of one province could not make laws for another, nor confer privileges which were to be enjoyed or exercised in another, further than they could be in any independent foreign State." What brought about an alliance between them was the attempt of the British Government to trample on their independence. The first Congress met to devise means for defending their rights, and to restore a good understanding between the mother country and the colonies. There was no intention of throwing off their allegiance to the British Crown until it was found that no redress of grievances could be obtained. Most of the members of the Congress were appointed by the Legislatures of the several States, and the credentials of the member for New Jersey set forth that he was "to represent the colony in the General Congress"—that is, the members were the delegates of the Colonial Governments. The Congress did not misconstrue its power. It did not pretend that any colony refusing to accept its recommendations would be rebellious, but it simply advised non-intercourse with any colony or province that would not accede to the proposals of the association. Before and after the declaration of independence there was separate action even in the conduct of the war. "Ticonderaga was taken by the troops of Connecticut before the declaration of independence; Massachusetts and Connecticut fitted out armed vessels to cruise against those of England, in October, 1775; South Carolina soon followed their example. In 1776 New Hampshire authorized her Executive to issue letters of marque and reprisal." There are numerous historical proofs that the States did not resign to a Federal Congress—their creature—that liberty and independence for the maintenance of which they had unwillingly separated from the mother country. For example, all the States did not at once come into association; in June, 1776, Congress recommended the passing of laws for the punishment of treason; and declared, "that the crime shall be considered as committed against the colonies individually, and not against them all, as united or confederated together;" and when Great Britain and the other European Powers acknowledged the independence of the States, they acknowledged the independence of the several States. Our author justly remarks that if the colonies had yielded their Sovereignty to a Government which existed only at their will, and by their aid and support, it would have been an unprecedented act, and that "the history of the world affords no similar instance of folly and infatuation."

After discussing the historical evidences of State Sovereignty, Judge Upshur criticises the written constitution. The preamble, "We, the people of the United States," has doubtless misled many persons, but a little consideration will show that it does not invalidate the independence of the States, and that it was the best form of words that could, under the circumstances, be adopted. We learn from "Elliott's Debates" that, on August 6th, the committee appointed for that purpose reported the first draft of a Constitution. The preamble was in these words, "We, the people of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, do advise, &c." On August 7th this preamble was unanimously adopted. On September 8th a resolution was passed to appoint a committee of five "to revise the style of and arrange the articles agreed to by the House." It was a committee of taste and arrangement, and it had no more right to change anything agreed to than a lawyer has to alter the instructions of a client for making a will. On September 12, the Committee presented their report, and the preamble they submitted was, "We, the people of the United States, &c.;" and this was passed without discussion. Why? Because it was substantially the same as the preamble in the first draft. The word "people" had not then, and with most writers has not now, any plural termination; and the Congress understood "people" to stand for "peoples," just as we, in meeting with the expression "the people of Europe," understand it to mean several peoples or nations. There was a reason, too, for adopting this form of expression. If nine States agreed to the articles of Confederation, the Constitution was to go into effect, as far as those States were concerned, and it was uncertain whether the whole of the States would enter into the compact—whether they would join the Secessionists from the Government and perpetual union formed by the articles of Confederation. The preamble as revised by the Committee, would include them if they chose to join the Union. If, however, the wording of it could justify any doubt, it is absolutely removed by the article which reserves to the States respectively, or to the people, the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States.

When, however, we pass from the history of the Constitution, and the examination of the instrument itself, to the Government created by the Constitution, we are confronted with evidence which is, if possible, still more conclusive of the sovereignty of the States. In the Senate there is an equal representation—that is, the smallest as well as the largest State is represented by two members. The House of Representatives consists of members chosen in each State, and is regulated in numbers by a certain ratio of representation. "The number of representatives to which each State is entitled is proportioned to its own population, and not to the population of the United States, and if there happen to be a surplus in any State less than the established ratio, that surplus is not added to the surplus of population of any other State, in order to make up the requisite number for a representative, but is wholly unrepresented." Each State prescribes the qualifications of its own voters; the only condition of the Constitution, being that they shall have the qualifications which the State has prescribed for the voters of the most numerous branch of its legislature. No one can be elected to represent any State except a citizen thereof, for there is no such person as a citizen of the United States. Vacancies in the representation of any State are supplied under writs of election issued by the State Executive. In the election of the President and Vice-President, we find that the Federal Executive is, in all respects, the representative of the States, and not of the majority of the peoples of the States. "These officers are chosen by electors, who are themselves chosen by the people of each State, acting by and for itself, and in such mode as itself may prescribe. The number of electors to which each State is entitled is equal to the whole number of its representatives and senators. This provision is even more federative than that which apportions representation in the House of Representatives; because it adds two to the electors of each State, and so far places them upon an equality, whatever be their comparative population. The people of each State vote within the State, and not elsewhere; and for their own electors, and for no others. Each State prescribes the qualification of its own electors, and can alone compel them to vote. The electors, when chosen, give their votes within their respective States, and at such times and places as the States may respectively prescribe." The election of Mr. Lincoln is an apt illustration of the way in which the States and not the people, elect the President. In the Electoral College he had a vote of 180 to 123, and therefore became President; but in the popular vote, cast in the choice of the electors, he received 1,857,610, against 2,857,670. Mr. Lincoln became President by virtue of that State Sovereignty which he has so grossly violated.

We need not pursue the subject further. We have glanced at a very few of the multitude of facts adduced by the author to show that the States are sovereign; but they are sufficient. And if his premises are admitted, his conclusions are irresistible. The creature cannot be superior to the creator thereof. The Supreme Court, which is the creature of the Constitution appointed by the Executive, which is also the creature of the Constitution, cannot control the action of the Sovereign power from which the Constitution emanates. When a dispute arises the sole arbiter is the State. It chose to enter into the Union, and it may leave it; and Judge Uphur says it is certain that there is no right to coerce a seceding State. There is no power under the Constitution to insist upon a State sending representatives to Congress; there is no authority to prevent the States from forming a new Confederation. The secession of certain States does not abrogate the Constitution. It is not the South, but the North which has destroyed the Constitution.

Judge Uphur warns his countrymen not to fall into the error of instituting a strong consolidated government, and in this connection he cites the British Constitution as something to be avoided. Speaking of the Anti-States Rights party, he says:—"The tendency of their principles is to establish that legislative omnipotence which is the fundamental principle of the British Constitution, and which renders every form of written Constitution idle and useless. They suffer themselves to be too much attracted by the splendours of a great central power. Dazzled by these splendours they lose sight of the more useful, yet less ostentatious purpose of the State Governments, and seem to be unconscious that in building up this huge temple of Federal power, they necessarily destroy those less pretending structures from which alone they derive shelter, protection, and safety." Without in the least wishing to commend the British Constitution to other nations, we may observe that the strength of our Constitution is due to its difference from what the United States' republicans and Mr. John Bright consider the perfection of Government. Our House of Commons does not represent numbers, but interests, and our Ministers may and often do hold office by a vote of the majority of the House, which only represents a minority of the popular vote. Or take the case of our colonies. Their prosperity is due to the adoption of a federative system. They are independent States, owing allegiance to a common central Government which has nothing to do with their internal policy; and the chief executive officers though appointed by the central government, are under the constitutional control of the colonial Parliaments. We attempted to interfere with the independence of our American colonies, and we were taught a lesson which we have never forgotten. We do not say that our colonies have a legal right to sever the political tie, but if any of them choose to secede, it is not likely that we shall attempt to coerce them to remain in union with England. The bulwark of our liberty, and the source of our greatness is, that we have been persistently opposed both at home and in our colonies to centralization. The very independence which the Southerners prize so dearly, and for which they are contending so heroically, is an heritage from the mother country.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND. (From our Confederate Correspondent.)

RICHMOND, April 14.

The long-expected attack on Charleston by the enemy's fleet was commenced on the afternoon of Tuesday, the 7th instant. As early as noon on Sunday, the formidable flotilla was seen in the distance to the south-east, slowly making its way towards the entrance of the harbour, and before sunset eight iron-clad turreted vessels, of the Monitor pattern, the Ironsides—a powerful steamer, built in close imitation of the Merrimac, with sloping sheathed roof and carrying fourteen guns—and twenty-seven wooden war vessels had taken up their position just beyond the bar. The excitement produced in Charleston by the approach of the Armada was unexampled, except by that which pervaded all classes of its citizens, just two years ago, when the bombardment of Fort Sumter first awakened the long-slumbering echoes of its beautiful bay. All the tradesmen and foreigners, who had remained in the city up to that moment in obstinate incredulity of serious peril, rushed to the railway stations with trunks, boxes, bundles, baskets, and "brown paper parcels," seeking a place of safety in the interior for themselves and their effects; while the old inhabitants, who had made up their minds to share the fate of their beloved homes, thronged the battery promenades, from which they might even then catch a far-off glimpse of the dark hulks of the hostile fleet. Sunday night passed by, however, and a weary Monday, and still the straining eyes of the deeply interested spectators saw nothing more than the sparkling waves and the white caps out at sea.

It was known in Charleston, on Monday, that a considerable body of men had been moved up the Stono River, and landed upon Cole's Island, intended, beyond a doubt, to co-operate with the vessels of war, in the event that they should succeed in passing the forts and gaining the inner harbour. Early on Tuesday morning, a ninth vessel of the Monitor pattern arrived off the bar, and it was evident enough that the hour was at hand when the great shock of arms, on which such tremendous issues were at stake, would resound over land and sea.

Accordingly, at 2 P.M. of Tuesday, it was announced by despatch from Fort Sumter, that the nine Monitor vessels, with the Ironsides, had crossed the bar, and were bearing down cautiously upon the batteries guarding the entrance to the bay. An hour afterwards, when the foremost ship had arrived within a mile and three-quarters of the land, the heavy boom of the opening gun from Fort Moultrie gave notice that the fight was begun. A cloud of smoke was instantly observed to ascend from the turret of one of the iron-clads, followed at an interval of some seconds by the loud report of the explosion. At ten minutes past three the batteries of Fort Sumter opened with sullen roar, the enemy having gradually come within range, and at the same moment, Sullivan Island and Morris Island, behind which lay the guns of the Beauregard battery and Battery Wagner, on the extreme right and left of the enemy's position, were enveloped in a thick white vapour, from which little puffs of smoke rose incessantly into mid-air. Five of the turreted monsters in close order stood immediately opposite Fort Sumter, against which the fire of the whole fleet was principally directed, though occasionally an immense projectile would be hurled at the walls of Fort Moultrie, or the batteries on shore, exploding, in the majority of instances, harmlessly enough, or burying itself deep in the sand.

The battle reached its utmost fury about half-past four o'clock, P.M., and the scene, as described by those who were gazing upon it with eager, almost breathless interest, possessed an awful grandeur. The sea was smooth, the sky almost cloudless, and between sea and sky, for a circuit of six or eight miles, rose the white canopy of cloud from which the continuous flashes of the cannonade leaped forth, like spirits of flame from a great conflagration. The fire of the Monitors was less accurate than our own, and now and then, as some huge mass of iron, thrown from a piece not sufficiently elevated, would come plunging, en ricochet, through the water, great sheets of spray would be thrown quite over the ramparts of Sumter, wetting the artillerymen of the barbette guns as they stood resolutely at their posts.

At five o'clock, or thereabouts, the Ironsides, which had participated most actively in the bombardment, showed evident signs of being no longer able to bear up under the tremendous shots of our batteries, and, getting her engines in motion, withdrew with all possible haste out of range, followed by the Keokuk, an iron-clad with double turrets, upon whose smoke-stack and bow the effect of our missiles was plainly visible. The fire of the enemy then began to slacken, but was maintained with abated spirit until half-past five, when the last gun was heard, and the whole fleet retired to a position of safety.

Such was the beginning of the enemy's long-prepared and long-deferred attack upon Charleston. The results may be briefly summed up, though we cannot know with certainty the whole amount of damage that was inflicted upon the enemy. Thirty-four of the projectiles aimed at Fort Sumter struck their mark. A brave little drummer boy was killed, two men were severely, and three others slightly wounded. One gun was dismounted, but the Fort sustained very little injury—at Moultrie the mischief done was nothing at all. One gallant fellow, who climbed the flag-staff to replace the Confederate colours which had been shot away, fell to the ground, and was so severely hurt that he died the following day. Voilà tout. Now for the injury we did the enemy. The light of Wednesday morning revealed the fact that the Keokuk had sunk off Morris's Island. All that was to be seen of her was her smoke-stack and one of her turrets appearing just above the water-line. Some Confederate officers went out in a small boat to the wreck, and found that our solid shot had pierced her thickly-plated turret through and through. As several of the same projectiles were seen to strike the Ironsides, it was reasonably conjectured that she was badly crippled in the fight. The enemy sustained another loss during Tuesday night. A novel piece of machinery, constructed at considerable expense and brought round from New York with great difficulty—known as the Devil—the purpose of which was the removal of the submerged torpedoes in Charleston Harbour, floated ashore and fell into our hands. Four of these remarkable contrivances were sent in tow of steamers to take part in the attack, but three went to the bottom off Hatteras. The fourth likewise came to an untimely end.

It was also noticed, on Wednesday morning, that only seven Monitors were in sight within the bar. The conclusion is irresistible that a second either sank in deep water, or was so seriously crippled as to make it necessary to send her to Port Royal for repairs.

Nothing could be finer than the conduct of our officers and men engaged in the defence of Charleston. The Mercury records that, when the intelligence of the coming up of the hostile fleet was spread through our batteries, the garrisons were at dinner, but the long roll being sounded, the men sprang to their guns with cheering, the battle-flag was run up over Moultrie to the air of "Dixie," played by the band on the parapet, and a salute of thirteen guns, in wanton waste of powder, was fired in honour of the occasion. All the batteries in the harbour of Charleston were in command of General Ripley, under whose watchful and practised eye the defences have been constructed. His purpose had been to make his head-quarters at Fort Sumter during the action, as at once the post of danger and of glory; but being in the city at the time the signal was given, he found it utterly impracticable to reach the Fort through the blazing fire of the fleet. Sumter was commanded by Colonel Alfred Rhett, Moultrie by Colonel Builer, the Beauregard Battery by Captain Sitgreaves, Battery Bee by Lieut.-Colonel Simkins, Battery Wagner, on Morris Island, by Major Huger, and the Cumming's Point batteries by Lieut. Lesesne—all officers of the South Carolina Regulars. General Ripley's position during the cannonade was at Battery Bee on Sullivan's Island, while General Beauregard and staff watched the engagement, excited and confident spectators, from the Charleston Battery promenade.

I trust your readers will not think I have written too much of an action accompanied with so little loss of life on our side, and the results of which were so far from being conclusive of the final issue of the attack on Charleston. I am mindful of the pleasantry of Punch concerning the tremendous bombardment of Sumter in April, 1861, and the shrewd suspicion hinted in the Times, from the bloodless nature of that memorable reduction, that nothing beyond blank cartridges and brandy cocktails were then exchanged between General Beauregard and Major Anderson. But if the fight of Tuesday last has not made it certain that Charleston cannot be taken by the Yankees (any more than the earlier disasters of the allies made it impossible that they should take the stronghold of Sebastopol), it has at least proved that the turreted iron-clad vessels on which they so much rely for their final success, are by no means the indestructible machines they have been supposed. As for the indomitable pluck and undaunted resolution of the defenders of Charleston, I may assume, without arrogance, that these qualities have already been sufficiently exhibited to the world. They need no new demonstration.

You have no doubt received intelligence through the New York papers of a terrible "Bread Riot," which occurred in this city on the 2nd instant, and, from your previous knowledge of the great scarcity and high price of provisions here, you may have been disposed to receive the accounts as true. That there was a disgraceful outbreak, ostensibly produced by the dearth of food among a certain class of people in Richmond, on the 2nd of April, is undeniable. But the statements of the returned Yankee prisoners, upon which the account in the Tribune and other Northern journals was based, were so compact of falsehood, that one knows not where to begin in attempting their correction. As an eye-witness of the riot from its beginning, I beg to give you the veritable history of the affair, though it might properly be dismissed as by no means of sufficient consequence to justify the trouble of the narration. On the morning of the 2nd of April, a crowd of beldames and haridians, with whom were associated some poor young women of a better sort, assembled on the Capitol Square to the number of about 250, and went in a body to the house of the Governor, which they surrounded, without clamour, without disturbance, and upon being asked by an aide of his Excellency what they wanted, replied, through a tall, masculine-looking virago, who acted as leader, that they must have bread. There was so little in the appearance of these women to give colour to the idea that they were starving, that the whole thing was regarded as a joke. All of them were comfortably many of them even fashionably dressed, some belaced, bekrinketed, and befurbelowed. They brandished no clubs, they fluttered no banners, they came with no wild and frenzied alarum of Carmagnole, and no one could detect in their faces the hard lines of hunger or the dangerous despair which had resolved on "bread or blood." One woman is said to have displayed a pistol on the Square, and pistols were certainly produced by them at a later hour, but I saw nothing menacing serious mischief in their movement as they stood around the Governor's house. From this point, they walked very deliberately over to the Capitol building, where the Governor addressed them in a few words of remonstrance and warning, and then the hoop-skirts moved down towards the business streets, followed by a miscellaneous rabble of gamins and idlers. The Governor, though far from apprehending any serious danger, thought it best to order out the Public Guard, but before this corps could be gotten under arms, the women had entered and robbed six or seven shops and warehouses in the lower part of the town. Here the object of the mob was made apparent. It was not bread, but pillage. Some flour and bacon they took, but everything else they could lay their hands on, they seized indiscriminately—shoes, leather, candles, books, dry-goods, crinolines, perfumery, all that chanced to be in their way. The raid was successful only because it was so sudden, and because the shopkeepers and their friends were wholly unaccustomed to deal with a mob of women. In a short time the police arrived on the spot, and arrested all the prominent offenders, the street was cleared of the crowd by a squadron of cavalry, and the disturbance was at an end. The examination before the Mayor the next morning made manifest the absurdity of regarding it as a "Bread Riot." The tall strident woman who led the rioters was a truckster of provisions in one of the city markets, had purchased and butchered two beeves the week before, and had a comfortable little property of $20,000. Others engaged in the affair were employées in the shops and factories of the Confederate Government, at wages varying from $30 to $60 a week. One woman was herself a small shopkeeper in the suburbs, and had actually exposed some of her plunder for sale in her own windows. A "Bread Riot" is an impossibility in Richmond, for Richmond has few paupers, and no mendicants. A large fund set aside for the relief of the poor by the Common Council, several months ago, remains in great part in the hands of the City Chamberlain, awaiting the demands of the destitute. The scarcity of provisions which prevails here, does not bear with unequal severity upon the poor to the extent that might be supposed, because, while food is high, wages are high. The real sufferers are the Clerks of the Departments and their families, and generally all salaried officers, whose pay remains the same under all circumstances; and this class of citizens bear their privations with admirable cheerfulness. Au reste, we are in no more danger of bred riots here, than we are of Fighting Joe Hooker's carrying off President Davis in chains to Washington.

The New York press, ever desirous of making you acquainted with Confederate disasters, has also conveyed to the office of the Index full accounts of the overwhelming defeat of General Pegram, near Somerset, in Kentucky. The telegrams of the Federal officer, Colonel—perhaps General—Quincy A. Gilmore, to the department at Washington were really startling. "The rebels were commanded by Pegram in person," he says, "and were greatly superior in number to their Federal pursuers; the fight was desperate, the rout of the rebels complete—altogether one might suppose that General Pegram had really given battle with a large force to the enemy and sustained a crushing disaster. Du tout, General Pegram went into Kentucky, with a force of fourteen hundred men, to get beef cattle, as of old the moss-troopers so often crossed the Tweed. By a rapid march, he surprised the Yankees at Danville, in Boyle County, in the very interior of the State, driving five regiments of infantry, a regiment of cavalry, and a battery of light artillery, out of the town, and following them as far as their Gibraltar at Hickman's Creek, within twelve miles of Lexington. Returning with 750 head of cattle, and burning two bridges behind him over Dick's River, he found the Cumberland River in his front greatly swollen by sudden rains, so that the cattle could not swim it. Just there he received a despatch from a colonel of his command, who had been stationed with 500 men to guard a parallel road, that the enemy were in hot pursuit. The number of men at that moment under his personal conduct did not exceed 600. Selecting his position a short distance beyond Somerset, in the county of Pulaski, he awaited the enemy's attack, which was made vigorously by five full regiments of infantry, besides cavalry and artillery. An obstinate combat ensued, and the 3,000 Federal troops prevailed against the 600 "rebels." They had but a slightly better chance than the immortal "six hundred" of Balaclava. General Pegram's loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners was 150 from the time he entered Kentucky, until he recrossed the Cumberland River. Of the 750 beeves collected hastily in three days, 537 were brought off and driven into the camp of General Bragg. The young cavalry officer who has been brought thus prominently before the public as a victim to the exceeding glory of Gilmore, is a native of Richmond, an élève of West Point, nephew of the gallant Captain Pegram, of the Nashville, and a newly appointed Brigadier General. In the very beginning of the war, he was entrapped and overpowered at Rich Mountain by General McClellan, to which success the great Federal commander owed his elevation to the highest position in the United States' army. Colonel Pegram remained for many months a prisoner in the hands of the enemy, during the greater portion of which time he was an inmate of Fort Warren, when that famous or infamous Bastille contained within its casemates so large a number of cultivated and eminent men. General Pegram bore a distinguished part in the battle of Murfreesboro', and has shared with Morgan, Forrest and Wheeler the hardships and successes of their brilliant cavalry service in Tennessee and Kentucky. He is about 32 years of age, of well-knit, muscular frame, of wonderful powers of endurance and of military qualities that will yet be acknowledged by friend and foe, before the war is over.

The correspondence between Mr. Mason and Earl Russell on the subject of the blockade, and the recognition of our independence, has been widely republished by the press of the Confederate States, and has elicited everywhere the highest commendation of our Commissioner. Mr. Mason writes in rebuke of the arrogance of the English minister, just as the Confederate people would have had him write, with entire self-command, perfect simplicity of style, and unanswerable logic. The feeling aroused by the correspondence was, at first, one of lively indignation, which was expressed in numerous editorials and upon the floor of Congress, journalists and Congress men declaring that the time had arrived for the withdrawal of our foreign commissioners and the dismissal from the Confederate States of the Consular Agents of foreign Governments residing here. In the House of Representatives Mr. Swann, of Tennessee, moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to introduce a resolution declaring that the recall of the Commissioners by the President would meet with the sanction of Congress; but this motion, while it obtained a majority of votes, did not secure the constitutional two-thirds, and the rules were not suspended. The public mind has settled down into the conviction that the matter may very properly be left in the President's hands: meanwhile the country will rest satisfied that its interests will be safe in the keeping of so able and vigilant a man as Mr. Mason.

Congress has been sitting for the last fortnight, day and night, hoping to despatch the public business by the 20th instant, which has been fixed upon for adjournment sine die by the Lower House. The Senate has not yet agreed to this resolution, but it is understood that the adjournment will not be delayed beyond the 27th. The bills for the organization of the Supreme Court of the Confederate States and the Court of Claims have been postponed by the House of Representatives till the third Monday of the next Session. The Tax Bill was returned to the House essentially modified. The Finance Committee of the Senate fixed the levy on merchants upon their incomes and not their receipts, and engrafted on the original Bill a provision for the payment of taxes by the agricultural community in kind. The House not agreeing to these changes, a Committee of Conference has been appointed by the two Houses, who will probably report a Bill without delay, harmonising the contrary views of the respective parties.

The aspect of military affairs at Vicksburg remains the same as when I last wrote. There have been some skirmishings on the Tallahatchie, and captures of Yankee gunboats (one an important capture, the Diana, at Berwick's Bay, a point connected with the Mississippi by the Atchafalaya) but nothing decisive has been done, and we still hold the river and our main positions. There has been a withdrawal of troops from the Mississippi, as also from Fortress Munroe and from Hooker's army, to strengthen the column which threatens Tennessee. Burnside has gone to command in Kentucky, and it is probable that he will push a heavy force into Eastern Tennessee, in order to bring into play that immense latent Unionism which the Yankees declare surrounds Knoxville. In Virginia all is yet quiet. General Wise has occupied the town of Williamsburg, driving the enemy into Fort Magruder, a short distance below the town, and meeting with no serious resistance, but General Lee still keeps his position on the line of the Rappahannock. Before this letter can reach London, it is probable that the battle will be joined in that direction and at other points of the State.

The spring has come upon us at last. The pink blossoms of the peach trees make gay the gardens of Shockoe Hill, and the early wheat spreads its green carpet to the eye over the fields around the city. Only a week ago we had a continuous fall of snow for twelve hours, but this was probably the last adieu of winter. The warm season rapidly approaches, and it must bring with it the hot breath of battle and the thunder of the cannonade.

Despite the blockade business is active in Richmond. The hotels are crowded; two theatrical companies perform nightly (Tom Taylor's plays are the most popular that are produced—a singular fact, since the better class of our people do not frequent the theatres); there are concerts and literary lectures from week to week; and though crime abounds, and vices inevitable to a condition of war afflict society, organized benevolence and practical Christianity are more than ever actively manifested among us.

The blockade off Charleston continues ineffective. We have met with some heavy losses of late. The Granite City and Nicolai I. were captured by the Yankee fleet, and the Georgiana and Stonewall Jackson (formerly the Leopard) were run ashore and destroyed by their captains; but arrivals from Nassau are of every day occurrence, and two vessels came in four days ago through the line of battle of the Monitors.

P.S.—Since the foregoing was written, we have information that the armada off Charleston has dispersed. Some of the iron-clads went north and some south, and three were towed off by steam tugs.

The telegraph also announces a fight near Franklin, in Tennessee, between a considerable force of the enemy and the command of General Van Dorn, in which the latter, after a hard conflict, was compelled to retire.

Au contraire, we learn that General Wheeler has captured two large passenger trains on the line of the Nashville and Louisville Railroad, with mails and supplies.

The War Songs of the South.

Mobile, March, 1863.

So rarely do I see the INDEX, that I do not know whether you have paid any attention in its pages to the poetry of our War. We have an abundance of it, good (meo judicio), bad, and indifferent. Of the first of those classes only, I propose to send you a few specimens, though some of these may, in your opinion, properly belong under one of the other heads. But poetry must be judged by its effects—by the way in which it stirs the blood, by the reception accorded to it among those for whom it was written,—not by its strict observance of artistic rule, not by the approval which a critic of cultivated mind and delicate taste alone will give it. "Chevy Chase" is good poetry, and I am not sure but, upon my principle, "Lillibullero" is good poetry too. No matter, I'll stick to my principle.

Many of the productions of our bards require no apology, but challenge a favourable verdict from the most fastidious taste. There are others in which admirable passages occur, though there is a want of sustained effect in the piece as a whole. The best imitation of the old ballad style which I have yet seen is in passages—indeed, nearly throughout the whole—of a poem on the death of General Barton, one of the two first victims of the war of high rank, falling with General Bee at Manassas. I have mislaid it, and can only quote the commencement :—

“He went before his gallant band,
On great Manassas plain;
He led them right into the fight,
But never out again.”

This, and a few detached fragments, such as this:—

“He fought as if all Georgia smiled Upon her favourite son,” are all that I can recall. The author, who dates from Louisiana, shows a delicate appreciation of the line which distinguishes the ballad from every other style of composition whatever.

Of the plain homely song of the camp, a class of compositions of the same level as the sailors' songs of the fore-castle, there is an abundance, and some have no little merit in their way, such as it is. And why should merit be denied them? They were composed for illiterate men, and by illiterate men, and so long as the author does not try to make something fine of his verse, by decking it with the tinsel of high-sounding words, which he is sure to misuse, he rarely fails to produce something which goes to the heart of the honest soldier. Here now is the story of the capture of Lexington, as sung by Captain J. R. Brown, of the Missouri State Guard, who was one of those that made the history he sings—and he sings it well too, out of his own personal throat. Take a specimen :—

Somebody told PRICE of the hemp that was near by.
We got it, and wet it, and rolled it up hill :
Our “rides” behind this good hemp line did thereby Knock off the top-knots of the Feds at their will.
“What the devil does this mean?” the Irishmen said, sir;
Poor MULLIGAN was puzzled to death at the sight;
In all of his reading he never had read, sir,
Of anything like this hemp fort on his right.

Of all the pieces of this class, “M'Clellan's Retreat” is entitled to the palm. It is perfectly original, and has a tune as original as the words, which seems to have grown out of them. Nobody ever heard it before he heard them. Do admire the chorus with me !

We marched out from Richmond,
I remember well that night,
That JOHNSTON gave the order
And M'CLELLAN took his flight.
I'll lay ten dollars down,
And count them one by one,
That the next time that we fight them,
The Yankees they will run.

We marched out from Richmond,
Down to Mechanicsville,
And so we drew up in battle line,
Down at old Gaines's mill.
I'll lay ten dollars down, &c.

Bold LONGSTREET formed the front,
And he said, ‘You need not fear,
For MAGRUDER 's on the right,
And JACKSON 's in their rear.
I'll lay ten dollars down, &c.

The Fourteenth Louisiana,
They charged them with a yell,
They bagged them Bucktail Rangers,
God d— their souls to h— !
I'll lay ten dollars down, &c.

Perhaps you think it is about time to stop with this, and I assure you it is. It doesn't get a bit better, but quite the contrary for a verse or two further. This song, by the way, has proved a nucleus around which have agglomerated verses by uncertain authors, the number of which is already past reckoning. I have heard it sung for half an hour, when it seemed to me to be a chronicle of all the battles from Manassas to Shiloh, and I have no doubt that by this time Fredericksburg and Murfreesboro' are added to it.

But Non omnes arbusta juvant, humilesque myrice. Our contest has awakened strains of a higher order. You have, probably, got hold of the poems which have been published in the Southern Illustrated News, the best as well as the longest of which is “The Song of the Rebel,” by John Esten Cook, in which Jackson, Stuart, Longstreet, and Lee are commemorated. If not, let a few stanzas serve as a skeleton of the whole :—

Hark ! how the long, loud cheering
Rings through the swaying pines,
And a thousand eyes are glowing
Along the serried lines !

They know the great calm leader,
In his old grey uniform,
And the brave hearts rush to meet him,
As they rush in the battle storm.

* * * * *
And if we cheer our hero,
Why not? No glittering lord
Calls forth that shout!—a soldier
Leaning upon his sword—
A way-worn, Christian soldier
Excites that grand acclaim,
To roll for ever through the walls,
And down the halls of fame.

* * * * *
But hark !—a ringing bugle !
A merry clanking sound,
With the din of clattering hoof-strokes
Upon the frosty ground !
And STUART, with his sabre keen,
And floating plume appears,
Surrounded by his gallant band
Of Southern cavaliers.

* * * * *
Look, how the blue eyes brighten,
The eager hand extends,
To greet his brother soldier,
His faithful friend of friends.
See how two valiant spirits
Hot with the battle's breath,
Meet on the eve of conflict,
Before the morn of death.

* * * * *
Around them are the noble band
Of Paladins, who fight
In this, our mighty struggle
For God and for the Right.
The soldier face of RICKETT,
The steady nerve of HILL,
The dashing LEES and HAMPTON,
Stout-hearted, strong of will,

BARKSDALE, that hardy fighter,
As ever mounted steed,
Brave GREGG, and COBB, and GARNETT,
And JENKINS good at need.

No harder band of gentlemen
E'er drew the keen-edged brand,
Or rode amid the battle smoke,
To guard their native land !
For ever shall their famous deeds
Shine on the glowing page;
Their names shall live through countless years.
Our proudest heritage.

* * * * *
Such is our band of heroes,
Who fight the bitter fight,
Here on our sacred Southern soil,
For our ancient English right;
Who meet and greet brave JACKSON
Upon his rapid way,
For whom all patriotic hearts
Unceasing praise and pray.

So a health to STONEWALL JACKSON,
To LONGSTREET brave as steel,
To STUART with the fearless soul,
A knight from plume to heel:
And last to LEE our General,
Beneath whose flag we go
To test the edge of Southern steel
On a vulgar, brutal foe.

Of a different character from the above is the elegiac strain of John R. Thompson, to the memory of Ashby, who, had he lived, would have been what Stuart is now:—

To the brave all homage render;
Weep, ye skies of June!
With a radiance soft and tender,
Shine, O saddened moon!
Dead, upon the field of glory,
Hero fit for song or story,
Lies our bold dragoon.

Well they learned whose hands have slain him,
Braver, knightlier foe
Never fought with Moor or Paynim,
Rode at Templestowe,
With a mien both high and joyous,
'Gainst the foes that would destroy us
Went he forth we know.

Never more, alas! shall sabre
Gleam around his crest,
Fought his fight, fulfilled his labour,
Stilled his manly breast;
All unheard sweet Nature's cadence,
Trump of fame, or voice of maidens;
Now he takes his rest.

Earth, that all too soon hath bound him,
Gently wrap his clay;
Linger lovingly around him,
Light of dying day.
Softly fall, ye summer showers;
Birds and bees among the flowers,
Make the gloom seem gay.

There, throughout the coming ages,
When his sword is rust,
With his deeds in classic pages,
Mindful of her trust,
Shall Virginia, bending lowly,
Still a ceaseless vigil holy,
Keep above his dust.

There are few of our eminent soldiers to whom some poet, often unheard of before, has not paid a tribute. Here is a lively, blood-stirring piece, which appears without a name. The author need not have been ashamed of it:—

SONG OF THE TEXAS' RANGERS.

The waning star is paling,
The camp fires flicker low;
Our steeds are madly neighing,
For the bugle bids us go.
So put the foot in stirrup
And shake the bridle free,
For to-day the Texas' Rangers
Must cross the Tennessee.
With WHARTON for our leader,
We'll chase the dastard foe,
Till our horses bathe their fetlocks
In the deep blue Ohio.

Our men are from the prairies,
That roll broad and proud and free,
From the high and craggy mountains
To the murmuring Mexic sea;
And their hearts are open as their plains,
Their thoughts as proudly brave
As the bold cliffs of the San Bernard,
Or the Gulf's resistless wave.
Then quick! into the saddle,
And shake the bridle free;
To-day with gallant WHARTON,
We cross the Tennessee.

'Tis joy to be a Ranger,
To fight for dear Southland,
'Tis joy to follow WHARTON,
With his gallant, trusty band;
'Tis joy to see brave HARRISON
Plunge like a meteor bright
Into the thickest of the fray,
And deal his deathly might.
Oh! who would not be a Ranger,
And follow WHARTON's cry,
To battle for their country,
And, if needs be, to die!

By the Colorado's waters,
On the Gulf's deep-murmuring shore,
On our soft green, peaceful prairies,
Are homes we may see no more;
But in those homes our gentle wives
And mothers with silvery hair,
Are loving us with tender hearts,
And shielding us with prayer.
So trusting in our country's God,
We draw our stout, good brand,
For those we love at home,
Our altars, and our land.

Up, up with the crimson battle flag!
Let the blue pennon fly!
Our steeds are tramping proudly—
They hear the battle cry.
The thundering bomb, the bugle's call,
Proclaim the foe is near;
We strike for God and native land,
And all we hold most dear.
Then spring into the saddle,
And shake the bridle free,
For WHARTON leads through fire and blood,
For home and victory.

In explanation of the lines which follow, it must be understood that Major-General Joseph Wheeler, the youngest general in the service, is of a diminutive person, and has been a soldier from his boyhood:—

THE WAR CHILD.

Awake! 'tis the call of the bugle, awake!
Ho, sergeant! go see to your steed;
Ere the morning light in the east shall break,
There'll be many a gallant deed.
Mount! mount, and away on the toilsome march!
Our spirits are gay and light;
Hurrah! hurrah! there is sport ahead,
For the War Child rides to-night.
Through the aisles of the forest dark and grand,
Where the shadows are ever grey,
Through the tangled paths of the wild woodland,
We will wind on our silent way;
And long ere the earliest stars go down,
We will light us a glorious lamp,
And will laugh as the hated foe shall wake
On the flames of his burning camp.
Ah! the Devil will chuckle with joy full soon,
For there's blood in the War Child's eye,
And Death will ride out in the dark of the moon,
To where the foe slumbering lie;
And to-morrow a shadow will be on their land,
And their people will wildly rave,
For the sleepers whose sleep will be broken to-night
By the clutch of the hungry grave.

In the front of the fight, in the face of the foe,
At the rear, 'midst the battle's thander,
'Tis there that the flash of our swords is seen,
As we rend their ranks asunder;
'Tis there that our little chief maketh his home,
And the enemy ever hath found us;
'Tis there, where the vault of the sky is our roof,
And our couches the fern around us.

Then hurrah for our chief, and hurrah for our cause!
Hurrah for our glorious banner!
It shall float ere the blossoming of the leaf,
O'er each vale of our land and savanna!
Hurrah for the spoils which our coming await!
For the next who is fated to fall!
Hurrah! boot and saddle! at last we are off!
Mount! mount! 'tis the bugler's call.

Tenderer strains than these sometimes steal upon our ear. Half a dozen effusions are before me, among which I am obliged to select, and I give you this, from a Mississippi mother:—

MY SOLDIER BOY.

I am dreaming, ever dreaming of a silver-sanded shore,
Where the blue waves softly murmur as they roll for evermore;
Where the sunbeams brightly glowing kiss the wavelets as they flow,
And the scented breeze is sighing where the orange flowers blow;
'Tis the music of its waters with their cadence low I hear
As it mingles with the sighing breeze and falls upon my ear;
And I seem to breathe the odours that are wafted from that shore,
Where my heart is fondly turning, fondly turning evermore.

When the sunset melts in glory, and the daylight softly dies,
Till the purple twilight deepens, and o'er all the splendour lies,
When nor voice nor sound is heard save the whispering of the breeze,
As evening chants her vespers low among the leafy trees,
As I watch the golden hues that fade and vanish from my sight,
Like the hopes and dreams of brighter years when lost in gloomy night,
More glorious is the sunset fancy pictures on that shore,
Where my heart is fondly turning, fondly turning evermore.

Do you ask why I am dreaming, ever dreaming of that shore?
Why the music of its waters seems to haunt me evermore?
There encamped are Southern heroes, beside that murmuring sea,
And a soldier-boy among them whose name is dear to me,
Who with that gallant hero band, in his country's hour of need,
When danger threatened, at her call, resolved to save or bleed;
And there, beside that murmuring sea, their white tents dot the shore,
Where my heart is fondly turning, fondly turning evermore.

When the tranquil earth is dreaming in the soft embrace of night,
And the quiet stars are keeping holy watch upon each height;
When angel eyes upon us seem their gentle watch to keep,
While some are wrapt in slumber light, and some are left to weep;
When by that camp stand sentinels the solemn midnight round,
And my soldier-boy is keeping watch or slumbering on the ground,
I am praying Heaven to guard from ill that silver-sanded shore
Where my heart is fondly turning, fondly turning evermore.

Having given one specimen of the poetry of our Southern women, I cannot resist the temptation to add another, of an earlier date; for the current of song has been flowing freely from the very commencement of our movement. It was published just after the secession of our State, under the signature of Laura Lorimer, which was already not unfamiliar, but no theme had yet presented itself to stir the songstress to strains of more than mediocre merit:—

ALABAMA.

Over vale and over mountain,
Pealing forth in triumph strong,
Comes a lofty swell of music—
ALABAMA'S greeting song.
In the new-born arch of glory,
Lo, she burns, the central star!
Never shame shall blight its grandeur,
Nor cloud its radiance mar.
Alabama! Alabama
Listen, Southrons, to the strain!
Alabama! Alabama!
Shout the rallying cry again!

As the Gulf-waves rushing shoreward,
Break in music-echoes grand,
Alabama sends this greeting
Proudly to her sister band;
This, her ultimatum, burning
In each heart of Southern flame;
Peace, if gained not by dishonour,
But far better war than shame!
Alabama! Alabama! &c.

Let the Northern Lion, couchant
On his bleak and frozen plain,
Lift his shaggy front in wonder,
And defiant shake his mane.
Sunward soars the mighty eagle;
And where blossom brighter bowers
Than amid the green savannas
Of this sunny land of ours.
Alabama! Alabama! &c.
And her sons will rise in legions;
Bleed and die at her behest,
Ere a hostile Northern footstep
Trample, conqueror, on her breast.
This the faith she plights her sisters,
In this glorious Southern band;
Side by side she will be with them,
Heart with heart, and hand with hand.
Alabama! Alabama! &c.

Has not the pledge been nobly redeemed?

I have just found another piece of the earlier days of the war, which I am loath to omit. It is certainly a sketch from reality.

THE BOY THAT ENLISTED TO-DAY.

I know the sun shines and the lilacs are blowing,
And Summer sends kisses by beautiful May;
Oh! to see all the treasures the Spring is bestowing,
And think—my boy Willy enlisted to-day.

It seems but a day since at twilight, low humming,
I rocked him to sleep with his cheek upon mine,
While Robby, the four-year old, watched for the coming
Of father, adown the street's indistinct line.

It is many a year since my Harry departed
To come back no more in twilight or dawn,
And Robby grew weary of watching, and started
Alone on the journey his father had gone.

It is many a year; and this afternoon, sitting
At Robby's old window, I heard the hand play,
And suddenly ceased, dreaming over my knitting,
To recollect Willy is twenty to-day;

And that standing beside him this soft May-day morning,
The sun making gold of his curled cigar-smoke,
I saw in his sweet eyes and lips a faint warning,
And choked down the tears when he eagerly spoke:—

"Dear mother, you know how these Northerners are crowding;
They would trample the rights of the South in the dust;
The boys are all fire, and they wish I were going—"
He stopped, but his eyes spoke,—"Oh, say if I must?"

I smiled on the boy, though my heart it seemed breaking;
My eyes filled with tears, so I turned them away,
And answered him: "Willy, 'tis well you are waking;
Go, act as your father would bid you to-day."

I sit in the window and see the flags flying,
And dreamily list to the roll of the drum;
And smother the pain in my heart that is lying,
And bid all the fears in my bosom be dumb.

I shall sit in the window when summer is lying,
Out o'er the fields, and the honey-bee's hum
Lulls the rose at the porch from the tremulous sighing,
And watch for the face of my darling to come.

And if he should fall, his young life he has given
For Freedom's sweet sake; and for me, I will pray
Once more with my Harry and Robby in heaven,
To meet the dear boy that enlisted to-day.

To relax the tension a little more, before returning to a loftier pitch, here is something, the print of which betrays its country origin. This, too, is one of the productions of the early days of the war. The "boys" have not forgotten the lesson:—

THE BAYONET'S THE THING.

It's got the blade, and it's got the butt,
It's got the point, indeed,
It's got a groove expressly cut
For letting out the "bleed."
Your bomb is bound to make a noise,
Your bullet's good to sing,
But when it comes to hurting, boys,
The bayonet's the thing.

You've read in your old story-books,
That have the tattered lids,
How Boney smashed the Mamelukes
Before the Pyramids.

The Pyramids stood bolt upright,
And stared with all their eyes,—
They hadn't seen so fine a sight
In forty centuries.

A mass of mad Saladins,—each
A whirlwind in a swing,
Were taught the French of what I teach,
"The bayonet's the thing."

I tell you, more than battle's crash,
Or any bolt that flies,
Your downright cur abhors the flash
Of independent eyes.

Yet close—tin-kettled for the race,
He's ready for the spring,
And if there's aught can reach the case,
The bayonet's the thing.

My boys, I know your sights are true,
As all your aims are right;
I know what visions haunt you through
The long and anxious night,
So, when the times of conflict come,
And find you in the ring,
In lack of something to send home,
The bayonet's the thing.

Many of the lays of the war—not to mention the camp-fire ballads—are by actors in the most stirring events; but I am not aware of any piece by a general officer, except the following, by Brigadier-General Jeff Thompson, so celebrated for his exploits in Missouri, and in the gunboat engagement on the Mississippi at Plumb Point. It is said to have been written by him impromptu at the request of a lady:—

HOME AGAIN!

My dear wife waits my coming,
My children lisp my name,
And kind friends bid me welcome
To my own home again.
My father's grave lies on the hill,
My boys sleep in the vale;
I love each rock and murmuring rill,
Each mountain, hill, and dale.
Home again!

I'll suffer hardships, toil, and pain,
For the good time sure to come;
I'll battle long that I may gain,
My freedom and my home.
I will return, though foes may stand
Disputing every rod;
My own dear home, my native land,
I'll win you yet, by —.
Home again!

A. J. Requier, Esq., of this city, has recently written a Pindaric Ode to Victory, which, though marred by turgid diction, has some fine passages. I omit it as well as Henry Timrod's "Charleston," because I suppose these pieces must long since have reached you through the Charleston Courier, the journals of that blockaded (!) port being, no doubt, regularly forwarded to you via Nassau. The following piece is noticeable as the production of a country bard, who has for twenty years, to my knowledge, been inflicting the most wearisome verses upon the public through the columns of the local papers. The present lines were written last summer. I add to them, as a finish to this collection, a recent poem on the same theme now revived, which I found, a few days since, in an inferior Louisiana paper.

VICKSBURG.

BY S. NEWTON BERRYHILL.

The thunders of the Northmen's wrath
Are all converged on thee,
Thou Mordecai in Haman's path,
That will not bow the knee.

The rest have fallen, thou alone
Dost guard our river deep,
Serenely sitting on thy throne
Upon the towering steep.

Before thee ride the iron boats
Which others quaked to see;
The red volcanoes in their throats,
No terrors have for thee.

For thou art there to offer up
Thyself on Freedom's shrine,
Willing to drink the fiery cup,
And perish, thou and thine.

Queen City of the Sunny South,
Baptized with blood and flame!
Thy praises are in every mouth,
And millions bless thy name.

Though hell-lit fires of Yankee hate
Consume each cot and hall,
Thy streets shall not be desolate,
Thou shalt not perish all.

We'll make thy sight a holy ground,
The Mecca of the free;
Each ruin charred, each shapeless mound
Shall Freedom's temple be.

And when the loud-mouthed war is dumb,
And Peace resumes her reign,
Thy daughters and thy sons shall come,
And build thy wall again.

More fair and lovely than before
Thy mansions shall arise;
Bright flowers shall bloom at every door
To glad thy children's eyes.

And they whose iron missiles beat
Thy dwellings down to-day,
Shall moor their vessels at thy feet,
And there their tribute pay.

VICKSBURG.

BY M. B. HAY.

Uplifted on a throne
Of the cold, white gleaming stone,
A city stands alone.

Uprising from the tide—
From the yellow, turbid tide,
Where the waters sullen glide,
Where the sunlight of the West
Streaks the Mississippi's breast
With its streams of liquid blood,
And the roaring, angry flood

Sweeps onward to the South—
To the fragrant, balmy South,
To its grove-encircled mouth,
The battlements there stand
That defend our glorious land—
Our own, our blood-dyed land.

She sits calm on a rock;
She awaits the coming shock
In conscious strength sublime,
Defying all but Time.

Mark ye her bulwarks well
That defy the fiendish shell;
And tell the foemen, tell,
Of the living rampart, strong
To withstand their bitter wrong,
The wall of living hearts—
Of noble, loving hearts
At whose name the tear-drop starts.

They have breathed sweet Freedom's air;
They are strong to will and dare;
They are strong to do and bear.
Though cannons' thunders roar,
Though myriads on her pour,
Through the smoke and din of war
She rises still serene;
And the Sun, with golden beam,
Fours molten glory o'er
Scarr'd front and trampled shore;
On the bloody, turbid tide
Where blacken'd corpses ride,
Where dismantled vessels rest
With white dead upon their breast—
On their gory, shatter'd breast.

She was shielded from their ire
With a wall of living fire
By the just and righteous God,
Who stretched out His rod
O'er the toeman in the field—
The blasted, crimson'd field—
And o'er her holds His shield.

He will battle with the right,
And protect her with His might,
He will triumph o'er the foe,
Lay her pride and beauty low.
Chant ye her requiem slow—
A requiem sad and slow;
For a nation shall expire
By Jehovah's holy ire,
While ascendeth higher, higher,
The anthem that will be
Of a new-born nation free.

When to the past's deep urn
Ye for her treasures turn,
Tell ye, in words that burn,
To your children at the knee,
As ye talk of Liberty,

How VICKSBURG rose in sight
Mid the fearful, stormy night—
That bloodstain'd, bitter night—
And withstood the foe in might.

Let her name be wreathed in flowers,
In your halls and festive bowers;—
Be struck from golden lyre,
Gleam 'mid the poet's fire;—
On our Southern breezes float
To the nations far remote,
With the jasmine's odours borne
On the pure, white wings of morn,
Of the blushing, gold-hair'd morn,
Till they weave her name in song
With the ancient cities strong,
That withstood the ancient wrong;
Till again gleams forth her name
In the flaming crown of Fame—
Of burning, blazing Fame.

I will conclude with the following comic verses, which are highly approved of in camp:—

RICHMOND A HARD ROAD TO TRAVEL.

Would you like to hear the song, I'm afraid it's rather long,
Of the famous "On to Richmond" double trouble;
Of the half-a-dozen slips and half-a-dozen trips,
And the very latest bursting of the bubble.

'Tis pretty long to sing, and like a round round ring,
'Tis a dreadful knotty puzzle to unravel,
Though all the papers swore, when we touched Virginia's shore,
That Richmond was a hard road to travel.

Then pull off your coat, and roll up your sleeve,
For Richmond is a hard road to travel;
Then pull off your coat, and roll up your sleeve,
For Richmond is a hard road to travel I believe.

First McDowell, bold and gay, set forth the shortest way,
By Manassas in the pleasant summer weather;
But he quickly ran, on a Stonewall foolish man,
And had a "rocky journey" altogether;

And he found it rather hard, to ride old Beauregard,
And Johnston proved a deuce of a bother,
And 'twas clear beyond a doubt, that he didn't like the route,
And a second time would have to try another.

Then pull off your coat and roll up your sleeve,
For Manassas is a hard road to travel;
Manassas gave us fits, and Bull Run made us grieve,
For Richmond is a hard road to travel I believe.

Next came the Woolly Horse,* with an overwhelming force,
To march down to Richmond by the valley, [showed]
But he couldn't find the road, and his "onward movements"
His campaigning was a mere shilly-shally.

Then Commissary Banks, with his motley foreign ranks,
Kicking up a noise a fuss and a flurry,
Lost the whole of his supplies, and with tears in his eyes,
From the Stonewall ran away in a hurry.

Then pull off your coat, and roll up your sleeve,
For the valley is a hard road to travel;
The valley wouldn't do, and we had all to leave,
For Richmond is a hard road to travel I believe.

Then the great Galena came, with her portholes all aflame,
And the Monitor, the famous naval wonder,
But the guns at Drury's Bluff, gave them speedily enough.
The louder sort of reg'lar Rebel thunder.

The Galena was astonished, and the Monitor admonished,
Our patent shot and shell not to mock at,
While the dreadful Nangateuck, by the hardest kind of luck,
Was knocked into an ugly cocked hat.

Then pull off your coat, and roll up your sleeve,
For James River was a hard road to travel;
The gunboats gave it up in terror and despair,
For Richmond is a hard road to travel, I declare.

Then McClellan followed soon, both with spade and balloon,
To try the Peninsular approaches,
But one and all agreed, that his best rate of speed
Was no faster than the slowest of "slow coaches."

Instead of easy ground, at Williamsburg he found
A Longstreet, indeed, and nothing shorter;
And it put him in the dumps, that spades wasn't trumps,
And the Hills he couldn't level "as he orter."

Then pull off your coat, and roll up your sleeve,
For Longstreet is a hard road to travel;
Lay down the shovel, and throw away the spade,
For Richmond is a hard road to travel, I'm afraid!

Then said Lincoln unto Pope, "You can make the trip, I hope."
"I will save the Universal Yankee Nation,
To make sure of no defeat, I'll leave no lines of retreat,
And issue a famous proclamation."

But that same dreaded Jackson, this fellow laid his whacks on,
And made him by compulsion a seceder, †
And Pope took a rapid flight from Manassas' second fight,
'Twas his very last appearance as a leader.

Then pull off your coat, and roll up your sleeve,
For Stonewall is a hard road to travel;
Pope tried his very best, but was evidently sold,
For Richmond is a hard road to travel, I am told!

Last of all the brave Burnside, with his pontoon bridges tried
A road no one had thought of before him,
With 200,000 men for the rebel slaughter-pen,
And the blessed Union flag a waving o'er him!

But he met a fire like hell, of canister and shell,
That mowed his men down with great slaughter,
'Twas a shocking sight to view that second Waterloo,
As the river ran with more blood than water.

Then pull off your coat, and roll up your sleeve,
For the Rappahannock is a hard road to travel;
Burnside got into a trap, which caused him much to grieve;
For Richmond is a hard road to travel, I believe.

We are very much perplexed to know who is the next,
To command the new Richmond Expedition,
For the Capital must blaze, and that in ninety days,
And Jeff and his men be sent to Perdition!

We'll take the cursed town, and then we'll burn it down,
And plunder, and hang up each rebel; [fight—]
And the Contraband was right, when he told us they would
"Oh! yes, Massa, they fight like the devil!"

Then pull off your coat, and roll up your sleeve,
For Richmond is a hard road to travel;
Then pull off your coat, and roll up your sleeve,
For Richmond is a hard road to travel, I believe!

FEDERAL OUTRAGES ON CONFEDERATE PRISONERS.

The subjoined letter from the Jackson Appeal exposes the inhuman treatment to which the Confederate prisoners captured at Arkansas Post were subjected after falling into the hands of the enemy, and whilst on their way up the Mississippi river:—

(To the Editors of the Appeal.)

On Steamer Nebraska, Mississippi River, January, 1863.

In justice to the brave men composing the Texas brigade under my command, which was comprised in General Churchill's division, captured at the Post of Arkansas, on the 11th inst., by General McClellan's grand Mississippi army and flotilla, I deem it my duty to make public the following facts relative to their treatment since the surrender.

According to the cartel of exchange agreed upon last July by the United States' and the Confederate States' Governments, through their commissioners, Generals Dix and Hill, we should have been exchanged or paroled within ten days. This cartel, however, was utterly disregarded, and we were placed upon steamboats and sent up the Mississippi river. My brigade was crowded upon the steamer Nebraska, in a manner entirely inconsistent with the health of the men, to say nothing of comfort or decency. It consists of the 10th Texas infantry, and the 15th, 17th, and 18th Texas dismounted cavalry. In addition, Captain Alf. Johnston's spy company and a few sailors and marines belonging to the Confederate gunboat Pontchartrain, were also placed on this boat, making between 1,800 and 2,000 prisoners; in addition, six companies of the 24th Iowa (Colonel Clarke) were placed on board as a guard, making altogether probably not less than from 2,300 to 2,500 persons on this boat.

* Fremont,

† Battle of Cedar Run,

Many of the prisoners were sick, and so much were they crowded that many could not get a place to spread their blankets without being exposed to rain and snow, or else laying them in filth too disgusting to mention, consequently they had to stand or sit, night and day. Under these circumstances, of course sickness increased rapidly. We were kept in this state from the night of January 12th until the 23rd, when the boat getting aground, a good many of the men were removed in order to lighten her.

All the above, however, sinks into absolute insignificance, when compared with the inhuman and malignant act of selecting for our guard a regiment infected with the small pox, and known to be so infected by the officers who ordered it.—Of the companies of the 84th Iowa on the Nebraska, one has now six cases of small-pox. How many cases there may be in the other companies I do not know, but I presume that altogether there are not less than twenty cases among the companies now composing our guard. These sick have been kept in the same cabin with many of the sick prisoners. From the very nature of things, crowded as we have been, it has been utterly impossible to preserve them from exposure to the contagion.

For the conception and execution of this fiendish act Major General Sherman, United States army, commanding a corps of McClellan's grand Vicksburg army, is responsible. I am informed on credible authority that before leaving the Post of Arkansas, it was represented by General Sherman, through the proper channel, that the 34th Iowa had small pox. General Steele, was asked to place it in quarters where the disease might be properly treated. This he not only refused to do, but ordered it to be sent as a guard to the Confederate prisoners.

Inhuman as such conduct is, still it is nothing more than might be expected from a wretch like General Sherman, who told Colonel R. R. Garland, also commanding a Texas brigade, and a prisoner of war, that he (Sherman) would, if he had the power, exterminate every man, woman, and child along the Mississippi river, in case another boat was fired into by the Confederate troops.

Such acts and sentiments as the above ought to hand down to future infamy the name of General Sherman, coupled with that of his brother brute, Butler the Beast.

JAMES DESHLER,
Colonel C. S. Artillery,
Commanding Texas Brigade.

OBITUARY.

In cælo quies.

"We know when moons shall wane,
When summer birds from far shall cross the sea,
When autumn's hues shall tinge the golden grape;
But who shall teach us when to look for thee?
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death!"

Died, near Mobile, April 5th, 1863, after a lingering illness, Major CLAES WESTFELD, aged thirty-four years.

We have become a nation of mourners. Death holds hideous high carnival in every quarter of our once happy country; chill shadows steal over every threshold, settling down at every hearthstone; and it would seem that even his all-grasping appetite would be satiated with the countless billowy graves which fret the quiet green surface of our broad and sunny land; that in this vast harvest of battle fields, where ripe ranks of stalwart men are mercilessly mown down, disease would be content to lay aside her scythe, and, for the present, fold her numbing bands. "The people are stricken; but, like a mute stern Niobe, the nation stands, waiting to give, if need be, the last of her sons.

When invasion threatened the proud old "Mother of Presidents," and Sister States sprang to the rescue, sending thither their bravest and best—their living crowns of chivalry—among the very first whose tramp shook the soil of Virginia marched Alabama's gallant Third. Mobile set many of her noblest jewels there; and in that glittering State diadem no name shone fairer than Lieutenant Westfeldt's, of the Washington Light Infantry.

A native of Sweden, he came in his youth to make his home in our Gulf City; and when the storm of war hung black and lowering along our northern borders,

"He did not wait a suppliant speech to spur his quick intent,
He did not wait to see our flag the symbol of lament," but bade farewell to fond friends, and sprang at the earliest clarion call to defend the liberties he had enjoyed; to make his manly breast a shield for the land of his adoption. After remaining many months in Norfolk with his regiment, he was transferred to the western frontier, endured all the hardships of that memorable campaign to which the bloody seal of Perryville was set, and recently his family and friends were gratified by his promotion to the rank of Major.

Unfortunately, the exposure to inclemencies of war, then, necessarily incident to camp life, gradually impaired his health, and some weeks since a severe illness snatched him from the midst of his duties and consigned him to the tender, loving care of friendly hands. A favourite wherever known, his genial polished manners, finely cultivated intellect, warm, generous, noble heart, and habitual magnanimity, endeared him peculiarly to all who came within the circle of his influence; but a few days ago, surrounded by those he loved, patient through prolonged suffering, voicing no complaint, resigned and firm in Christian faith and hope,

"Sustained and soothed by an unflinching trust,
Like one that draws the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams," he passed serenely from the stormy chequered shores of Time to the still, fair fields of Eternity; to the pearly gates of the Everlasting City of God. Taken away in the glorious prime of manhood, his death has fallen stunningly on warmly-attached friends, and especially upon the devoted young wife, who mourns over the aching void in the darkened home, whence her crown of joy has been borne. Desolation grim and gaunt sits now where happiness was so long enthroned; and as the clinging tendrils of affection are ruthlessly torn bleeding from their idol, the crushed spirit wails,

"O Death in Life! the days that are no more!"

For sorrow such as hers, human sympathy is inadequate; an earthly anchor has drifted away, another link is added to the chain which binds her heart to that heavenly home whither her treasure has been transplanted; but through the infinite mercy of our God, Time bears blessed healing on its wings for stricken human souls.

"We'll know the de profundis
Of her smitten spirit's moan,
When she cast her groan of sorrow
Down before the veiled throne.

Veiled in clouds, thick-robed in thunder,
Seemingly for judgment set;
Might she not discern the mercy
Throbbing past the curtain yet?"

The setting of earthly hopes is like that of the sun, leaving coldness and night behind; but after a time the star of memory rises, burns undimmed through all the mists and clouds and fogs of vexed and sorrow-laden time, and among the hallowed names of the departed none will be shined more tenderly in the hearts of comrades and devoted friends than that of Major Westfeldt, the brave soldier and noble-hearted man, whose untimely death has saddened all who knew him.

"Sleep soft, beloved! I sometimes say,
But have no time to charm away
Sad dreams that through the eyelids creep,
But never troubled dream again
Shall break the happy slumber when He giveth his beloved sleep."

A FRIEND.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

STONEWALL JACKSON died on the 9th inst., and was buried on the 12th. Loud, indeed, must have been the voice of lamentation in the Confederate States. How dearly he was loved, we may judge from the profound sorrow with which Europe heard of his death. If we mourn for him, what must be the mourning of his compatriots? Whilst he lived he was the pride of his country, and when he died all the people of the South paid sorrowful homage to his memory. His marvellous success, his unostentatious heroism, his zealous discharge of duty, and his unfeigned piety have endeared him to all those who can appreciate genius and virtue. We have in General Lee's order of the 11th, evidence of the universal regret:—

"With deep grief the Commanding General announces to the army the death of Lieut.-General Jackson, who expired on the 9th, at 3.15 p.m. The daring skill and energy of this great and good soldier, by a decree of an all-wise Providence, are now lost to us. But while we mourn his death we feel that his spirit lives, and will inspire the whole army with his indomitable courage and unshaken confidence in God as our hope and strength.

"Let his name be a watchword for his corps, who have followed him to victory on so many fields. Let officers and soldiers imitate his invincible determination to do everything in the defence of our beloved country. (Signed) "R. E. LEE."

Still more touching is the private letter written by General Lee to General Jackson, when he learnt that he was wounded. "I cannot express my regret at the occurrence. If I could have directed events I should have chosen, for the good of the country, to have been disabled in your stead. I congratulate you upon the victory, which is due to your skill and energy." For an instant the strong man, the commander, who is never unduly elated by victory, and never depressed by difficulty and danger, forgot his fortitude in an outburst of passionate regret, because his comrade was wounded. What must he have felt when he heard that his gallant friend was no more?

But the inexpressible sorrow evoked by the death of this noble son of the South is not a selfish sorrow as the partisans of the North suggest. If Stonewall Jackson had lived, he would, indeed, have rendered his country priceless services, but in one sense it seems to us his work was done. Clouds and darkness rest upon the future, and we know not how long it may be before the South enjoys the blessings of peace, or what further sacrifices she may have to make for liberty, and in defence of life and home; but the crisis has long since passed away. Stonewall Jackson could see the promised land into which he was not destined to enter. He did his part in fashioning Confederate valour to resist Northern aggression. When at the outset the Northern foe came unawares, he was foremost in the gap to drive him back, and his last earthly thought was for his country, and the sacred cause for which he was dying. We are told that his dying request was that General Ewell might be assigned the command of his corps. The good he did lives after him; the lessons he taught will not be forgotten. In the South there is no lack of brave gentlemen worthy to lead patriotic soldiers against the invader, and the immortal memory of Stonewall Jackson will nerve every Southern arm to fresh efforts. It has been said that the blood of martyrs is the seed of the Church, and assuredly it is not less true that the patriot soldier does not offer up his life in vain. In the long, long roll of illustrious dead the name of Stonewall Jackson will be conspicuous. His deeds will be the inspiring theme of Southern song, and will form a glorious episode in the history of the Great War of Independence.

We have elsewhere commented on the life and death of Stonewall Jackson, and we have also placed on record the graceful tribute of the English press to his memory. Never was any man more feared by the enemies of his country—and those excepted, never was any man more universally venerated and respected both at home and abroad. Stonewall Jackson was scarcely more loved in the Confederate States than he was in Europe. We beg in this place to acknowledge the numerous communications with which we have been favoured. One correspondent tenders a subscription towards the erection of a monument to Stonewall Jackson, and others in various ways testify their respect and sorrow. Such expressions of earnest sympathy, coming as they do from all classes, are not only honourable to the memory of the brave Christian warrior, but they reflect the highest honour upon England. Indeed, the feeling manifested in this country at the sad event, a feeling deeper and more universal than has ever been elicited by the death of a stranger, testifies to the strength and earnestness of British sympathies for the Confederate cause, and forms an enduring tie between two nations whom political imbecility has in vain sought to alienate.

On the 30th of April General Hooker issued an order in which he said, "It is with heartfelt satisfaction the Commanding General announces to the army that the operations of the last three days have determined that our enemy must either ingloriously fly, or come out from behind his defences, and give us battle on our own ground, where certain destruction awaits him." General Hooker also announced that the "rebel" army had become the legitimate property of the Army of the Potomac.

On the 2nd of May there was a battle. Hooker, who had been at so much pains to outflank his enemy, was himself outflanked. His right wing, furiously attacked, gave way, fled in disorder, and that night the Federal lines had to be contracted. On the 3rd of May the Confederates did not "ingloriously fly," but again gave the invading army battle. A bloody conflict ensued. After conflict the Federals were forced back towards the Rappahannock; and that night the Confederate occupied the ground that had been held by the Federals in the morning.

We may here give General Lee's official despatch to President Davis, in which he notifies the battles of Saturday and Sunday, and their results:—

Milford, May 3.

Yesterday General Jackson penetrated to the rear of the enemy, and drove him from all his positions from the Wilderness, to within one mile of Chancellorsville.

He was engaged at the same time in front by two of Longstreet's divisions.

Many prisoners were taken, and the enemy's loss in killed and wounded is large.

This morning the battle was renewed.

He was dislodged from all his positions around Chancellorsville, and driven back towards the Rappahannock, over which he is now retreating.

We have again to thank Almighty God for a great victory.

I regret to say that General Paxton was killed; General Jackson severely, and Generals Heth and A. P. Hill slightly wounded.

R. E. LEE, General Commanding.

On Monday the 4th of May there was a short action, or rather a skirmish, which resulted in General Hooker's forces retreating behind their entrenched lines.

And now for a moment let us look to the other operations of Hooker's forces. The Federal commander had divided his army into four parts. A small body remained at Falmouth; a corps of cavalry, about 3,000 strong, under General Stoneman, was despatched to cut off the railway communication that was to bring reinforcements to General Lee; a third part, under General Sedgwick, was to cross the Rappahannock, near Fredericksburg, occupy the city and heights of Fredericksburg, and to join the main army; the fourth part, which was the bulk of the Federal army, was with Hooker. To outflank an enemy is a manoeuvre that all commanders essay if they have a fair opportunity, and the object of it is that the enemy's forces may be cut in two by a flank attack. Hooker, not contented with outflanking, desired also to surround his enemy, and so he placed himself in the situation of a general successfully outflanked—that is, the Confederates were between two divisions of his army; the reserve at Falmouth was too small and distant for a reinforcement, and the cavalry under Stoneman could render no assistance in the battles that ensued. The move was left to General Lee. He could turn either on Hooker's or Sedgwick's division. He first dealt with the main body, and so defeated it as to increase the distance between it and Sedgwick's division, and to render any mutual support impossible, no matter what the emergency. In pursuance of this plan, the Federals under Sedgwick were allowed to occupy part of the heights of Fredericksburg. The rest has been already set forth in our columns. On Monday the 4th of May, the reinforcements brought up to General Lee were sent against Sedgwick's division, and after some hours' fighting it had to retreat across the Rappahannock, with a loss of not less than 6,000 men.

Stoneman's expedition succeeded in destroying a large quantity of Confederate stores and damaging the railroads at several points. It was conducted with spirit and intelligence, and merits the commendations that have been bestowed upon it by the Northern journals. But it did not achieve the object for which it was planned. It did not isolate General Lee, for he received his reinforcements and supplies as regularly and as rapidly as though Stoneman's expedition had not been undertaken. Ultimately General Stoneman retreated to Falmouth, with a loss of only fifty men.

Thus Hooker's plans had been completely frustrated. He had fallen into the net he had laid for his enemy. He was surrounded, and his communications were threatened. Sedgwick's division that was to have joined him, had been disastrously beaten and driven across the Rappahannock. Stoneman's cavalry had not prevented General Lee being reinforced. The Confederates had not fled "ingloriously." They had fought, but instead of the "certain destruction" with which they had been threatened, they defeated the main body of the Federals under General Hooker, in two successive and sanguinary battles. Hooker bowed to necessity. He could not go on to Richmond, but he could save his decimated and exhausted army. His position was critical. Retreat is always depressing to an army, and doubly so to an invading army. No one can blame Hooker for endeavouring to reassure his troops and simultaneously impress upon them the necessity of the retrogressive movement. He hit upon an excellent device. He reported that the river was rising so rapidly as to endanger the pontoon bridges—the bridges have not been injured, and therefore we now understand, as must the Northern soldiers, that this was a mere excuse. It answered, however, for the emergency.

At 10 o'clock, on the night of Tuesday, the 5th of May, General Hooker was in full retreat. The bridges were covered with pine branches to deaden the sound of the passage, and every possible precaution was taken to conceal it from the enemy. The tents, some of the baggage, and a part of the artillery and stores, were abandoned. Certain it is the wounded were left behind, surrounded by the unburied dead; but Hooker does not think the circumstance worthy of comment. It is a trait of civilized, nay, even of savage warfare, to be anxious about the sepulture of the dead, but assuming that Hooker is superior to any human weakness about the burial of his slain, and that he philosophically thinks they may as well rot on the ground as under the ground, what shall we say to the abandonment of the wounded? Hooker relies upon the generosity of the Confederates, who, in the hospital, make in kindly attention no distinction between friend and foe. Did Hooker not reflect that his Government had done what it could to cripple the medical resources of the South, by making medicines contraband of war? Did he not reflect that though once in hospital the wounded Yankee fared as well as the wounded Confederate, that the Confederate sufferers are first received and seen to; and that, therefore, a terrible while must elapse before the wounded Federals could be cared for? Perhaps he did so reflect but of what avail was his regret? He had heard the screams of his wounded soldiers, who had been burnt to death in the woods, and he could give them no assistance. Now, he must forsake the rest of his wounded, for his speedy retreat was urgent. And so he left them to their fate, and stole back by night to his head-quarters at Falmouth.

Here we would, if we could, conclude our comments upon this sanguinary campaign, by stating that General Lee, on the 7th inst., published an address to his army, in which he compliments the officers and men upon their heroic conduct, and reminds them "that they are more especially bound to return thanks to the Almighty as the only Giver of victory." But we have before us the statement of the Federal Government and the address of General Hooker, and we cannot pass them without a protest. Defeat can never dishonour the Federal cause as do these documents.

A correspondent of the New York Herald, writing from Falmouth, on May 6, sums up the result of the campaign. He says, "As the case stands, the facts resolve themselves into three propositions and three conclusions:—1st, We started to find the enemy, and we found him. 2nd, We started to whip the enemy, and we did not whip him. 3rd, We started to remain away, and we have come back again." This is the testimony of a friendly witness—the facts are really much stronger. Hooker was in command because he had derided his predecessors, and made the Government believe that he was the man to take Richmond. After months of preparation—during which the Northern public were impatient for him to redeem his promise—he crossed the Rappahannock. The arrogance of Pope was humility itself compared to the pretension and assurance of Hooker. He publicly declared that the Confederate army had only one of two alternatives—to flee ingloriously, or to fight with a certainty of destruction; and he further announced that the "rebel" army was the legitimate property of the Army of the Potomac. In less than a week he was again at Falmouth, after being disastrously defeated, losing from 25,000 to 30,000 men in killed, wounded, and missing; leaving behind him his dead unburied, and forsaking his wounded. Was ever discomfiture more complete? Yet on the 8th May, Mr. Stanton, the Federal Secretary of War, informed the Governor of Pennsylvania that "The principal operations of General Hooker failed, but there has been no serious disaster to the organization and efficiency of the army;" and that the army had "recrossed the river without any loss in the movement." Not a word is said about the defeat, not a word about the killed and wounded. Still more astounding is the address of General Hooker. He congratulates his army on its achievements. He says, "They withdrew to the south bank of the Rappahannock before delivering a great battle;" and that, "On our withdrawal not a rebel dared to follow us. The events of the last week may well cause the heart of every officer and soldier of the army to swell with pride. We have added new laurels to our former renown." Is not this madness? Does he think his soldiers forget the rout of the 2nd May, the hard-fought battle and the retreat of the 3rd May? Does he think his soldiers forget the flight by night, and the bridges strewn with pine branches? Does he expect to restore the dead to those who mourn for them, to heal the wounded and to make the crippled whole, by calling defeat victory? Well may the New York World say that no one can read the orders of General Lee and of General Hooker without grief, pain, and shame at the boastful and false assertions of the Federal commander; and that the Lincoln Government, "who are ruling and ruining us, cannot save our honour."

In order to divert the public mind it was reported in Washington and New York that General Keyes had occupied West Point on York River, and had captured Richmond! Having enjoyed the excitement of the imaginary capture of the Confederate capital for about twenty-four hours the bubble burst so far as Richmond was concerned, though at the despatch of the last mail (per Europa) it was maintained that the Federals were in possession of West Point. If so, with the force that the Confederates now have at command we should think that General Keyes must be in some jeopardy.

The accounts of the late losses in the battles in Virginia differ considerably. The New York Herald of May 9th estimates the loss of the Confederates at from 15,000 to 20,000 killed and wounded. If this was the loss of the victors and the smaller army, what must have been the loss of the Federal army, which was larger and was defeated? The same journal estimates the Federal loss in killed, wounded, and missing in the battles of the 2nd and 3rd of May at 12,000; and it is not denied that the loss in Sedgwick's corps was 6,000. The Richmond Enquirer considers Chancellorsville the most desperate battle of the war, and estimates the Confederate loss at 8,000 to 10,000, and the Federal loss at 25,000 to 30,000, including 8,000 prisoners.

The Federals say they captured eight pieces of artillery from the Confederates. On the other hand, the Southern journals state that the Confederates captured thirty pieces of artillery.

We have conflicting reports of the movements of General Grant. There is a rumour of a battle fought on the 4th, about ten miles from Jackson, in which both sides claim the victory. It was, however, admitted that, in consequence of reinforcements being sent from Charleston and Mobile General Grant fell back. We are, therefore, not disposed to place much reliance on the rumour that Jackson has since then been surrounded by the Federals.

The attack of gunboats on Haines' Bluff was repulsed. We are told that the Choctaw was much damaged, her turrets being penetrated; and that the Federal loss was eighty killed and wounded. This number of casualties implies a serious disaster, if we may judge from the losses sustained in other gunboat engagements.

The raid of Colonel Straight's Federal cavalry in Alabama and Georgia has come to an end. General Bragg captured the entire force—1600—at Rome, Georgia.

It is reported that General Van Dorn has been shot in a private altercation.

Mr. Vallandigham has been tried before a military commission at Cincinnati. His protest against the legality of the Court was not heeded; and his demand that Fernando Wood should be compelled to produce a letter that affected his case, was refused. An attempt to procure Mr. Vallandigham's release by habeas corpus was unsuccessful. We need hardly add that he was found guilty. The Court sentenced him to two years' imprisonment, at a penal settlement on the coast of Florida; but it is understood that Mr. Lincoln changed the sentence into an order to send him beyond the Federal lines. This is a curious punishment. If Mr. Vallandigham is a Southerner he cannot but be glad to find himself amongst friends; if he is a Unionist his sentence is unjust.

The treatment of Mr. Vallandigham has caused some excitement in Corinth, and the military were ordered to be in readiness to repress an outbreak. The New York Democratic Association has denounced the arrest, and the New York Herald has condemned it as a gross wrong to individual rights.

The editor of a Democratic paper, published at Plymouth, Indiana, was arrested by a detachment of soldiers, by order of General Haskall. The offender, it seems, had called General Haskall a "donkey." Democratic editors should remember that it is not every Dogberry who likes to be written down an ass. Truth, when spoken about Mr. Lincoln's pet generals is undoubtedly a libel.

It is said that in the case of the prize vessel Springbok, "the Judge of the New York District Court has decided that where a vessel is suspected of carrying contraband goods, even if she had not attempted to run the blockade, her cargo may be examined to determine whether it is contraband or not." If this be a fair summary of the judgment it is totally opposed to the law of nations. It is the unlawful destination of a vessel that is essential to condemnation. No cargo is contraband unless the unlawful destination of the vessel is proved.

The trial of the Peterhoff has been postponed. To make the proceedings as slow and tedious as possible is part of the system.

The British steamer Cherokee has been captured off Charleston, and the schooner Wanderer off Wilmington. The prize steamer Nicholas has been condemned.

The price of gold in New York on May 14, was 49½ premium.

THE LATEST NEWS.

The following are telegraphic summaries of the news brought by the Norwegian:—

NEW YORK, May 15.

General Hooker has had long interviews with the President at Washington. Nothing is positively known of the nature of the conference. Many rumours are afloat of his superseding or resignation. It is generally believed, however, that he will be retained in command, and conduct another advance.

It is stated that some members of the Cabinet have urged the recall of General McClellan, but have been overruled by the opposition of the leading Republican and Abolitionist members of Congress.

Yesterday General Sickles was closeted two hours with the President, but neither the purport nor the result of the consultation is known.

News from the South-West continues conflicting and incoherent.

There are rumours that a great battle was fought at Vicksburg, in which the land and naval forces were engaged, but no result is stated; also that Port Hudson was being evacuated. Neither of these rumours is traceable to any trustworthy source.

The latest authentic intelligence from Grant's army states that it was encamped near Big Black River, eighteen miles from Grand Gulf.

The New York Evening Post states that differences of opinion between high officials as to the conduct of General Hooker and the affair of the Peterhoff prevail to such an extent as to interrupt the previous harmony of the Cabinet.

The truth of the reported engagement with General Grant, near Jackson, is doubted. At last accounts General Grant was encamped near Black River, eighteen miles from Grand Gulf, awaiting reinforcements.

The Government has forbidden the exportation of horses, mules, or war material.

General McClellan denies that he has tendered his resignation.

The correspondent of the New York World says:—

"There are indications that General Lee's army is taking up a line of defence that shortens its rear and affords protection to both railroads running out of Richmond. The army is believed to be swinging round its left on the Gordonsville and Richmond road to Frederick's-hall Station, with its right resting on the Fredericksburg and Richmond railroad at Bowling Green, thus protecting the upper end of the angle formed by those two roads at Hanover Junction, sixteen miles from Richmond. The position thus assumed places the Confederate army half-way between Fredericksburg and Richmond, and gives them two railroads from Richmond to their army. The two bridges of any length on the Richmond and Fredericksburg railroad are across the North Anna and South Anna rivers, which form the Pamunkey River several miles south of the railroad. It was supposed General Stoneman had destroyed these bridges, but this was not the case. A bridge across the Pamunkey was burnt, but that was crossed by no railway. The bridges across the Anna rivers, on account of some mismanagement, were not destroyed. Trains are now running upon the Richmond and Fredericksburg railroad with such facility as to bring the Richmond papers to Fredericksburg on the day of their publication."

General Thomas Francis Meagher has resigned the command of the Irish Brigade. He says that the brigade no longer exists. The assault against Fredericksburg in December last reduced the brigade to something less than a minimum regiment of infantry. General Meagher states that he has in vain memorialized the War Department that the brigade should be temporarily relieved from duty, to give it time and opportunity to renew itself. That memorial was never acknowledged. General Meagher accompanied his brigade through the late operations at Chancellorsville, though he felt it was to a sacrifice rather than to a victory that he was going. His command, which was a mere handful, did its duty. To remain in command of the remnant of the brigade would be a public deception, in which the military reputation of a brave race would be involved. General Meagher, however, places his services at the disposal of the Government in any capacity they may appoint.

It is reported from Newbern that the Confederates refuse to receive disloyal citizens sent out of the Federal lines by General Porter, unless they can give security for their ability to take care of themselves.

Southern papers say that the siege of Suffolk, which was kept up three or four weeks, enabled General Longstreet to gather up, besides large quantities of corn, over 1,500,000 lb. of bacon.

A captain of a New York regiment has been dismissed the Federal service for violating the sovereignty of a friendly State in arresting a deserter and bringing him away from within the boundaries of Canada. The deserter has also been discharged from the Federal service.

It is reported that the sailing line-of-battle ships of the Federal navy are to be examined, and those which are found sound converted into steamers.

The New York Tribune asserts that General Sigel has returned from Washington, having been refused a command by General Halleck.

A call has been issued by the Fernando Wood adherents of the Mozart Democracy for a peace meeting to be held at New York in June. The efforts of the Administration to restore union by force of arms are declared to have failed. Union cannot be restored by mere brute force, therefore the vigorous prosecution of peace is now urgent, and while no national dismemberment or terms not justified by every principle of honour will be submitted to, yet the parties issuing the call will go very far in a spirit of conciliation and concession to restore the Union as it was, under the Constitution as it is.

Great preparations are making for a meeting of all the Loyal Leagues in New York State, to be held at Utica on the 27th inst. This meeting will urge the vigorous prosecution of the war, and arrangements have been made that all the soldiers returned from the war shall be present.

The Supreme Court of the district of Columbia has decided that no slave can be arrested and returned to a disloyal master.

The property of the late Mayor of Washington, Charles Hallach, has been confiscated, and it is stated that the property of Mr. Corcoran, formerly a Washington banker, and now in France, will meet the same fate.

The Mayor and Common Council of Washington have arrived at New York, and presented a series of complimentary resolutions to General McClellan.

The United States Circuit Court at Cincinnati has not yet decided whether it will grant Vallandigham an application for a writ of habeas corpus.

General Burnside has sent a protest to the court, saying it is his duty to stop licence and intemperate discussions, which tend to weaken the authority of the Government and the army. These are his reasons for arresting Vallandigham, and for issuing order No. 38. In enforcing this order he says he can be unanimously sustained by the people or opposed by factious bad men. In the former event quietness will prevail, in the latter event the responsibility of retribution will attach to the men who resist the authority and to the neighbourhoods that allow it.

Mr. Vallandigham's counsel, in urging a grant of habeas corpus, declared General Burnside's protest to be a political speech from a gentleman carrying a sword and wearing epaulettes. He denied the authority of a military commission, and declared it to be the duty of the Court to grant the writ.

EVENING.

General Hooker has visited Washington, and returned to the Rappahannock, where all is reported quiet.

Mosby's Confederate cavalry have made a foraging expedition in the Shenandoah Valley, and are moving towards Leesburg.

All is quiet at Suffolk and West Point. General Grant is endeavouring to cut the railroad between Jackson and Vicksburg. The reports of that General having fought any battles is untrue.

An unreliable rumour has reached Murfreesborough, that a battle had been fought between the land and naval forces at Vicksburg, the result of which was unknown.

Port Hudson is said to be garrisoned by a very small force, with heavy artillery.

It is reported from Southern sources that General Kirby Smith, with 10,000 men, had defeated General Banks and driven him from Washington, Louisiana. This report is considered doubtful.

Ten Federal negro regiments have been organised at Memphis, and ten more are in course of organization.

The Richmond papers state that the Federals were unusually active at Charleston.

General Jackson's funeral took place at Richmond on the 12th, with great demonstrations of sorrow and respect. The Richmond Whig says that since the death of Washington no similar event has so profoundly and sorrowfully impressed the people of Virginia as General Jackson's death.

The leading Republican journals unite with the Democratic organs in condemning General Burnside's action in Mr. Vallandigham's case.

Several steamers have arrived at Charleston from Nassau, and several due at Charleston are missing. The steamers Basha and Pet arrived at Wilmington on the 13th inst.

May 16, Evening.

The impression gains ground that General Lee intends to make an early offensive movement. Rumours are current that General Beauregard has arrived in Richmond with reinforcements.

The Federals are throwing up intrenchments across West Point from the Mattaponi to the Pamunkey rivers.

Early important changes in the Federal Cabinet and among the army commanders are expected.

The Court of Cincinnati has refused to issue a writ of habeas corpus in Mr. Vallandigham's case.

Money abundant. Gold 50 per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

THERE is again a diminution in the pauperism of the manufacturing districts; the returns of the Poor Law Board for last week showing about 4,800 fewer than the week before in receipt of parochial relief. At the same time we hear but of a few mills re-opened, and we do not learn that any progress has been made with the Government scheme for the employment of the able-bodied operatives out of work. Emigration is still the favourite resource of the people. And no doubt, for those who have the opportunity to go, the spirit to encounter the painful toil of making for themselves a home in a new country, and the strength of body and dexterity of hand which will there be required, emigration is the best possible course. In the British Colonies no thrifty and industrious man, who is fit for colonial life, need fear that he will permanently remain poor; comfort and competence are there within the reach of all classes; and though a colonial existence, at the best, involves many drawbacks and privations, even to the working-men of this country—and especially to the better sort of working-men—there can be no doubt that it is, on the whole, preferable to any which they may reasonably hope to enjoy in England. But emigration can, at best, be only a limited resource, and can do little to affect the condition of the great mass who must be left at home. And the factory operatives—especially the spinners and weavers, who form the vast majority—are very ill-fitted for a colonial life. They are intelligent and quick-witted, it is true. But they are trained only to a single kind of indoor labour, requiring rather dexterity and close attention than bodily vigour or robust health; to proficiency in this single pursuit they have sacrificed everything besides; they will find nothing of this kind to do in a colony, and they will be less handy at colonial work than most classes of people in any rank. The men will be, at first, very bad shepherds, farm labourers, or squatters; the women will be exceedingly inapt at those household makeshifts which are essential to the comfort or tolerability of life in the bush. Even at home they are notoriously bad housewives; how will they fare in New South Wales, Upper Canada, or Natal? We fear that greater hardships and slower success than they expect await the emigrants; we are somewhat anxious for their fate, and very uneasy for the fortunes of a community which is thus wasting, by the policy of Government and the necessity of its condition, the very élite of its skilled labourers.

The Volunteers have had a little sham fight at Southend, on Whit Monday; five gunboats landing a force of Royal Marines to attack about 1,000 Volunteers posted in defence of the town. The attack and defence were carried on with skill and spirit. The only fault found by Colonel M'Murdo, who commanded the Volunteers, was that the skirmishers retired somewhat too hastily. We hardly think, however, that much need be said on this point, as it is precisely the fault which they are least likely to commit if—which may God forbid!—they should ever find themselves in front of a real enemy.

The Anti-Slavery Society has held its usual annual meeting, and congratulated itself and Providence on the approaching abolition of slavery in the Dutch West Indies, and on the recognition of Hayti and Liberia. We wonder that no one suggested that the quarrel between England and the slaveholding empire of Brazil, and the insurrection of the negroes in St. Vincent, were equally proper subjects for gratulation. Mr. C. Buxton expressed his satisfaction that Mr. Lincoln's proclamation had not led, as he expected, to servile war, incendiarism, and massacre, and drew from the forbearance of the Southern negroes under such provocation to revolt the inference that they were good, gentle, and wise enough to be trusted with liberty. A fairer inference would have been that they did not see that they had any cause of revolt; and that, finding themselves well off and well treated in servitude, they were hardly disposed to cut the throats of white women and children, for the gratification of men who murder negroes in the streets of their cities in the mere wantonness of their hatred for the race, and among whom the black man is treated as a slave—a humble dependent in equity, a valuable chattel in law—but as a noxious brute, to be exterminated if possible, and if not, to be treated with all possible contumely, and kept in the lowest abasement and misery. The forbearance of the slaves testifies either to the excellence of the system under which they live at the South, or to their utter distrust of the liberty offered to them by the North. But whatever the cause which frustrated the intent of the proclamation, there can be no doubt whatever as to the purpose with which it was issued. The hope of spreading ruin and massacre throughout the Confederate States was avowed by the abolitionists: they gloated over and gloried in the prospect; and their guilt is none the less because it pleased Heaven that the monstrous crime they contemplated should remain unconsummated.

Mr. Buxton and his elder brother both expressed a strong opinion that the result of the present war would be the emancipation of the slaves. We see no cause to entertain any such view. But we can hardly doubt that, when the South is clear of the Union, many of the worst features of the present system, regretted and countenanced by the leading upholders of that system as a whole, will be mitigated and corrected. Much harshness has been caused, and all reforms have been utterly prevented, during the last thirty years, by the frenzied rancour of Northern abolitionism. It is not while an enemy is thundering at the gate that any man betakes himself to set his house in order.

A monster meeting, at which 10,000 men are said to have been present, was held at Sheffield on Tuesday, in the open air, to consider the advisability of memorializing Government to interpose its good offices between the Northern and Southern States, with a view to a suspension of hostilities. This is, beyond all comparison, the most numerous and important meeting yet held in this country upon any question concerning the American War. The Mayor of Sheffield took the chair. A certain number of violent Abolitionists kept up a continued series of efforts to interrupt the proceedings, but without success. Mr. Roebuck addressed to the meeting a characteristic and most energetic speech in favour of the immediate recognition of the Confederate States, urging that they had made good their independence, had "conquered the North," and that the best portion of the Northern people would be thankful for our interposition. He pointed out that the condition of the slave in the South was a happier one than that of the free black man in the North, and that sudden Emancipation would not improve that condition. He urged that we should interpose in the interest of the slave himself. By assisting the North we might abolish slavery; but at the same time we should abolish the slaves. He avowed his sympathy with the South, and his profound disbelief in the change of Northern success. He remarked that though the mercantile and contractor classes of New York grew rich by the war, the agricultural classes of the Western States suffered by it—gave their blood and their property to sustain it—and therefore wished it at an end. He concluded by an earnest recommendation to the meeting to petition for the recognition of the Confederate States.

The Rev. J. P. Hopps moved, and Mr. Beal seconded, the following resolution:—

That in the opinion of this Meeting the Government of this country would act wisely, both for the interests of England and those of the world, were they immediately to enter into negotiations with the great Powers of Europe, for the purpose of obtaining the acknowledgment by them of the independence of the Confederate States of North America.

The Rev. J. Guttridge (Wesleyan Free Church) moved and Mr. Clegg seconded, the following amendment:—

That this Meeting records its high admiration of the honourable neutrality hitherto maintained by the Government in relation to the dreadful civil war now raging on the American Continent, and earnestly hopes that the same policy of non-intervention will be pursued in future.

Mr. Hopps's resolution was carried by an overwhelming majority.

So the Federalist party have been beaten with their own weapons, and on their own ground.

EUROPE.

The remarkable apathy with which the elections to the Chamber of Deputies were received was a long time unexplained. Nothing, perhaps, has contributed more to this result than the candidature of M. Thiers, and the opposition which the Government directs against his pretensions. It was thought at first that the Government would not oppose the illustrious historian, who has done so much to establish the culte of the Empire in the French heart, but the impression did not last long. The organs of the Ministry of the Interior at once commenced a vigorous assault upon M. Thiers and the coalition to which he had acceded, one of the most effective of these attacks being the quotation of a despatch from the Ministry of the Interior of 1848, signed by M. Jules Favre, and addressed to M. Emile Ollivier, both candidates with M. Thiers for Paris, in the opposition interest, to the effect that "the candidature of M. Thiers (in the Branches du Rhône) must be combated by all possible means, and the Government expects you will make the greatest efforts to defeat it." M. de Persigny himself has entered the field against M. Thiers, in a letter to the Prefect of the Seine, in which he declares that M. Thiers has associated himself with the enemies of the Empire, and seeks the re-establishment of a regime fatal to France. It is generally supposed that, despite these efforts of the Government, M. Thiers will be elected, and it is probable that the opposition, although it will generally be unsuccessful, will return to the new assembly most of the eminent men who have hitherto maintained towards the Empire the policy of abstention. Nearly all the celebrities of the Constitutional monarchy or the republic are included in the list of opposition candidates. The elections to take place on Sunday and Monday.

Madame de Lamartine is dead. Her distinguished husband has long been ill; he has had strength enough, however, to protest against an attempt made by M. Emile de Girardin, the editor of the Presse, to relieve him from his embarrassments by a public subscription.

A week after the French elections Belgium will have to elect a portion of the members of both houses of the Legislature. The struggle, as in former elections, is between the Liberals and the parti prêtre, and the fight is consequently sure to be a hard and bitter one. At present the Liberals have the majority, and they are using it to carry measures which, however excellent in themselves, irritate the Catholic clergy extremely.

The Journal de St. Petersburg publishes despatches from the Dutch, Danish, and Portuguese Governments upon the Polish question, with the replies of Prince Gortschakoff. Their contents are in no degree interesting. All the states of Europe, with the exception of Prussia and the minor German powers, of Belgium and Switzerland, whose guaranteed neutrality forbids interference in such a question, have now addressed the Russian Government upon behalf of Poland. Hitherto, they have taken very little by their motion, and we cannot expect more favourable results from the note which Earl Russell has just despatched to St. Petersburg. It is stated upon good authority that the noble Earl has actually made the demand for an armistice, the report of which we described last week as incredible. We need not repeat the judgment we then passed. The friendly intervention of England is at an end. Russia cannot grant the armistice, and Earl Russell cannot retrace his steps, and having demanded a recognition of Polish independence appeal to the benevolence of the Czar for administrative reforms. The English Government will have to abandon the Poles, or draw the sword for them. The rumours of a Congress acquire some consistency. Russia and Austria are both, it is stated, willing to take part in one upon condition that England and France make a preliminary declaration that they do not ask to disturb the possession of Poland. Another rumour, with some claims to credence, is that the French Government has combined the suggestions of England and Austria in one proposition, to which both Powers have given their assent. It has asked the Russian Government to grant the Poles administrative autonomy, a national representation, the adoption of Polish as the official language, a full amnesty, and at the same time to assent to an armistice—or rather to grant one, that the insurgents may be informed of the concessions offered them. The inducement to the Russian acceptance of such terms being, of course, the promise that if the insurgents refuse them, the three Powers will leave them to their fate.

Reports of sanguinary engagements are, this week, plentiful. As far as the telegrams enable us to judge, the Russians continue to have the best of the fighting. On the other hand, the insurgents are making desperate efforts to extend the area of the rebellion, and apparently with some success, although the statements of general risings in Volhynia, Podolia, Kiev, and the Ukraine, the authenticity of which we last week questioned, are not corroborated. There are, however, by the avowal of the Russians themselves, small bands of insurgents in all these Governments, and we may expect that so long as the Poles retain any hope of European intervention, there will be some guerilla warfare in every province of the Russian Empire in which there is a large Polish population. The National Government seems resolved to make a great effort. It has ordered a national rising for the 1st of June in Poland, Lithuania, and Russia; and an order from Colonel Taczanowski, the chief of the insurrection in the Palatinate of Kalisz, shows us how the insurrection is to be organised. There is to be a conscription, and severe penalties are threatened against all those who seek to avoid it. The truth is that the leaders of the insurrection have constant resort to terrorism; they know that the peasants are not at heart with them, and they make no scruple about the means of compelling them to lend their aid. When the history of this sad war comes to be told impartially, it will be found that the atrocities committed in it have not been all on one side. The Russians tell some horrible stories of the outrages committed by the insurgents, and the organs of the Poles admit that the insurgent leaders hang or shoot without any scruple all persons who lend the Russians any aid. They call Poles who side with Russia traitors and spies, and deal with them accordingly. The boldness with which the National Government acts, as it were, under the very eyes of the Russian generals, is astounding. It issues its decrees, replies to every proclamation of the Russians with another, threatens all persons who presume to treat the Russian as the established Government, and chiefly by threats of assassination has almost as much power in Warsaw as General Von Berg. The Russian Government, on its part, has published a decree dismissing some functionaries—how many does not appear—who have aided the disturbers of public order.

To the organized rising of the National Government, the Russian Government opposes an organized rising of a far more serious character. It is organizing the peasants into bands, and placing in their hands the preservation of order, that the military may be concentrated upon the rebel detachments. These preservers of "order" will make short work of the Polish gentlemen and their families; and if the war should last much longer, and this organization come into general working, there will be hardly a gentleman's house left standing in Poland or Lithuania.

The King of Prussia has intervened in the dispute between his ministers and the House of Deputies. On Thursday morning the House was startled by the appearance of Herr Von Bismarck, who rose to read a royal message—conjectured to be a prorogation or a dissolution—amidst the deepest silence. It was merely a declaration of the King that the House, in approving the conduct of its President, had violated the constitutional rights of the Ministry, and a recommendation to the House to terminate such a state of things, in order that its proper business might be continued. The Royal Message was referred to the committee on the address, which incorporated a reply in the draft it had already prepared. The address so amended was carried by a large majority—239 to 61 votes—the minority consisting, besides the dozen Fendalists of the old liberals, and a portion of the Catholics, who wished to confine the address to the particular question between the House and the Ministers, and to a general declaration that all understanding with them was impossible. The address adopted, after informing the King that he has been misinformed by the ministers as to the pretensions of the House and the President—for his Majesty's information, the stenographic report of the proceedings accompanied the address—proceeds to develop the grief of the House against the minister, dwells upon the dangerous situation of the country, which it contrasts with the bright hopes which the first years of the King's reign had called forth, roundly declares that the House has no means of coming to an understanding with the Ministry, declines all co-operation with its present policy; there being, it says, an abyss between the advisers of the Crown and the country, which can only be filled by a change of persons, and what is more, a change of system. The King refused to receive the députation appointed to present the address, which was therefore forwarded him through the Ministry. The reply was not long arriving. Count Eulenberg, the Minister of the Interior, appeared in the House on Wednesday morning and read it. Although no one expected a favourable reply, few could have anticipated so complete an identification by the King of the ministerial conduct with his own views. He tells the House that the address has cut away all hopes of conciliation, declares that its conduct with reference to foreign questions has grieved him, assures it that he will maintain undiminished all the rights of the crown against its attempts to curtail them, and concludes by the announcement that the policy of his ministers has his full approbation. Count Eulenberg informed the House at the same time, that the session would be closed in the afternoon.

The breach between the King and the country is now an open one.

The Herrenhaus, on the other hand, has pronounced its unanimous approbation of the Ministerial policy—only one member dissented. Apròpos of some petitions from places in Posen, in which the vigorous policy of the Government was highly lauded, and of other petitions protesting against the payment of compensation to the members of the Lower House; the peers—as for want of a better name we will call them—praised enthusiastically the demeanour of the Government, and made the most violent attacks upon the Lower House, which they accused of disloyalty, want of patriotism, and many other bad qualities. One suggestion of the reporter upon the petitions relative to the Diet money was not without point. He said the Deputies contend that all expenditure made without the sanction of a budget law is illegal. Why does not the Government take them at their word and cease to pay them their three thalers a-day?

The King is not well, although there is no ground for some alarming rumours to which a French paper has given currency.

A new ministry has been formed at Athens, of which Rufos, one of the members of the Provisional Government, is the President. It does not seem to have much better chances of life than that to which it has succeeded. The National Assembly, for some not very intelligible reason, has voted an address of thanks to the three protecting Powers. Nothing is yet decided about the throne. The tendency of the reports is, however, favourable to the acceptance of Prince William.

The session of the Italian Chamber closed on Thursday, and a new session was opened on Monday by the King in person. His Majesty congratulated the Chamber upon their labours. "You have secured," he said, "the rights of the nation to its complete unity, and I shall know how to maintain them in their integrity." A tribute to Cavour, a reference to the marriage of his daughter, and to the commercial treaties negotiated and in negotiation, warm praise of the army and navy brought him to a reference, couched in very obscure terms, to the state of the Neapolitan provinces, the only importance of which consists in the announcement that France is ready to concur in arrangements for the suppression of the brigandage. The labours of the session are defined thus: "Your most urgent task is to consolidate the laws of the kingdom, at the same time favouring the development of all local forces. Above all, I recommend to your solicitude some arrangements relative to the reorganization of the finances. Europe has responded to our appeal with confidence in the new order of things. It is for us a debt of honour to reply to this confidence by our promptitude to enforce upon ourselves the necessary sacrifices." The King closed with an expression of confidence in the future of Italy. The House of Deputies has elected as its President Signor Cassenis, the Ministerial candidate. He received 166 votes, whilst Signor Zecchio, the late President, and Crispi, one of the leaders of the party of action, received respectively only 48 and 29 votes.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, May 27.

Our last report closed on a depressed market, with Fair Dhollerah at 17½d.

On Thursday, in absence of any American news, the vague rumours of further Federal disasters, and the proclamation of an armistice continued to exercise a depressing influence, and the sales only reached 4,000 bales at the low rates of the previous day.

The arrival of the Glasgow on Friday served, however, to change completely the current of feeling in our market, though only bringing one day later than the previous steamer, and no fresh items of importance; the fact that no mention was made of armistice, and that no further disaster had occurred to Hooker's army, was sufficient to renew the confidence here, and an active business at once sprang, which resulted in sales of 10,000 bales, at ½d. advance on the depressed sales of the previous two days.

On Saturday, the City of Manchester's news was to hand, reporting the retreat of Hooker's army in safety across the Rappahannock; our market continued strong, with sales of 10,000 bales at rather high prices.

On Monday a good business was again done at full prices; sales 8,000 bales.

Yesterday and to-day there has been less doing, owing principally to the prevalence of the Whitsuntide holidays; the business reaching 4,000 and 5,000 bales; the Manchester market yesterday exhibited a very healthy tone and prices there continue to harden. We quote Middling Orleans 23½d., Fair Sawginned Dharwar 19½d., Fair Dhollerah and Omrawattie 18½d.

The tenor of the American news is still averse to an early settlement of this unhappy war. The Northern people, in spite of their last terrible reverse, appear to be still sanguine of the final result, and obtain some encouragement from their trivial successes in the West; it is not probable that their armies will be so much weakened by the return of the two years and nine months men that they will be unable to keep the field; but should they be so reduced by this cause as to necessitate the contraction of their lines there is little doubt that they will submit to a general conscription rather than desist from the struggle and agree to a final separation, the terms alone which the South will accept. Meanwhile the consumption of cotton continues to increase, and stocks on hand and afloat are getting gradually into smaller compass. The stock in Liverpool on the 22nd of May, of all sorts, was 340,000 bales, and afloat from Bombay to arrive until the end of August 170,000 bales; calling the import from all other quarters 160,000 bales in the same period, which is considerably more than last year, we will have up to the 31st of August a supply of 670,000 bales; and allowing for a weekly export of 10,000 bales, and a consumption of 28,000 bales, which is generally considered its present rate, we shall have on the 1st of September a stock of only 150,000 bales; and this does not adequately represent the scarcity that will occur in the average qualities of Surat cotton, which, at the present rate of outgoings will by that time be quite exhausted.

The position of our market just now is, in many respects, similar to that which it occupied at this time last year, when the great rise in prices commenced. Then our stocks were composed of cotton of heavier weight, and 50,000 bales greater than that at present held, while the amount afloat was about the same; then the consumption of cotton was estimated at rather less than its present rate, while stocks of goods both in Manchester and on the continent were heavy, and now they are well nigh exhausted. Yet on 1st of September last year our stock was reduced to 150,000 bales (erroneously placed at 60,000), and prices in the three months advanced 1s. for East India cotton, and 1s. 4d. for long staples. Then, however, the rise commenced upon 8d. for Fair Dhollerah; now its value is 18d., and so far the trade has not supported any advance upon that figure. Still, the conviction to which these premises point is that, unless some good prospect is held out of a supply from the Southern States, a large advance on present prices will be established during the next few months.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, May 26.

The anxious feeling prevailing amongst all classes of buyers and sellers, at the date of our last report, continued until Friday morning, when we received the details of the fighting in the neighbourhood of the Rappahannock per the City of Glasgow. This news imparted a firm tone to our yarn and cloth market generally, buyer and seller being impressed with the idea that the war will continue for an indefinite period.

Friday's market was comparatively a lively one; home-trade yarns were bought freely at the extreme prices of the Friday previous.

Export yarns partook of the buoyant feeling, and considerable quantities were moved off, also at extreme rates.

Cloths of all kinds were in good demand, but the advance in price required by holders tended to check business to some extent.

To-day we have had a very firm market for goods of all kinds, at the rates of Friday last. Yarns have been in improved demand, and more especially so those suitable for the home trade. Nos. 32s to 50s twist and pincops have realised an advance of fully 3d. per lb. on Friday's rates; whilst for Bolton, Nos. 60s, 70s, and 80s twists and wefts, the advance is rather more than that.

Altogether our market may be considered to be in a very healthy condition.

THE PARIS PRESS.

PARIS, May 26.

For the last fortnight the mind of France, at least of scribbling France, has been so occupied by the one subject of the elections, which come off on Sunday next, that it has had room for nothing else. There is a sudden revival of political life which, though not menacing in its present phase to the Government, shows at least what fires still smoulder beneath the ruins on which the present system is built. Now is the Saturnalia of type, the political sabbath, when all opinions muzzled and chained up during six years enjoy a short space of unrestricted freedom. The walls from one end of France to another are covered with many coloured placards—the immaculate white is the exclusive privilege of Government—and the flâneur may read in large type all the high-sounding words which newspapers must abstain from printing, and men are chary of uttering in ordinary times. The acrimony of temper which these display serves to show what might be expected from the partisans of worn-out isms, if they again had the Chambers for their tilting-ground. The armes courtoises of the tourney would soon be exchanged for deadlier weapons. I must confess that in presence of the indiscreet zeal not only of inferior functionaries, but of the Minister himself, I began to sympathize as far as a stranger who has no interest of friendship or enmity can do so, with the Opposition. The love of fair play, innate in most men, prompted good wishes for candidates who labour under so many difficulties. But the language of many of the election addresses has proved a correction to this feeling, and one is glad to think that on this occasion the number of Opposition members likely to be returned is insignificant, and that another period of six years of comparative calm in the Legislative body may be looked for, so far as anything can be predicted of the future. There cannot be a doubt that fifty noisy orators in the Chamber would do more to endanger the tranquillity of France, and to throw her back in the march of improvement, than fifty years of positive misgovernment. It is unfortunate that the means which are thought necessary to obviate this risk are so often opposed to all one's instincts. It is still more unfortunate that in the interest of Europe, as well as of France, one must wish the Administration success. The temper of the country is such, that its representatives, to be safe depositaries of power, must be utterly insignificant as men. Thus, while the Government press is busily employed in decrying the Liberal—not Liberal, the word is proscribed—the un-patronized candidates, it does not waste a line of praise on those put forward by the Administration; and if the Opposition papers squabble among themselves about the respective merits of the candidates each favours, all are disdainfully silent on the subject of the patronized candidates. The whole importance of these last is borrowed from the position made for them, while a little battle is fought over the personality of the others, all men of mark in former days.

The position of most of the Paris newspapers was marked out beforehand, and the Government knew what to expect from, and how to deal with each. But there is one enfant terrible, the France, of whose devotion to the Empire there can be no doubt, which obstinately follows a line of its own, and by doing so makes itself very obnoxious. The director, M. de la Guéronnière, was the author of pamphlets which more than once foreshadowed the course of Imperial politics. In the provinces and even in Paris, he is still by many thought to be a second string to the Emperor's bow. Hence a passage of arms commenced by a warning for "pretending to interpret the secret thoughts of the Government," and followed by a vehement reply. The France puts forward a theory that all parties should be represented in the Chamber, and that candidates of all colours should be accepted, inasmuch as by taking the Oath of Allegiance the adherents of old dynasties acknowledge that their hopes are extinct, and like good patriots offer their services to the Government of the nation's choice. Perhaps William IV., when with sailor-like frankness or brutality, he advised a losing partner at whist to apply to Prince Talleyrand for change of a sovereign, showed a better appreciation of the value of French political oaths than does M. de la Guéronnière. But such an answer would hardly be fitting if addressed to him by a ministerial organ. The Nation came to the minister's rescue in a violent article, which accused M. de la Guéronnière of personal enmity to M. de Persigny, and there the matter rests. The only result has been the revival of an old rumour that the former was the destined successor of the latter statesman so soon as the elections are over. Of M. de Persigny's retirement there seems little doubt. He will have done his work.

The Patrie contained, a few nights ago, a short extract from a letter from a merchant at Havre, the truth of whose remarks struck me the more that I have not seen anything of the sort elsewhere. The writer says, that the best evidence of the utter hopelessness of the war waged against the Confederate States by the North, is to be found in the fluctuations of the price of cotton. When a Northern victory is reported, the price of cotton rises, because any check to the Confederate arms will only serve to prolong the contest, and defer the day when full supplies can be obtained. On the contrary, when the report of victory is changed into the certainty of Northern defeat, the price of cotton goes down, for the termination of the struggle is by so much the nearer. The Patrie, as is well known, though no longer a semi-official paper, is still what may be called a semi-official paper; what it says, if not directly inspired by the Government, generally answers to its wishes. In this respect, it may be worth referring to an article in last Saturday's number on the compte rendu of the last six sessions, published by the five Opposition deputies. One of the motions they take credit for was, a declaration in favour of the Northern States of the late Union, which was at once negatived, and this is one of the points upon which the Patrie attacks them as having gone against the conscience and the feelings of the country. I believe that in this, the Patrie gives utterance to the opinion, not of the Government only, but of the great majority of Frenchmen. The other papers are silent on the subject of the American War, the only exception being the Tems, which, of course, while acknowledging the new defeat of the Northerners, harps upon the question of slavery. Its remarks are already stereotyped generalities, but its concluding paragraph contains much truth, when it says that all interest in the struggle is lost, not for the reasons it gives—antipathy to the institutions of the South, and disgust at the incompetence of the North, but because the length of the struggle has taken off the edge of freshness which induced curiosity, and because events more nearly affecting France now claim attention.

Of course I refer to Poland, a country whose privilege it is to enlist at once the sympathies of Pius IX. and Lord Shaftesbury, of Garibaldi, Count Montalembert, and Lord Palmerston. Every line not devoted to home politics is, in the greater part of the Paris papers, given to Poland. Surely if universal suffrage could be applied to the affairs of nations, we should soon see a revival of Poland, though in which of its three forms, Republic, Monarchy, or Anarchy, a wise man would not venture to predict. The extension of the movement to the provinces long since annexed to Russia, which have, in fact, belonged to her longer than Alsace to France, longer than the English rule has been effectively established in Ireland, might well make Governments pause before they commit themselves on the question. The leaders of the insurrection have shown, at least, a knowledge of the world in declining General Garibaldi's proffered aid; but the movement assumes every day a more revolutionary complexion, and the very aid which England seems inclined to give it, will only confirm this opinion here and in Germany. Of course Lord Russell's proposal for an amnesty of a year between rebels and their sovereign was welcomed here, not in this sense, but as a tacit acknowledgment of the wisdom of the Emperor's similar proposal in regard to America. Its rejection by Russia is certain, but its admission by France is a rebuke to England, and it may serve the Emperor's policy admirably if, as has been suspected, he seeks an opportunity, aided by England, to create a nation with French sympathies in the North, and at the same time to secure as an indemnity the long-coveted frontier of the Rhine. Such a policy might be suspected—it may even have existed, so long as the object to be attained was confined to the moderate dimensions of the kingdom of Poland created by the treaties of 1815, but now that Volhynia and the Ukraine are included in the patriotic aspirations of the Poles, it is doubtful whether the Emperor Napoleon be the man to countenance such a change in the map of Europe.

The news of General Jackson's death, which arrived here yesterday, has created among the English in Paris a sensation, which those who give us little credit for sentiment will hardly understand. Personally unknown to any, the Lord Falkland of this civil war seems to be mourned for as an intimate friend by all. The sketches we have read of his mingled daring and devotion appealed to the imaginations of men in whose veins the cavalier and the puritan blood is mingled.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL JACKSON.

THE London press unites in a well-deserved tribute to the memory of the valiant soldier, the Christian patriot, whose loss is the heaviest of the great sacrifices of precious lives with which the Confederate victory on the Rappahannock has been purchased. It is a melancholy consolation to record, as a part of the history of this disastrous war, these testimonies to the worth of one who is at once its hero and its martyr. In a leading article, the Morning Post of the 26th inst. says:—

The recent victory of the Confederates at Chancellorsville has been purchased at a very heavy price. "Stonewall" Jackson is now reckoned amongst the slain. He was shot in both arms, one of which was afterwards amputated below the shoulder, and under the effects of that operation he subsequently sank. If ever the loss of a general on the field of battle could be considered as irreparable, it might be so regarded in the present instance. On one occasion during the summer campaign in Virginia of last year, President Lincoln when speaking of the Confederate army, estimated it, numerical strength at 30,000 men more than it was known to possess. When his attention was directed to the apparent discrepancy, he said, "I consider 'Stonewall' Jackson alone to be equal to a force of 30,000 men." This is the testimony of an opponent, and, although overstrained, Mr. Lincoln only paid a just tribute to one of the boldest, most skilful, and most successful of the Southern generals. For upwards of eighteen months has Jackson been engaged in an uninterrupted series of military operations, sometimes in conjunction with the generalissimo of the Confederate troops, sometimes independent of all control, and yet on no single occasion was he ever compelled to turn his back upon the foe. Scarcely more than a twelvemonth since, and whilst still unknown to fame, he gained for himself the sobriquet which, by many, is believed to have been his baptismal name. In one of the many skirmishes which characterised the short and desultory campaign in Virginia which preceded the arrival of McClellan's army at the Yorktown peninsula, Jackson took possession of an orchard, one side of which was protected by a stone wall. The Federals having attempted to dislodge him, he called out to his troops to remain as firm as the wall under cover of which they were fighting. The Confederates held their ground; and as soldiers are quick to give to their leaders as well as to their comrades distinctive names, their chief was from that day forth known as "Stonewall" Jackson.

General Jackson, judging from the accounts we have received, would seem to have been, in some degree, an impersonation of one of those Puritan warriors who, with the sword in one hand and the Bible in the other, waged such deadly and relentless war against the unfortunate Charles I., or, as they termed him, Charles Stuart. We say in some degree, because happily Jackson wanted that fanaticism which, in the days of the Protector, was mistaken for religion. Jackson, like the Puritans, was austere and devout, but whilst his religion taught him humility and dependance upon his Creator, it did not lead him to confound the true nature of the objects for which both he and his followers were striving, and to suppose that because their ends were noble, that, therefore, they were the champions of God. If he was occasionally a preacher in the camp, he was also a skilful and gallant general in the field; and it is not surprising that those who had so frequently followed him to victory should have considered him as specially favoured by Providence, and have regarded him with feelings akin to devotion. As a soldier, he will hold probably the foremost place in the history of the great American civil war. His name is indelibly associated with the most brilliant achievements of the Confederate armies, for to those achievements by his genius and his courage, he more than any one else specially contributed. Strategic ability is the most valuable qualification a general can possess, but it is not always that consummate military tacticians command the confidence of their followers, or ensure the success of the operations they conduct. It was, however, the rare good fortune of General Jackson to lead men who, whilst their courage was exalted in an extraordinary degree by the conviction that nothing could be worse than defeat, were inspired with an unshaken faith in the genius and ability of their general. To follow Jackson they knew was to march to certain victory; and, if it was necessary that success should be purchased at the cost of many lives, that reflection did not dispirit them, for the cause in which they were fighting stripped death of all its terrors.

Jackson, unlike many others, more especially in the Northern armies, holding the same rank, was a soldier from his youth, and, if we mistake not, received his education at the military college at West Point. Immediately after the secession of the Southern States, and when their newly-elected President was busily engaged in organising their first army, Jackson placed his sword at his service, and was shortly afterwards intrusted with an important command. It was not, however, until the commencement of the summer campaign of 1862 that opportunities presented themselves for the exercise of his strategic powers. From that time to the present his history is that of the war in Virginia. His first and most important successes were achieved in the Shenandoah Valley, when by a series of rapid marches he managed to surprise General Banks at Winches, and compelled him to cross the Potomac into Maryland. Frequent were the raids which he conducted within the Federal lines, and so rapid were his movements that to his perplexed opponents he might well seem ubiquitous. When the lines at Yorktown were abandoned, and McClellan's army had taken up its position within a few miles of Richmond, General Jackson returned from his expedition into Northern Virginia, and joined his forces to those which, under the command of Lee, covered the approaches to the Confederate capital. Soon after was fought the celebrated battle of the Chickahominy, when Jackson led the Confederate columns against the right wing of the Federal army, doubled it completely back upon its centre, cut off the line of communication between the Federals and their depots and transports on the York River, forced McClellan to change his base of operations, and ultimately to re-embark with his entire army and return to Washington. A few weeks later was fought the campaign in Northern Virginia, in which the Federal army, under the leadership of Pope, sustained so many and such disastrous defeats. The series of movements by which the Confederates drove their opponents back from their lines on the Rappahannock, and subsequently all but completely annihilated them at Bull Run, will always command the admiration of military commentators on the history of the American war. To the success which attended those operations, General Jackson's skill and intrepidity contributed in no small degree. Though subordinate to Lee, he at this time, as on many others, held an independent command, and by forced marches succeeded in placing the Federal army between his division and the main body of the Confederate forces. When Pope, with the remnant of his army, sought shelter under the fortifications of Washington, the Confederate Generals, flushed with success, crossed the Potomac and invaded Maryland. Lee, with the main body of the army, pushed forward as far as the borders of Pennsylvania, whilst Jackson proceeded to invest the Federal position at Harper's Ferry. Here he gained one of the most brilliant, if not most substantial, of the many successes which have shed such lustre on his name. Harper's Ferry was held by a Federal garrison, and was strongly fortified. Having taken by assault the heights on the north side of the Potomac, which commanded the Federal position; he bombarded it until the garrison were fain to surrender, and, having occupied the place and paroled no less than eleven thousand prisoners of war, he rejoined General Lee in time to take part in the great battle of Antietam Creek, which closed the brief Maryland campaign. Since then he took part in the only two engagements which have been fought in Virginia. At the first battle of Fredericksburg, his division, in common with others, defended the entrenchments which had been constructed in the rear of that city, and in the recent battle of Chancellorsville to him was intrusted (as it was a year since at the Chickahominy) the duty of conducting the attack against the Federal lines. How successful he was the present position of the Northern army abundantly testifies. His last battle has, however, been fought. He has fallen in the arms of victory, but not of decisive victory, for to his brothers in arms he has left much still to do. If anything can embitter the feelings of regret occasioned by his loss in the minds of his fellow-soldiers, it will be the impression which has gained ground that his death was accidental. It is said that whilst leading his men he was unintentionally struck by two bullets fired from his own division. In the confusion of battle such accidents will occur. The Confederates have been fortunate in their generals, and we are justified in hoping that his place will be fittingly filled. But though his place may be occupied by as good a general (although that is doubtful) his successor can never expect to secure the same popularity or to emulate his deeds. Of "Stonewall" Jackson it may, with truth, be said that he died too soon for his country, but not too soon for his fame.

(From the Times, May 26.)

The Confederate laurels won on the field of Chancellorsville must be twined with the cypress. Probably no disaster of the war will have carried such grief to Southern hearts as the death of General Jackson, who has succumbed to the wounds received in the great battle of the 3rd of May. Even on this side of the ocean the gallant soldier's fate will everywhere be heard of with pity and sympathy. Not only as a brave man fighting for his country's independence, but as one of the most consummate generals that this century has produced, "Stonewall" Jackson will carry with him to his early grave the regrets of all who can admire greatness and genius. From the earliest days of the war he has been conspicuous for the most remarkable military qualities. That mixture of daring and judgment, which is the mark of "heaven-born" generals, distinguished him beyond any man of his time. Although the young Confederacy has been illustrated by a number of eminent soldiers, yet the applause and devotion of his countrymen, confirmed by the judgment of European nations, have given the first place to General Jackson. The military feats he accomplished moved the minds of people with an astonishment which it is only given to the highest genius to produce. The blows he struck at the enemy were as terrible and decisive as those of Bonaparte himself. The march by which he surprised the army of Pope last year, would be enough in itself to give him a high place in military history. But perhaps the crowning glory of his life was the great battle in which he fell. When the Federal commander, by crossing the river twelve miles above his camp, and pressing on, as he thought, to the rear of the Confederates, had placed them between two bodies of his army, he was so confident of success as to boast that the enemy was the property of the Army of the Potomac. It was reserved to Jackson by a swift and secret march to lay upon his right wing, crush it, and, by an attack unsurpassed in fierceness and pertinacity, to drive his very superior forces back into a position from which he could not extricate himself, except by flight across the river. In the battle of Sunday Jackson received two wounds, one in the left arm, the other in the right hand. Amputation of the arm was necessary, and the Southern hero sank under the effects of it. He was only thirty-eight years old, and was known before the war as a man of simple and noble character, and of strong religious faith.

(From the Morning Herald, May 27.)

No end can be more honourable to any man than to die at his duty. To die of his wounds in battle, with the shout of victory still ringing in his ears, is a glory reserved to the soldier. The death of Stonewall Jackson is in itself a blow to the Confederates that is almost to be compared to a lost battle. The sympathy that is felt in Europe for their grief at this immeasurable loss will add to the warmth of popular feeling for the men who have striven so long in a just cause and acquitted themselves so well. A young man when he died, he had made himself great by his achievements, and obtained a reputation unparalleled of its kind among modern military chieftains. Like other distinguished persons who from time to time in various countries seem suddenly to be raised up for some special purpose, he appears to have done his work so efficiently that his death in one sense cannot be considered premature. A soldier of remarkable ability, he fought with the advantage of an earnest faith in his cause; and, controlled in all he did by a strong religious feeling, he fought the better still for believing that God was on his side. He may be called an enthusiast, but his enthusiasm was of a noble kind. He was animated by the spirit which rendered the soldiers of the Commonwealth irresistible in fight—which carried Havelock through incredible dangers to the gates of Lucknow in triumph. The Christian and patriot soldier achieved the last and greatest of his successes in dying for his country. He perished doubly a martyr, and in his last breath attested the righteousness of the cause which he sealed with his blood.

(From the Standard, May 27.)

The mail from America, amidst a heap of confused details of minor interest, has brought us news of an event which will be received in Europe with the deepest sorrow and sympathy—sorrow for a loss which must be felt as a loss to mankind—sympathy for the distress of a people which has too much need of such men as he who is gone. Like the Theban at Mantinea, like Moore at Corunna, like Nelson at Trafalgar, the noble Jackson died in the arms of victory. The triumphant shouts of his army, victorious on their Virginian soil against the insolent host which had marched in the confidence of victory, were ringing in his ears when he fell with his double death wound, and was carried from the field. It was he who executed that brilliant flank attack which decided the issue of that battle on the 3rd of May. Another battle had been won by the dauntless energy of the single-hearted and pious soldier, who fought, as he believed, for a just and holy cause, and trusted in the God of battles more than in armies. This young man, for he was only thirty-eight years old, came first into notice at the commencement of this war of independence, and seems to have been destined by Providence as the leader in such a struggle. Singled out early by the sagacious Lee as a man who could acquire himself well in high command, his achievements during these short two years have won for him the admiration of Europe, and earned for him a niche in the Temple of Fame beside the great captains of the Old World. He has been compared to Cromwell; and if we accept the genuineness of the religious professions of the great Puritan, we may to some extent allow the parallel. But the chivalrous American never pushed his religion to fanaticism, never stained by cruel deeds his spotless banner. He carried on war as a Christian gentleman should. If it seem strange to us that a general on the eve of battle should pray in front of his troops, we must call to mind that men of this earnest type have ever been successful as warriors. The Normans before Hastings passed the night in confession and fasting, the Saxons in drinking and ill-timed revelry. The soldiers of the Commonwealth sang hymns as they advanced to the charge, the Cavaliers answered with ribald jests, and made invocations only to their lady-loves. A man fights better who is impelled by the righteousness of his cause, and is firmly persuaded that he is fighting with the sword of the Lord as well as that of Gideon. Our own Havelock was just such a general as Jackson, and strikingly resembled him in the religious element of his character. Havelock was never beaten, never mind what odds were brought against him. His marches and attacks were characterised by a daring in conception, a skill in execution, which ensured their success where a superficial observer might have predicted failure. Just so was it with "Stonewall" Jackson. His brilliant campaign in the Valley of the Shenandoah, where he was immensely outnumbered by the armies of Banks and Fremont, but played with those generals as with children—now eluding them, now falling upon and crushing them, and at last driving back the invaders over the Potomac—first established his reputation as a commander. Since that he has been present in every one of the great Virginian battles. His brilliant march through a defile of the Alleghenies to the rear of Pope's army completed the confusion and led to the disgraceful rout of that unfortunate general. It was one of those famous flank marches which confounded McClellan in the peninsula, and drove him to withdraw his army from an untenable position. Jackson was the presiding genius of the daring raid into Maryland, one chief object of which was to procure supplies from that fertile country for the Confederate army. At Sharpsburg, when Lee stood at bay, it was Jackson who held undauntedly the left of the position, and hurled back from the assault the persevering troops of Sumner. It was in this battle that the Northern generals expected to decide the war, and make an end of the Southern army. They were grievously disappointed. Not only did the Confederates hold their ground manfully on that eventful day, but the position of their army between that of McClellan and the Potomac enabled General Lee to detach Jackson to Harper's Ferry, where he captured all the stores and 15,000 prisoners. Jackson was back again in time to be present on the field of Sharpsburg. Perhaps the greatest of all his achievements was the last. The admirable manner in which he carried out the orders of General Lee and marched round the right wing of Hooker's army so as to attack it in the rear, decided by itself the battle of Chancellorsville. The dead hero in his two years of warfare fought and won as many battles as grey-headed warriors who have been born and bred in the camp, and passed their lives among contending armies. Those two years have rendered him immortal, and won for him that applause of mankind for which he cared but little, that loving gratitude of his country for which, if he had had them, he would have laid down a hundred lives.

At first sight it might seem that the loss to his country must be irreparable. Is there any man to take his place, any soldier who for courage and skill will compete for his laurels? General Lee has lost his right arm, his friend and helper, the man who in doubtful circumstances, has over and over again been the salvation of his army and his cause, the soldier whom his men idolized and would go through fire and water to follow, the general whose very name was a tower of strength. If the Federals have lost another battle, what is that in comparison with this gain to them in the hapless death of this terrible and dauntless foe—slain not indeed by them, but from a stray shot from his own troops in the woods? Perhaps they are exulting in it now, for the men must be capable of anything who talk of their pride at their late achievements in Virginia, and after accumulated defeat and shame have the impudence to boast of their "laurels." We turn with disgust from this last of the miserable compositions purporting to be "general orders," in which their commander congratulates the Army of the Potomac. No wonder that men in New York, reading beside it the modest and truthful statement of General Lee, refer to it with "grief and pain." While Federal commanders indulge in lies and bragadochio which are enough to humble to the dust the unfortunate people for whom they fight and lose battles, we turn with relief to the bier of the patriot soldier who had no taste for general orders, and who scorned to be untrue. Living or dead, "Stonewall" Jackson is worth a thousand Hookers. In life, the most terrible antagonist of Federal armies; in death, he leaves a name at which Northern men turn pale. A Sultan who died on the eve of battle directed that his dead body should be carried before his army on the morrow, and the terror of his very clay won the victory for his troops. The cause of the Confederates has been sanctified by the death of a patriot. The Confederate soldiers will be doubly armed for the strife when they think that he is with them in the spirit who led them so well. Whenever their army has seemed in danger, whenever the Federal host has been suffered to press sorely upon them, the question has been hitherto—Where is "Stonewall" Jackson? It will not be asked again. But from his ashes, as from the dragon's teeth of Cadmus, will spring up armed men to emulate his deeds; men who will hurl back with fury from the soil, which he has watered with his blood, the boasters and imbeciles who have threatened the independence of the Southern land.

(From the Daily Telegraph, May 26.)

No event, of whatever magnitude, could overshadow the interest in such an incident as the death of Stonewall Jackson. It is, indeed, one of the thousand penalties which America is paying for her suicidal war; but among the multitude it is perhaps the one which will be felt most intensely, even on both sides of the Rappahannock, for we cannot suppose the Federalists to be so deadened to natural manly feeling as not to share the grief which will be universally felt. The manner of the death had in it something peculiarly sad and touching; the noble soldier did not fall by the hands of his antagonists, but by a mistake of his own men, not one of whom would have hesitated to lay down his life instead; nor did he die in the field, but in the hospital, after a severe operation. Jackson's character is such as to endear him to adversaries as well as to friends; he was, as everybody knows, a man of earnest and strict piety, yet unaffected and considerate towards others. Millions in the loyal States will hold that he was fighting in the worse cause; yet throughout the whole of those vast territories who would for an instant imagine that Jackson fought for any but that cause which he believed to be the best? His devotion to everything which he deemed good, his constant thought for others before himself, and his chivalrous generosity, made him not only the model of a cavalier, but the model also of a patriot and a friend; and it was no doubt from the combination of these personal qualities that he was able to command his followers as if they were but so many replications of their captain, with the same purpose, the same unflinching devotion, the same indomitable courage. Perhaps no individual throughout the round of the late Union would be followed to the grave by such deep regret; and yet, again, he is but another among the host of the great and good gone before him, whose departure reminds us of the lesson learned in the deepest recesses of our own hearts, that those whom we most love and most miss are those whose memory bears the greatest consolation for their loss.

GENERAL HOOKER'S CONGRATULATORY ORDER.

Head-quarters, Army of the Potomac, May 6.

(General Order, No. 49.)

The Major-General Commanding tenders to this army his congratulations on its achievements of the last seven days. If it has not accomplished all that was expected, the reasons are well known to the army. It is sufficient to say they were of a character not to be foreseen or prevented by human sagacity or resources.

In withdrawing from the south bank of the Rappahannock, before delivering a general battle to our adversaries, the army has given renewed evidence of its confidence in itself and its fidelity to the principles it represents.

By fighting at a disadvantage we would have been recreant to our trust, to ourselves, to our cause, and to our country. Profoundly loyal and conscious of its strength, the army of the Potomac will give or decline battle whenever its interests or honour may command it.

By the celerity and secrecy of our movements our advance and passage of the river were undisputed, and on our withdrawal not a rebel dared to follow us. The events of the last week may well cause the heart of every officer and soldier of the army to swell with pride.

We have added new laurels to our former renown. We have made long marches, crossed rivers, surprised the enemy in his entrenchments; and whenever we have fought we have inflicted heavier blows than those we have received.

We have taken from the enemy 5000 prisoners and 15 colours, captured 7 pieces of artillery, and placed hors de combat 18,000 of our foe's chosen troops.

We have destroyed his depôts filled with vast amounts of stores, damaged his communications, captured prisoners within the fortifications of his capital, and filled his country with fear and consternation.

We have no other regret than that caused by the loss of our brave companions; and in this we are consoled by the conviction that they have fallen in the holiest cause ever submitted to the arbitration of battle.

By command of Major-General HOOKER,

S. WILLIAMS, Assistant Adjutant-General.

THE International Dog Show opened on Monday at the Agricultural Hall, Islington. The 1700 dogs exhibited are divided into 66 classes, 40 being devoted to the sporting, and 26 to dogs not used in field sports. The Prince of Wales exhibits three couple of harriers, which are described as neat and clever, and have been highly commended by the judges; but his Royal Highness has not obtained a prize. Upwards of £1000 is devoted to prizes, which are paid in money or plate, at the option of the successful competitors. The toy dogs are an attractive feature; some of the tiny creatures are ticketed at fabulous prices—a Skye terrier, named Garry, being valued at £1500 by the owner. These ladies' pets are evidently not intended for sale.

IN 1770, the first Lord Clive, being desirous of establishing a pension fund for the relief of European officers and soldiers in the service of the East India Company, advanced five lacs of rupees, at the same time inducing the Nabob of Bengal to advance three lacs of rupees. By the transference of the Government from the Company to the Crown, and the consequent amalgamation of the two Services, there are no longer any persons to pension under this bequest. The representative of Lord Clive claims the fund. His claim was not allowed by the Courts of Law, but on appeal to the House of Lords, it was admitted. Their Lordships decided that all annuities or pensions granted before 1858, must continue to be paid, but those being satisfied, the property belongs to the heirs of Lord Clive. The amount is about £60,000.

LONGEVITY OF LAWYERS.—On the 21st of the present month Lord Lyndhurst completed his 91st year, and we are informed that the venerable Lord, who has been three times Lord Chancellor, is in the enjoyment of excellent health both mental and physical; and that the marriage of his youngest daughter with Mr. Du Cane, M.P., one of the stars of the opposition, will shortly take place. Lord Lyndhurst is the oldest, but not our only venerable law lord. Lord Wensleydale is 81, Lord St. Leonards is 82, and Lord Brougham 85. Our judges, English, Irish, and Scotch, are not less remarkable for their longevity.

MR. J. K. LORD, the naturalist to the North American Boundary Commission, is lecturing at the Egyptian Hall, on "The Canoe, the Rifle, and the Axe." The illustrations and the lecture are descriptive of a tour through the hunting grounds, fur countries, and gold fields of Oregon, Vancouver's Island, British Columbia, and the Rocky Mountains. The entertainment, which is given in a room fitted up to represent the depths of a primeval forest, has been favourably noticed by the daily press.

CONSERVATIVE REACTION IN AUSTRALIA.—The colony of Victoria is just now engaged in a very necessary, but a very curious reform. Manhood suffrage has been tried and found wanting. Under its provisions, Government has come to a deadlock. No matter how large a majority a minister obtained, no sooner did he appoint his colleagues, than he found himself in a hopeless minority. All those who did not get a place thought themselves ill-used, and joined the opposition so that they might have a chance of office by another turn-out. Under these circumstances a measure has passed the Lower House of Victoria, called "The Electoral Act Amendment Bill," by which nominations on the open listings are abolished; a candidate obliged to make a deposit before he can proceed to a poll, which deposit is forfeited if he does not poll one-fifth of the number received for the successful candidate; and, unless he is a ratepayer an elector must be registered before the voting. No one can be registered unless he has resided for certain periods in the colony and the district. Thus manhood suffrage is changed for a residential and property qualification.

THE ALLEGED DESTRUCTION OF BRITISH PROPERTY BY THE ALABAMA.—If the report that has gone the round of the papers is true, that Captain Semmes has destroyed some British property, the incident shows the necessity of recognising the South. Such a contingency has been foreseen. On the 3rd of March, the Morning Post, writing on the subject of recognition, observed: "If, for instance, the Alabama or Florida should accidentally or wilfully destroy a British merchant ship, our Government would be obliged, as affairs now stand, to apply for compensation to the Government of the United States; and in the event of its being refused, which it very probably would be, make reprisals on the Federal marine, and declare war against the United States. On the other hand; if the Confederacy were acknowledged as an independent State, the demand for compensation would be made to its Government, and under the circumstances supposed it would immediately be acquiesced in."

BRITISH CONSULS IN THE SOUTH.—The Southern correspondent of the Morning Herald, writing from Richmond under date of 22nd April, thus refers to the removal of Mr. Magee, the British Consul at Mobile, to which we referred in our impressions of the 14th and 21st inst. Mr. Bunch was supposed to sympathise with the South. Mr. Seward succeeded in browbeating Earl Russell, after a weak exhibition of firmness by that noble lord, into the withdrawal of Mr. Bunch. Mr. Magee also has, it appears, come under Mr. Seward's suspicion of "Southern sympathies." The Foreign Secretary has been dragged into the removal of Mr. Magee. The circumstances under which this last step has been taken are understood here to be as follows:—The State of Alabama anxious to pay interest about to fall due upon some of her bonds held in England, requested Mr. Magee to forward certain funds for that purpose to London. As the only representative of the Northern Government accessible to that gentleman, Mr. Magee communicated on the subject with the commander of the blockading fleet off Mobile. That officer not only waived all objection to the request of the authorities of Alabama in the case, but even forwarded a despatch ordering a British cruiser to Mobile for the purpose of receiving the consular bag, which, it was agreed on all hands, should contain monies of the State of Alabama, to an amount sufficient for the discharge of certain debts due by her in London. Mr. Seward, however, differed from his naval commander before Mobile, by demanding the withdrawal of Mr. Magee. It is supposed here to have intimidated Lord Russell into the removal of a British consul, because forsooth that consul has become the medium of forwarding monies with which a foreign state has paid its debt to British creditors! Mr. Magee held to have been removed under one pretence, and Mr. Bunch under another, but in reality at the dictum of Mr. Seward and without any other justification in fact than Mr. Seward's supposition of their "Southern sympathies," the retention of Mr. Walker, tainted as he is with suspicions of a "Unionism," leads to the conclusion in the opinion of the Confederates that the Foreign Secretary, who has wantonly insulted their minister, is determined to retain here such agents only as may be supposed willing to look at and report upon things going on around them, in accordance with the peculiar views of a man whom the Confederacy holds an "alien enemy." The sequence in this mode of thinking on the subject, if not even absolutely regular, is, at all events, very close. The interest of this Government, the pride of these people, the independence which their soldiers have maintained so gloriously on a hundred battle-fields, protest against this course of Earl Russell. Public opinion here is, therefore, moving towards the conviction that, in addition to the withdrawal of Mr. Mason from exposure to the petulance of the noble Secretary of Foreign Affairs, this Government, not only in justice to its self-respect, but in good faith to an accomplished fact, which even British ministers feel bound to acknowledge, is bound to remove from the country those foreign residents whose very presence here under the pretended authority of the public enemy is a standing contradiction of its independence.

THE BLOCKADE.—Although little has been said during the last fortnight on the subject of the Peterhoff and other captures, the feeling as to the commercial importance of the question has in no degree subsided. On the reassembling of Parliament it will again, with kindred matters, be brought forward, not disputatiously, but with a view to obtain some more definite enunciation of general principles than is yet felt to have been given. Meanwhile it is to be remarked that the trading world consider they have to complain of a grievance in the fact that, both in Parliament and among the generality of writers, shipowners and merchants who endeavour to send goods through the blockade into the Confederate ports are spoken of as if they were engaged in some nefarious, or, at least, objectionable pursuit, and as if they were compromising their country by acting in opposition to international law, and also to the neutrality which it is wished to maintain. The parties thus engaged comprise some most respectable merchants, who would certainly not enter into any transaction of which they would have to feel ashamed, and they contend that it is a mistake and a fallacy which cannot be too soon exposed to encourage an assumption of this nature. Under what principle, they ask, either of equity or sound policy is the attempt to trade with the Confederates to be deemed censurable? Those who enter into that trade admit that they must submit to the chance of having their ships and goods seized by the Federals, but they have a right to run this chance just as much as they have a right to encounter the risk of shipwreck or any other peril. The blockading Power says, "We will keep you out if we can," and international custom admits their right to do so, and to confiscate all the vessels and cargoes they may catch in attempting to pass the forbidden lines after the usual formal notice to that effect shall have been given. Traders, on the other hand, say, "We will try to get in," and so far from such enterprises being liable to be looked upon as an offence, it has always been held that the success or non-success of such attempts should serve as a test whether the blockade has been fairly established and is upheld. If it were not for these adroit and bold adventurers any nation might shut out an antagonist from trade by a mere declaration, but through their agency the commercial world are protected from such a contingency, and the matter is soon brought to a practical proof. Moreover, as regards the question of neutrality, it is argued, that so far from the attempts to trade with a belligerent being a breach of neutrality, any effort on the part of a neutral Government to discourage or obstruct such attempts is directly inconsistent with the observance of strict impartiality, since it amounts, to that extent, to an actual co-operation with the blockading Power, by aiding them to enforce their hostile measures against the other belligerent. The plain path of justice is for our Government to avoid all one-sided references to such matters. Our people would certainly be as ready to trade with the South as with the North; and we do not recognise that the proceeding in either case can be manufactured into a crime. Those who can get goods into the South for a fair equivalent, either in cotton, tobacco, or gold, render a service to their nation; and, although in case of failure and loss they have no title to complain, since the North has a perfect right to exert all its skill and force against them, it is out of place for our Ministers to show, either by allusion or by direct incivility, that they consider them persons to be put down. The rudeness manifested by the Post-office to the owners of the Peterhoff, and the subsequent disposition indicated by some members of the Government to treat the fact of these gentlemen having been participants previously in some successful breaches of the blockade as if these breaches were to be cited in the fashion of "previous convictions" against a criminal—probably arose merely from the irritation which is always excited in official departments by any individuals who may be unfortunate enough to be compelled to give a little trouble. It would be well, however, that it should be thoroughly understood that all displays of the kind not merely bear the character of partisanship, but are also damaging to the independence of the trading community.—Times, May 27.

THE wreck of the Lancaster, one of the rams of Porter's flotilla, has been picked up by the Confederates at Port Hudson. It is supposed that she was abandoned in consequence of damages sustained in passing the Vicksburg batteries.

ONE of the most successful undertakings in France is the Garden of Acclimatisation in the Bois de Boulogne, Paris. In two years it has had 532,052 visitors, and has taken at the gates 385,524fr., besides which animals have been sold to the amount of 111,656fr.

OFFICIAL STATISTICS OF NEW ZEALAND.—The Registrar-General has issued his volume of statistics for 1861. The imports in that year were of the value of £2,493,811, more than four times the imports of 1853, and mere by £945,478 than in 1860. The exports amounted to £1,370,247, an increase of £781,294 over 1860. The export of wool in 1861, calculated at the uniform rate of 1s. 4d. per lb., amounted to £523,728. The quantity of gold exported from New Zealand to the end of September, 1862, was 538,560 ounces, and its value £2,086,921. The European population at the end of 1861 numbered 109,315, including 7,294 military and their families; the Maori population was estimated at 55,257. The European males, excluding the military, were 61,062; the Maori males 31,329. The European population increased fourfold in the ten years 1851-61, and the population of the single province of Otago in 1861 exceeded the population of all New Zealand in 1851.

THE ALEXANDRA.—We understand that in consequence of a pressing application from Messrs. Fletcher and Hull, solicitors for the defendants in this case, for a copy of the information filed against the Alexandra, they have been furnished with a very voluminous document comprising ninety-eight counts, which are mere recapitulations of the seventh clause of the Enlistment Act. No information of the nature of the depositions or of the parties making them have been supplied. The defendants are Messrs. Miller, Frazer, Trenholm, and Co., Pawcett, Preston and Co., and Captains Tessier, Bullock, and Butcher. It is believed that the case will come before the Exchequer Court soon after the 13th proximo. In these proceedings the defendants, under any circumstances, will have to pay their own costs, and no indemnity is likely to be paid for the detention of the vessel.—The Times.

MR. VALLANDIGHAM.—At the close of Mr. Vallandigham's trial in Cincinnati he presented the following "protest" to the officers of the court:—"Arrested without due process of law, without warrant from any judicial officer, and now in a military prison, I have been served with a 'charge and specifications,' as in a court-martial or military commission. I am not in 'either the land or naval forces of the United States, nor in the militia in the actual service of the United States,' and therefore am not triable for any cause by such Court; but am subject, by the express terms of the Constitution, to arrest only by due process of law, judicial warrant, regularly issued upon affidavit, and by some officer or Court of competent jurisdiction for the trial of citizens; and am now entitled to be tried on an indictment or presentment of a grand jury of such Court, to speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State of Ohio, to be confronted with witnesses against me, to have compulsory process for witnesses in my behalf, the assistance of counsel for my defence, and evidence and argument according to the common laws and the ways of judicial courts. And all these I here demand as my right as a citizen of the United States, and under the Constitution of the United States. But the alleged 'offence' itself is not known to the Constitution of the United States, nor to any law thereof. It is words spoken to the people of Ohio in an open and public political meeting, lawfully and peaceably assembled under the Constitution, and upon full notice. It is words of criticism of the public policy of the public servants of the people, by which policy it was alleged that the welfare of the country was not promoted. It was an appeal to the people to change that policy, not by force, but by free elections and the ballot-box. It is not pretended that I counselled disobedience to the Constitution, or resistance to laws and lawful authority. I never have. Beyond this protest I have nothing further to submit." The court was then cleared for deliberation, and, after a session of three hours, their decision was made and submitted to General Burnside for his approval.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.—Science Examination of the Science and Art Department of the Committee of Council on Education.—The annual May examinations of the pupils of science schools and classes by the Department of Science and Art, have just terminated, and the results show a very satisfactory increase in the number of centres of examination, and the number of pupils who have come up to be examined, although in some subjects there has been a decrease as compared with last year. In geometrical drawing the number of pupils examined in 1862 was 119, but this year they had increased to 289. In machine drawing the number has increased from 70 to 194, and in building construction there has been an increase from 45 to 107. In theoretical mechanics there has been a falling off from 52 pupils to 35, and in applied mechanics the decrease is from 47 to 22. The experimental sciences appear the most popular. In acoustics, light, and heat there is an increase from 47 to 121, and in magnetism and electricity the increase is from 105 to 207. Inorganic chemistry shows an increase from 558 to 679, and inorganic chemistry an increase from 105 to 157. It is rather remarkable that there should be a falling off in some of the natural sciences. The number of pupils in geology has decreased from 189 to 129, and in mineralogy from 81 to 46. There is a slight decrease in animal physiology, from 349 to 343; but in zoology the decrease is from 84 to 41. In vegetable physiology there is an increase from 66 to 126, and in systematic botany from 26 to 84. In mining and metallurgy, which have been lately added to the list of subjects, there were 29 pupils in the former and 63 in the latter. The centres of examination have increased from 54 in 1862 to 71 in 1863, and the number of pupils examined in the different subjects has increased from 1943 to 2672. These figures only give an approximate estimate of the number of pupils receiving instruction in elementary science, because a considerable proportion are not sufficiently advanced to attend the examinations.

PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS.—The following were issued yesterday:—

ROMAN CATHOLICS AND MEMBERS OF ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND).—Number of Roman Catholics in Ireland in 1834, 6,436,000; in 1861, 4,503,265. Number of members of the Established Church in Ireland in 1834, 853,160; in 1861, 691,872. Proportion of Roman Catholics to members of the Established Church: in 1834, 100 Roman Catholics to 13.25 members of the Established Church; in 1861, 100 Roman Catholics to 15.35 members of the Established Church.

ARMY.—An account of the receipts and expenditure for army and militia services for the year ending 31st of March, 1862. The amount granted for army services was £14,636,751, and for the militia, £637,000. There were several supplementary grants, which made a total of £16,194,206 10s. 10d. The total expenditure had been £15,934,670 8s. 7d., and the balance unappropriated was £261,535 13s. 3d.

FOREIGN SUGAR.—A return of the quantity of foreign sugar entered for home consumption from 1844 to 1862 states that the aggregate of sugar of all sorts returned for home consumption was, in 1844, 104 cwt.; in 1853, there were 1,735,792 cwt.; and the amount in 1862 had increased to 4,725,763 cwt.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MAY 28, 1863.

Stonewall Jackson.

THE death of General Jackson is one of those events which bring home to us all the terrible realities of war. Waiting and watching here, thousands of miles away from the conflict, the anguish, the suffering, the wholesale calamity, which are desolating half a continent, move us but feebly. We cannot picture the horrors of that struggle on the Chickahominy, where 200,000 men strove for dear life, and more than life, during seven long days and nights; we cannot in our peaceful cities and smiling plains call up the blood-stained banks of the Rappahannock, the shell-lit ruins of Chancellorsville, and the roaring, crackling woods, where men smitten with paralyzing wounds, died a death more horrible than their most mortal foes would contemplate unmoved; we cannot realize the sun going down in placid splendour over fields where some 20,000 or 30,000 men, in the prime of manhood's vigour, are lying dead in every possible convulsion and distortion, or, suffering ten times worse than death, the hopeless agony of untended wounds. We skim the fearful list of casualties, the death-roll which carries affliction into thousands of homes with apathetic glance; but the truth, the whole truth of the ghastly panorama we do not see. Only when a poignant grief widens and intensifies our sympathies, when we learn that some choice companion of our youth, some dear comrade of our manhood, has died fighting on that ensanguined plain, does the full consciousness of the cruel sacrifices that war demands strike us; only then the one touch of nature that makes the whole world kin, commingles our sorrows with those of the people whose every house is a house of mourning, and whose best and bravest sons are buying with their heart's blood the priceless treasure of freedom. And the blow which has struck down General Jackson is felt as a personal grief in thousands of English homes. Not alone in the State which he loved and to which he consecrated his life, not alone in the Confederacy for which he fought and died, but here in England his name had become a household word. We had grouped around him all the most precious memories of the war. We associated him, as human nature will, with all the attributes that individually we most admire. To one he was the gallant Ney, first in and last out of the battle, the right arm of the South to strike the blow, as Lee was its head to direct it. To another he was a Wellington, not stirred by mere ambition or dazzled with the pomp and circumstance of glorious war, but teaching in his allegiance to his State the simple lesson of duty; to a third, he was the Christian soldier, another Havelock, serving his God as diligently as he served his country, and revered by his men not less for his example of Christian piety than of manly fortitude; to a fourth he was the embodiment of that religious devotion and personal daring which gave Cromwell's Ironsides their victory over the flower of English chivalry, and carried the standard of Gustavus Adolphus into the heart of the German Empire. There must have been something rare in this man's composition, to have attracted all this sympathy, and to have surrounded him with so much of the worship the whole world pays to its true heroes. Where all testimony is so concurrent, where foes dare not assail the homage which friends affectionately offer, there must have been one of those noble natures which justify their fellow-men's attachment and admiration, and teach us how closely binding are the impulses and thoughts and hopes that sway the whole human race.

General Jackson was amongst the earliest of the Confederate soldiers to test the metal of the invaders, and from the first he has been the sword and buckler of his native state—that Old Virginia which has so proudly shown up the blood from which her sons boast their origin. In every great victory, that has illustrated the plains of the Old Dominion, Jackson's name has been conspicuous. If Lee and Johnston have planned, he it was to whom, with full confidence of success, they intrusted the execution; and wherever the invaders received the most stunning blows, it was Stonewall Jackson's division that inflicted them. One after another the Federal Generals in the Shenandoah, Banks and Fremont, were baffled, outmarched, out-maneuvred, and beaten by him. Then came the famous march from the Shenandoah's banks right through Virginia to York Town Peninsula, when with terrible suddenness Stonewall Jackson's troops rushed down upon the right of McClellan's army, and inaugurated with a glorious victory the Nine Days' struggle on the Chickahominy. Again Banks met his old conqueror at Cedar Mountain, and once more the Federals recoiled, shattered and broken from the encounter. It was Pope's turn next, and then we heard of the bold movement of Stonewall Jackson upon the Federal rear at Manassas Junction, which heralded another great shock of battle, and fresh humiliation to the Federal armies. And now his last campaign is ended. But in this, too, it was Jackson who led his men furthest into the Federal ranks, and wrung from their panic-stricken masses the greatest victory of the war. It was he who, with his 18,000 men burst like a thundercloud on the Federal rear, scattered Schurz's corps, and drove it a frightened mob to the banks of the Rappahannock. In the hottest of the fight, where the roar of cannon was loudest, where the gleaming bayonet and the bright flashing of musketry told of the closest struggle, where the mist hung in densest clouds over the field of blood, Jackson led his men, and got his death blow. In front, as was his wont, the bullets struck him down in that death grip of the two battling armies—and in the full flush of victory, driving back the foe from his native soil, amidst the ringing cheers of the Confederate soldiers—Stonewall Jackson realised the poet's sublimest aspiration—

In some good cause, not in mine own,
To perish, wept for, honour'd, known,
And like a warrior overthrown—
Whose eyes are dimmed with glorious tears,
When, soiled with noble dust, he hears
His country's warsong thrill his ears;
Then dying of a mortal stroke,
What time the foeman's line is broke,
And all the war is rolled in smoke.

The loss is a sad one, but not irreparable. The great cause will go on and prosper, though Lee and a hundred other of the dead hero's comrades share his fate. The fate of really great nations is not made or upmade by individuals. We sorrow for the loss of the man; we grieve, as every Southern officer and soldier must grieve, for the loss of that gallant soldier whose energy was an inspiration, and whose advance was a certainty of victory. But we know there are men to fill his place, and we feel that his memory will still inspire the Confederate armies to great and gallant deeds. Moore died at Corunna, but the famous Light Brigade never forgot his influence, and achieved noble successes in a hundred fights in the Peninsula. So will Jackson's name abide enduringly in the hearts of Southern soldiers. To some it will be a password for more furious onslaught and deadlier hate; to some a stimulus to duty and self-sacrifice; to all an example to be followed and a memory to be cherished. Stonewall Jackson's death alone is a loud-speaking and imperishable protest against reunion.

He is gone—he has fought the good fight. There is little to regret in such a life or such a death as his. But there will be mourning that cannot be comforted in a home in Virginia; and there will be great grief in the hearts of the veterans whom he so often led to victory. And for months and years to come the memory of this grand gentleman, commingling with the daring of the hero and the genius of the leader the tender care of the father for his troops and the solicitude of the true patriot for his country, will remain fresh in every Southern heart; until by-and-by, when the last battle of freedom has been fought, and peace has healed the wounds inflicted by this terrible war, Southerners will point with pride to the page of history on which the name of Stonewall Jackson is written, and tell their children's children what manner of men they were who in their lives, and by their deaths, laid the foundations of the Confederacy.

The Emperor and the War.

ALL hopes of peace now rest upon one man. On his Imperial will depends whether the bloody episode on the Rappahannock shall be merely an episode, or whether it shall be the turning point of the war. That hegemony which his genius has won for France in European affairs is by tacit consent deferred to him also in the concerns of the New World. No one now asks what will be the policy of Great Britain towards America; but everybody anxiously waits on what the Emperor of the French will do.

It is true that by virtue of proximity of race, of language, and of interests, the arbitration of this suicidal quarrel between two great Anglo-Saxon societies belongs to England. It is true, also, that the national heart of England feels deeply its responsibilities, and that its pulsations are true and strong. But England to-day pays one of the inevitable penalties of free Government and of material prosperity, that of having at times at the head of national affairs statesmen who belong rather to the past than to the present, and whose skill and merit are rather the business tact and knowledge of details, acquired by long experience, than the quick and prescient comprehension of the requirements of sudden emergencies. The leading spirit of the present Administration is indeed a man of wonderful rote, and of versatility of resource but a courtier of personal popularity, who, in coquetting with the most dangerous political element in the country, does not fear to trifle with England's position as a first class Power. The nominal conduct of Foreign Affairs is in the hands of a diplomatic Malaprop, who has never shown vigour, activity, or determination, except where the display of these qualities was singularly unneeded, or even worse than useless. Thus the Government has systematically quieted the public impatience with vague promises and shadowy predictions, and the national conscience by ingeniously explaining away all inconvenient moral as well as legal obligations. It has confessedly construed international law in favour of the aggressor, and against the weaker and defendant. It has also shown itself ready to go out of its way to prevent the Confederates from building ships in English ports, and so obtaining the only supplies which they really need; while at the same time it connives at the almost open practice of recruiting in Ireland, by which the Federals fill the ranks of their wasted armies. Of late the bias of the Government has become even more decided, and the so-called neutrality has grown almost as "warm" to the North as Mr. Bright himself could wish. The official speakers have stopped short only of an avowed apology for the outrages upon British commerce, while the complainants against those outrages have been browbeaten and insulted. And the last crowning act of this "warm" neutrality, which almost staggers belief, coming from the administrators of an Empire, is the removal, one after another, of British Consuls, whose residence in Southern ports is indispensable to the protection of British interests, but who had personally become unpalatable to Mr. Seward.

From Great Britain, then, under her actual government, the Cabinet of Washington has nothing to fear, and the Confederate States nothing to expect. As the voice of Europe can alone end this war—for neither Federal defeats, nor exhaustion, nor change of purpose will end it for weary years to come—that voice, if spoken at all, will be spoken by the Emperor Napoleon. That he has the will, his past actions prove; that he has the power no one doubts. Within ten years his unfathomable genius has raised France to be the leading Power in Europe. It was he who was the master mind in the last great events in history, previous to the American Revolution. It was he who commenced, chiefly sustained, and at his pleasure ended the war with Russia. It was he who gave to Italy her unity and her freedom. It will be he, also, who, by restoring peace to the Western hemisphere, will deserve the thanks of both of the belligerents, by being the benefactor of both alike. Official pusillanimity will excuse itself by the plea that France is more under the control of a single will, that she has no contiguous frontiers upon which the infuriated maniac among nations may expend the mortification of disappointment, and that the motives of France will be less likely to be misunderstood by the North than those of hated England. These pleas may pass; but the true reason will be that England, in 1863, had not a statesman at the head of affairs capable of seeing and of grasping a great opportunity. While the English nation mourns the loss of a gallant Confederate chieftain as though it were a British loss, we cannot without a heartfelt pang arrive at the painful conviction that the people of the Confederate States must look to another nation, alien to them in kindred and in tongue, for that justice which has been so cruelly withheld.

The War in the East and West.

It is a pleasing delusion with the Federals just now that their late movements on the Rappahannock "surprised" General Lee. In one sense of the word they did, undoubtedly. It must have astonished the Confederate commander to find an army of some 90,000 or 100,000 men launched suddenly into an enemy's country, crossing two rivers, in a district where the broken nature of the ground, and the scarcity of roads, prevented anything like a combined movement, and where the very largeness of the invading force was in itself a serious element of danger. How little Hooker knew of the distribution and numbers of the Confederate army is evident from his expressed apprehension that they would retreat without a battle, and from the efforts he made to cut off their communications with the South. There seems to be no doubt that Hooker made his principal movements in the belief that a considerable portion of the Confederate army was miles away from head-quarters, either under General Longstreet, at Suffolk, or General Hill, in North Carolina; and it was General Hooker who was surprised when he found that, after making all his arrangements for "bagging" Lee's reduced forces, he had an army before him sufficiently numerous to beat him in three pitched battles, and drive him in confusion across the Rappahannock, without the aid of a single brigade from the South. The "surprise," we repeat, was on the Federal side. It was General Lee's object to entice his enemy across the river, not to dispute the passage; and all the boasting of the Northern press about the successful ruse, the marvellous rapidity, and the brilliant plan of Hooker's operations amounts to this,—that General Hooker was allowed at his leisure to take up a position on about the most dangerous ground for an army that could be selected, and that the very facility with which he accomplished the first portion of his programme was fatal to its complete execution. For long before he had got his army into line, Lee had outflanked him. Whilst he was busy entrenching and announcing to his troops their brilliant success in having manœuvred the enemy out of a strong position and themselves into one, Lee's whole army had changed front, and Jackson was moving on his extreme right; and when the day of battle came the "surprise" was complete and overwhelming. Jackson, whom the Federals supposed to be holding Fredericksburg, was on their right flank. The attack was made just where their line was weakest, and where support was least obtainable. The German troops felt their danger at once, turned and fled. Jackson's corps of 18,000 or 20,000 men at that point could do as much mischief as double the number. Hooker was busy with the spade in his front, whilst Jackson was piercing right into his rear, and but for the resistance which the entrenchments at Chancellorsville enabled the Federal commander to maintain, the whole of the Federal army would have been driven, pell-mell, to United States Ford. The truth is, the Federal War Administration has yet to learn this lesson, that, with incompetent commanders, large numbers in the field, especially in an enemy's country, are a source of weakness rather than of strength. The experience of a lifetime enables few men to handle 50,000 men easily and effectively. When a mere fighter, like Hooker, is intrusted with 120,000 men, there can be but one result—failure.

The worst of all this fighting is, that it leaves matters very much as they were. Every such defeat of the Federal army of course diminishes its confidence in itself and its leaders, and renders the task of invasion more difficult and hopeless. But so long as contractors grow fat, and foreign mercenaries can be bought, and political adventurers can rob, there is no prospect of the end. In New York the chances of defeat or victory form matter for a pleasing topic of discussion. A great national disaster only occasions a few hours' excitement, and the panic of the hour is followed by as complete a confidence in future success as reigned in Washington the day before the famous "skedaddle" at Bull Run. When the last mail left, Hooker was forgotten and Stoneman was the hero. What he has accomplished we hardly know, except a tolerably safe ride through some hundred miles of the enemy's country. He frightened the women and children, he picked up a stray Confederate soldier here and there, he tore up some miles of railway; but he could carry nothing off, for there was nothing to carry; his raid had no effect whatever upon the contest being waged on the banks of the Rappahannock; that was over before he reached the point where his services were required. With a force of 3,000 cavalry and twenty guns—a few thousand more or less is a matter of no moment to the Federals—General Stoneman marches within sight of Richmond, and then marches back again. He performs a sort of parody on Stewart's famous Maryland incursion, and returns, apparently amazed at his own hardihood, with a feeling of profound gratitude at finding "safety and rest under our brave old flag, within our lines at Gloucester Point." But it is enough for the New Yorkers, who find in it a feat of arms which inclines the balance of the Rappahannock successes decidedly to the Federal side. So in a moment the most extravagant rumours are revived. Hooker is once more advancing—has crossed the Rappahannock, and reached Gordonsville. General Keyes is in Richmond. Lee's army is in full retreat into North Carolina; and the rebellion is crushed. No doubt, when another year's correspondence is published, Mr. Seward will be found to have given Mr. Adams the earliest intelligence of these satisfactory events. The end of the story is, that Halleck is about to assume the chief command on the Rappahannock. Halleck has not the dash of Hooker, but he has more than his caution. It took him three months to advance from Pittsburg Landing to Corinth, fortifying every half-mile he marched. It is easy to calculate how long it would take this adventurous general to reach Richmond. If it be true, however, that General Keyes has reached West Point, we may expect a battle. There is already a rumour to the effect that Longstreet has defeated him, and it is, perhaps, only premature. General Keyes' advance might have been dangerous to the Confederates, had it been made simultaneously with Hooker's advance; as an isolated movement it can only result in disaster. Apart from this, operations in Virginia seem for a time to be virtually suspended. The interest of the war is transferred to the South and West.

Charleston is again threatened; though we can hardly believe that the threat will be realized. The gathering of the ironclads is, in all probability, a feint to mask the attack that will be delivered at some more vulnerable point. The States of Mississippi and Tennessee are, for the moment, the chief theatres of the war, and it is there that we may expect all the efforts of the Federals to be concentrated. Having tried the northern, eastern, and western approaches of Vicksburg, General Grant is now directing his approach from the south. He has failed again at Haines' Bluff. He can make no impression upon Fort Pemberton, but he has landed at Grand Gulf, some few miles down the Mississippi, and, at the latest date, was making for the rear of Vicksburg, striking at Jackson, the capital of the State of Mississippi. His march will not be an easy one. The Confederates are in considerable force between Jackson and Vicksburg. The country through which he has to pass is cut with deep ravines, traversed by innumerable water-courses, impassable swamps, and thick forests. A small army would have no chance, a large army would meet with so many difficulties in the way of transporting supplies, that we cannot for an instant believe in Grant's success. At the same time the position of the defenders of Vicksburg is critical. They are cut off from the Red River supplies; Grierson's cavalry is devastating the country in their rear; the Federals hold the line of the Mississippi, and Grant is advancing upon Jackson from the south. Some great effort must be made at once for their relief, and recent intelligence leads to the belief that this has been made, for Grant was reported to be falling back after his victory at Port Hudson, and reinforcements from Charleston were arriving. We shall not be surprised to learn that Grant has been once more driven to his gunboats. Another month, and the Mississippi will effectually put a stop to the vaunted operations of the Federal gunboats and armies, and we may hear of the Confederates resuming the offensive.

In Tennessee the two armies still confront each other. Rosecranz's lines are contracted, and he has told his soldiers that the hour for active operations has arrived. He is a bold officer, and may strike a blow before the waters fall so low as to imperil his communications. If he delays, he will run serious risks. Both armies hold fortified positions. Advance on either side would be a dangerous enterprise; but a bold advance of the Federals, or a damaging defeat involving the loss of Kentucky, seem to be the only alternatives that present themselves to Rosecranz. It is not likely that a general engagement can long be postponed. Two armies of 60,000 or 70,000 men cannot remain quiet, facing each other's outposts during the next two months. We may look any day for another of those desperate fields of carnage which have distinguished the war in the South-West—the prize of the victors will be the States of Tennessee and Kentucky.

Another "Indecisive" Victory.

GENERAL HOOKER has returned to his head-quarters at Falmouth; General Lee has officially announced to President Davis that the Confederates have again to thank Almighty God for a great victory; and another brief and bloody campaign in Virginia is over. By this time the dead have been shovelled under earth, except where a likely corpse has been secured by the Yankee embalmers, and the maimed and wounded are suffering secundum artem. It was a great expedition, a great defeat, a great victory. We have had nine days to criticise the strategy of the nine days' campaign, we have duly magnified the bravery of the contending hosts, and it seems to us that, at this juncture, when the first excitement of the battles has passed, but while yet the affair is freshly remembered, it may be proper, if not profitable, to inquire what is the result of all this fighting and this carnage? Cui bono? Is peace nearer? If not, then the dead have died in vain, and who is guilty of the fearful waste of human life?

No person supposes that peace will ensue from the defeat of Hooker. So far from that, our Northern contemporaries who are the organs of the Peace Society and the Federal Government, while compelled to reluctantly admit that the Northern army has been defeated, openly rejoice that the event does not indicate the termination of hostilities, that the mad ambition, and lust, and hate of the Federals have not yet been quenched by the many rivulets of kindred blood, and that if in the East there is some cause for momentary despair, there is enough of hope in the West to sustain the war. And let us add, that no one in Europe, when the news came that Hooker was moving, imagined that, whatever might be the fortune of the campaign, it would lead to peace. We expected some lively doings because it was known that "Fighting Joe" was conceited and reckless. We were not disappointed. The sport—we must use the word, for it best expresses the kind of interest that Europe is now unconsciously taking in the contest—was excellent; and having kept his men long enough in the shambles to vindicate his own pluck, Hooker recrossed the Rappahannock. But assume that our anticipation, founded upon experience, had been disappointed. Assume that the veteran army of the Confederates had been defeated, that Hooker had captured Richmond, that the German mercenaries and their Yankee comrades had there, under the sanction of their officers, repeated the crimes which have already branded their cause with infamy,* and that the Confederate capital had been razed to the ground. What then? Would that have ensured peace? Not at all. It has been well and often remarked by the leading journals of this country that the capture of Southern cities does not involve the conquest of the South; that the taking of Richmond, Charleston, Mobile, and Savannah, would no more aid the North than has the downfall of New Orleans. And so we are justified in saying that, unconsciously, Europe takes a sporting interest in the awful conflict. We do not mean that there is indifference to the sufferings of the respective armies and countries. We know that in England there is a deep-rooted sympathy with the Confederates, that we wish them well in their noble struggle for the maintenance of that independence which we ourselves prize so dearly. Nay, more, we are shocked, we are pained when we read accounts of Northern levity. Disgust gives place to anger when we hear of President Lincoln interrupting grave deliberations with broad jests. Allowing much for the joy that is incident to fat contracts and lucky speculations in gold, we are yet startled to find that, whilst their young men are fighting in the South, the people of New England and New York are making merry with the ravings of a bedlamite, or crowding to pay homage to Mr. and Mrs. Tom Thumb. It is not in a spirit of levity that we watch the war in America, yet we know the battles can have no other result than so many killed and wounded, so much property destroyed, and so much country desolated. We have been long aware that the North is fighting for an empire it cannot gain, and the South for an independence that cannot be taken away. Everywhere the wicked and hopeless strife is deplored. Who is responsible for it? Have we any share in the responsibility?

Who is to blame? Not the Confederates. They do not claim an inch of Northern territory. They only ask to be let alone, and to enjoy that political independence which has been their heritage and possession from time immemorial. They fight an invader—they fight to protect their property, their homes, their wives, and their children. They do not imagine that they have anything to gain by fighting. On the contrary, they confess before God and man that the war is a sad affliction and a terrible ordeal, for their armies are not recruited with foreign hirelings, and their triumphs on the field are dearly bought with the loss of precious lives. It is, however, unnecessary to prove by argument what all admit, and which is as indisputable as a mathematical axiom. It is clear that the fault is with the invading North, for it is the Northern commanders that oblige the Confederates to try the same bloody issue half a dozen times. But are the Federals alone to blame? Has not Europe, has not the English Government, which, in this case dominates in the councils of Europe, some participation in the guilt?

Let us look calmly and dispassionately at the situation. Once more a dreadful series of battles has been fought, and once more it has been shown that the Confederates are able to maintain their independence. What do we do? We refuse to recognise the Confederate States—that is, we tell the Federals not to give in. We tell them that in the opinion of our Government the contest is not hopeless. Lord Russell bids the North have another and still another round. Is the North to be the first to confess its discomfiture? In the history of the world such an instance cannot be found. Recognition by foreign nations must precede peace, and the longer recognition is delayed the longer peace is postponed.

We do even more than encourage the North by inaction. The Federal Government thinks it indispensable to be superior at sea, and we liberally construe the law of nations in its favour to the detriment of our own commerce and the degradation of our flag. The North has need of English arms and ammunition; and whilst we are doing our best to prevent the Confederates from obtaining ships by allowing our builders' yards to be infested with Federal spies, we liberally construe the law in favour of the Federals getting warlike supplies from our manufactures. We permit the virtual blockade of British ports, but we dismiss a tried and faithful public servant, for aiding the bank of Mobile in transmitting coin to pay some interest due to English creditors. Meanwhile we rub our hands complacently. We thank ourselves we are not as our cousins on the other side of the Atlantic. We point proudly to our overflowing exchequer. We observe that the only troubles we suffer are the inconveniences of the crush at the receptions at St. James's, and the little cloud in Lancashire. Let the American war go on; it is not our concern; we are not our brothers' keeper. Again the Confederate arms have signally triumphed. But we shall lose this opportunity of speaking words of peace, as we have lost other opportunities. If now we were to recognise the South, it would strengthen the hands of the peace party in the North; it would be the beginning of the end. We shall not do so. We shall abide by the policy of Lord Russell, and by the sophistries of his friend "Historicus," and make it impossible for the Federals to give up the vain attempt to subjugate the South. We bind them to their bargain. We keep them to their rash vow. We will not give them a door of escape. Unless they choose to stoop lower than any other nation has ever stooped, the war must go on. All the influence of England shall be exerted to prevent that recognition of the South which must come before peace.

Lord Russell may think that his policy of inaction is masterly. He may think it exceedingly wise to lure the Federals on to utter ruin. Or, to put the most charitable construction on his cruel policy, he may think that anything is better than offending the Lincoln Government. Does the noble Lord believe in Nemesis? Does he not so far believe in a ruling Providence as to hold that nations, like individuals, reap what they sow? He may live long enough to see that he is wrong. He may live to see England mourn for the loss of her staple industry, to see the little cloud in sunshine darken all the land. He may live to see a continent divided in all other respects leagued together in bitter relentless hatred to England. The noble Lord boasts that the condemnation of both sides is evidence of his neutrality. It is a false assumption. He has not recognised the South; but if the South would return to the Union on the condition of a war with this country, there would be infinite gladness in New England, Lord Russell has wronged both sides in the matter of recognition, for both sides are injured by the prolongation of the war through non-recognition. He denies to the South a right; he refuses to the North the opportunity of ending hostilities. When the contest is over, when on the morrow of peace comes reflection, the North will become our sworn foe. They will say to us, "We were mad, and you took advantage of our weakness. You knew the struggle was hopeless, but you would not tell us so officially. Why did you not recognise the South, after Manassas, or after the Seven days' Battle, or after the second battle of Manassas, or after Fredericksburg, or after the disastrous defeat of Hooker? Tell us not you did not wish to interfere. Recognition would not have prevented us carrying on the war if we had chosen, but it would have been an excuse for peace." You knew we were too proud to be the first to confess our failure, and that your non-recognition of the South forced us to continue the war! What can we answer? Nothing. The charge is true. We are not altogether guiltless of the blood of those who perish in what we believe to be a vain contest. To America Lord Russell's policy is a crime; to England it is a blunder as well as a crime.

Queux Deus Vult Perdere.

It is a profound remark of Guizot's, in regard to the men of what is known in English history as the Great Rebellion, that even when in arms against the King and the law, they recognised and "bowed down before a law which they had not made." They refused obedience to their Sovereign; they took up arms against the Constitution; they committed high treason against their country; it might not be too harsh to say that they were rebels to Christianity; but they rebelled not in the name of lawless passion, not in the name of abstract reason, not in the name of some "higher law," or some imaginary "rights of man," which might be only a cover for the political passions or selfish designs of faction, but on behalf of a written and definite code of law, for which they claimed not only Divine sanction, but universal applicability. Their political leaders drew the sword in the name of the ancestral privileges of the people and of Parliament; their preachers hounded them on to the war with exhortations founded on the law of Moses. A law which they had not made, restrained their pretensions and controlled their passions, and gave even to the wildest excesses of fury and fanaticism a veil at least of decency and sobriety. There was no such frantic upheaval of all the worst and vilest impulses of human nature, no such fundamental overthrow of the first principles of religion, of morals, and of society, as left the leaders of the French revolution without restraint in their crimes, and have deprived the friends of French liberty in all succeeding generations of every point of support which liberty derives from faith, from tradition, from the morality of a Christian people, and without which she cannot possibly stand. The Rebellion, which was commenced by a fanatical party in full reliance on the bloodiest precedents and the sternest precepts of the Mosaic law, was conducted with something of a chivalrous spirit. It shed little blood on the scaffold; and for the worst of its crimes we must blame rather the ambitious wickedness of Cromwell himself than the fanaticism of the Parliamentary party. It ended in a military tyranny, followed by a restoration; but the good which it had wrought survives it to this day. The revolution, which commenced in France under the auspices of irreligious philosophy and lawless philanthropy, ended by handing over a people drunk with civil bloodshed to a rule which made them drunk with blood spilt in wars of aggression; and to this day France has not recovered—perhaps she never will recover—the effect of those fearful orgies of rapine and murder. France is, perhaps, the only country in Europe whose people are not ruled in a far greater degree by a law which they have not made, than by laws of their own making; and accordingly there is no European country where liberty is so uncertain and order so precarious. But we have only to look beyond the Atlantic to see a people which stands to the French in much the same relation in which la Grande Nation once stood to its European neighbours—a people which has shaken off all those decent restraints which are the fruit and the security of civilization, and which, while in point of material resources and mechanical power it rivals England herself, is as little controlled by the conventional rules of public morality, religion, humanity, and national decorum as the Ashantees or the Taepings; a people wielding all the strength of a civilized country with all the savage unrestraint of barbarism, and drawing on itself at once the contempt and the fear, the pity and the indignation of the Christian world.

The genius of democracy—at least of modern democracy—revolts against the idea of restraint from without; and especially against the restraints of ancient usage, and of traditions whose wisdom is not obvious at first sight. Revolution is with a democracy almost a matter of every-day life; it is by its very nature incapable of that dislike of change, that love of institutions because they were dear to a previous generation, that limitation of the reforming spirit within narrow bounds and to matters not essential, which are absolutely necessary to the stability of governments. And the democracy of the Northern States is cursed with a misfortune which aggravates all its vices, and cuts it off from every hope of salvation and amendment. Its political creed, like the religious faith attributed to Popes, declares it to be infallible. The priests and high priests, the demagogue on the platform, the statesman in the Senate, the very President in his Message, assume rather than renounce this fundamental article of faith, and worship King Mob with a servility which no courtier since the days of Canute ever dared to offer to a Christian sovereign. Not only their political conduct, not only their official action, but their consciences, their honour, their very souls acknowledge the rule, guidance, sovereignty, almost the divinity, of the popular voice. There is nothing, therefore, to restrain a Northern populace from the wildest follies. It is insensible to shame; for it has no fear of coming into the presence of any whose superior authority, sobriety, and wisdom might awaken in it a sense of its own extravagance and unworthiness. It is incapable of self-distrust; for it has been sedulously taught that the people are never mistaken. It is above repentance; for its belief is strong and sure that the people can do no wrong. It is beyond guidance or control; for it has learned to deny all authority and all knowledge greater or surer than its own. And hence we constantly read of such violent ebullitions and such sudden changes of popular sentiment in America as would be impossible to England; and we find that Congress and the Executive change as quickly and completely as the mob. The mob can feel no shame at its own fickleness, for fickleness, practised by the people, becomes a virtue. The public men who follow the popular voice feel no shame in their own tergiversation; for no Northern statesman ever dreams of such a thing as resistance, in the name of right, to the will of the majority. And therefore in those which are now the "United States" there is no rallying-point to stem the current of popular frenzy; there is scarcely the hope of a reaction, for none are strong or bold enough to commence it.

There is a theory, gradually obtaining general acceptance among medical men, known by the name of the duality of the brain. It is supposed that one of the two great divisions of the human brain acts as a check or balance to the other; correcting its aberrations and erroneous perceptions, and restraining its extravagances; and many peculiar cases of delusions of the senses, recognised as such by the sufferers, and of tendencies towards insanity, restrained and controlled by the will, are attributed to this dual action. In the brain of a healthy society, this sort of mutual correction is continually going on between the Few and the Many; the eccentricities of the latter being constantly restrained by the coolness of the former. It is this duality which preserves the sanity of a nation, as of an individual; and where, as in the Northern States, the Many are all in all we have a nation manifestly on the high road to that loss of reason which is the premonitory symptom of national ruin. And in truth at this moment the Northern nation appears to be in the agonies of insanity. For years past those observers have seen with alarm the development of symptoms indicating the approach of such a calamity. That moral disease which the Latin tongue emphatically describes as impotentia—the helpless weakness of a man or a people that has lost all power over self, and yields to every impulse of passion without dreaming of resistance—that tendency to embrace any new and strange delusion that might tickle a morbid fancy or amuse a clouded brain which produces what is called monomania—that incapacity to apply the control of common sense to the vagaries of the imagination or of the intellect, which the medical theory above described would attribute to the infection of the sound brain by the diseased one—all these melancholy premonitions of the coming affliction have been long discernible in the conduct of the people of the Northern States. "Isms" religious, physical, political, and social, have been produced among them with alarming rapidity of succession. We have seen Mormonism, Universalism, Spirittrapping, "Free-Love,"—that is, the apotheosis of unbalanced lust, Communism, Socialism, Abolitionism, Woman's Rights, Bloomerism—all the most hideous phantoms that the imagination of a demoralized people ever pictured upon the darkness of ignorance and vice, paraded, accepted, worshipped as realities, as scientific and political achievements of unrivalled importance, even as divine revelations; and we might have been sure that the end was not far off, and that unless some wonderful and most unexpected change should take place, the brain of this haunted, tormented, Heaven-forsaken nation must give way under the first heavy shock that should befall it. The shock came; and ever since the election of Abraham Lincoln—which in itself was hardly the act of a sane people—the conduct of the Northern States has been marked by symptoms of aggravated and ever-increasing insanity. The brutal savagery which distinguishes the conduct of the war—a war professedly waged, at least, in the outset, for the restoration of the Union—is hardly intelligible on any theory which does not attribute some form of national insanity to the North. The burning of defenceless plantations, the murder of unarmed citizens, guilty of no offence and charged with none, on their own threshold—wholesale, outrageous, purposeless insult to women, condemned as "infamous" even by those who speak with diplomatic reserve and under official responsibilities—expeditions sent out for no other purpose but to burn, steal, and slay—other expeditions sent, time after time, to accomplish what every general in the North must know to be impossible; are these the acts of a Christian and civilized people, in its sober senses;—or the acts of such a people, debased by insanity to the moral level of wild beasts, while retaining the destructive instincts and cunning of the savage and the physical power of the civilized man? The savage, nay, fiendish ferocity of language which distinguishes the public utterances of Northern orators—men, women and clergymen—the bloodthirsty and blasphemous prayers for the extermination of the Southern people—which are actually addressed to the God of Battles—the fearful execrations, the menaces, revolting even to read of, which are uttered by female lips and cheered by crowded audiences in Northern lecture-halls; are not all these things familiar to all medical men, as among the most painful and horrible of the incidents of insanity in some of its most hopeless forms? It is madness, if it be possible that a nation should be mad—it is the madness which springs in national, as in individual life, from extreme and unbridled wickedness; from the long repudiation of self-control, from a life spent in the habitual indulgence of the strong and fierce passions of a corrupted nature. It is that madness which some anciently believed to be the natural punishment of crimes which Heaven could no longer endure, and to be the immediate forerunner of yet more signal and terrible vengeance—the madness which falls on him whose destruction has been resolved on high.

A Short Sketch of Lieut.-General Stonewall Jackson, U.S.A.

THIS remarkable man, who was the object of universal pride and affection on the part of his soldiers, was born in a small town in the western part of the State of Virginia, on the Kanawha River, some 200 miles from the city of Richmond, about the year 1821. His height was about six feet; his person of medium size, and somewhat angular; his eye, yellowish grey, and very calm and cold in action, but brilliant and pleasing in social conversation; Roman nose, sharp and expressive; small, forward chin, thin lips, close and compressed in action; angular brow; and light brown hair. No likeness has done him justice. The expression of his face was rather stern in action, but happy in social intercourse; he was fond of the society of ladies, with whom he conversed freely and cheerfully. He was impulsive, silent, and emphatic in all matters pertaining to his profession. His dress was official, but plain, and often became much tarnished by long marches and exposure in battles; his cap-front usually projected nearly to his nose. His tall horse diminished the effect of his size. He was a good rider, if not a graceful one; and when in the presence of the enemy, it was difficult to keep up with him.

In his religious character, he was not, as some have represented, a fatalist; but, on the contrary, he believed, most implicitly, in the great fact, that God is a Sovereign, and that He is also our Father; and he was wont, therefore, to go to Him in every emergency, and lean upon Him in every doubt, danger, and in the hour of darkness. No one placed more entire and childlike confidence in prayer than Stonewall Jackson; and yet no one exerted himself more continuously or more desperately than he; saying to the Almighty, "Help me;" and then acting as if he had to do it all himself.

In his moral and religious conduct, he was a model of an upright man, and a humble, devoted, and consistent follower of his Master. Entirely free from bigotry, he was a truly Catholic-minded man; and yet so zealous and devout, that he divided his Sundays between the public worship of God, and going privately among his men distributing tracts, &c.

I give a few incidents to illustrate these traits of character.

When he was under command at Bull Run, he maintained such an impassive composure, whether exposed to the terrible fire of the artillery, or the more destructive musketry of the enemy, calmly holding his ground when others wavered, that General Bee, of South Carolina, said to others:—"See how Jackson stands there like a stone wall in the face of the enemy."

In the midst of the terrible cannonade at the battle of Fredericksburg, when I counted the number of shot and shell, during fifteen minutes, that fell within a hundred yards of the position that he and I occupied, and estimated them at 500 during the action, he was seen calmly sitting on his horse, with his hand raised, as if in prayer. Just before the action, and while the enemy were getting into position on the plain, which General Lee had prepared as a slaughter pen for them, Generals Lee and Jackson, with their staff officers, were on the crest of a hill, overlooking the whole magnificent field about five miles long. They were both dressed in new military cloaks and caps. As I ascended the hill, General Lee handed his field-glass to Jackson, pointing to Sumner's corps. As they advanced to our right, he carefully examined the immense numbers of fine-looking troops as they deployed along the distant road, handed back the glass, and after watching them for a few minutes, as if he were working out a problem in algebra, he quietly turned his horse and rode directly across that plain and in front of our lines, giving those orders which resulted in saving so many of our lives. I shall never forget that scene, nor the stern composure of Jackson, as he there contemplated the dreadful work of the morrow.

Nor, on the contrary, shall I soon forget the brilliant animation of eye and features, and the warm grasp of his hand, as I lately took leave of him in his tent, at Massaponix Run; I alluded to his own views of success in battles, and that it did not depend upon numbers or munitions of war, and that his own success was because he was a simple-hearted Christian in his entire dependence upon God. He replied, "God has done it all."

It is proper that I should name some of the engagements in which he acted either an important part, or was in sole command:—At Bull Run, at Kernstown, at Front Royal, Middletown, Winchester, Stranburg, Harrisonburg, Port Republic, near Mechanicsville, Cold Harbour, White Oak Swamp, Malvern Hill, Cedar Mountain, Manassas, Sudley, Chantilly, Martinsburg, Harper's Ferry, Antietam, Shephardstown, Fredericksburg, the Wilderness (his last battle). In all these engagements the enemy had a larger force, more artillery, more ammunition, &c.

At Kernstown, Jackson was deceived and entrapped by false information, and if he had hesitated for a moment his whole command would have been routed. He had only 6,000 men; the enemy had more than 18,000. He attacked the enemy, and maintained the action until night, and then drew off his men; the enemy also fell back. Federal loss, 200 killed, 500 wounded; and large numbers scattered through the country, some of them escaping in regiments, without guns or baggage, some sixty miles to Alexandria; Jackson's loss 260 killed and wounded, and 230 prisoners. He was remarkable for long, rapid marches, as well as brilliant actions.

He knew how to appreciate and use such men as Major-General Ewell, and Major-General J. R. Primble, who, with other like men, were the material with which he marched and fought. General Jackson was not a novice in the art of war, uneducated and unskilled, but, having had a severe military and mathematical education at West Point Academy, and much experience in the Mexican war, and taught in the military academy of Virginia, he stands prominent among his military peers as an illustrious example of the value of scientific training. May it not be said, as the grave closes over this remarkable man, that nations admire and weep over his early death?

A Reminiscence of Stonewall Jackson.

A MOURNFUL interest now attaches to all that illustrates the character of the Christian hero whose untimely death is lamented by all generous minds on both sides of the Atlantic. The following is an extract from a private letter, received some time since, by the Rev. Dr. M. D. Hoge, of Richmond, now in London, from his brother, residing at Charlottesville, Virginia. Though, in homage to the honoured dead, we are now permitted to publish it, this simple narrative of a day spent in Jackson's intimacy was written only for a brother's eye:—

I have just returned from a visit to General Jackson's headquarters, at Moss Neck, the grand mansion of Mr. —, some ten miles from Fredericksburg. The General modestly occupies the lower room of one of the offices in the yard. As soon as I arrived, General Jackson claimed me as his guest, and I gladly spent what time I could with him. I found Mr. — regularly ensconced in his office, as a sort of chaplain general, not officially, of course, but virtually. His work is partly to increase the number of chaplains, placing them where most needed, and partly to preach himself wherever there is need of it in the corps. His position is very important, and his residence with General Jackson not only furthers his influence, but is personally profitable to him. Indeed, it seems hardly possible to be long in the society of that noble and honoured General, that simple-hearted, straightforward, laborious, devoted man of God, without catching something of his spirit—the spirit of toil, of patience, of modesty, of careful conscientiousness, of child-like dependence on God, of fervent, believing prayer. While I was in camp I preached five times in the Stonewall brigade. How the men crowded into their log church, how they listened, how they seemed to hang upon the word, you, of all men, need least to be told, for you have seen so much of them from the beginning of the war. On Sunday night, after preaching, the General, Mr. —, and myself, had a long talk, as we sat drying our boots in front of the open fire. When it was near 11 o'clock the General asked me to conduct worship; and afterwards, before retiring, he set us the example of kneeling again for secret prayer. He then shared his bed upon the floor with me, and we talked till long after midnight. Though usually taciturn, he led the conversation. How anxious he was for his army! How anxious for himself! How manifest it was that he is a man whose great desire is to be right in all things, and especially to be right before God! In our whole intercourse I could not detect the slightest trace of self-importance, ostentation, or seeking after vainglory. To glorify God possessed all his thoughts. "I have been thinking a great deal about our chief end lately," said he, "and I think the first answer in our catechism tells it all; man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy Him for ever; and I think," he added, "we need not trouble ourselves much about the second part, if we only attend well to the first. I find my life in camp a very happy one when I am enabled to keep this aim steadily before me—to live for the glory of God." I found him very earnest also in his views as to our duties to the negroes. He used to teach a Sunday-school for coloured children in Lexington, and all the pressure of his great duties and cares does not divert his thoughts from the spiritual interests of our servants.

The Derby Day.

On the 20th day of this month England, or, perhaps, to speak more correctly, London, paid her annual tribute of respect to the sport of horse-racing. The Derby Day, with its vivid scenes of purposed folly, ludicrous incident, grotesque combination of business and pleasure, careless riot and real anxiety, has been a thousand times portrayed to the unwearied reader, and tested by the experience of indefatigable visitors. Its grand feature is, that, like the old god Janus, it presents itself under two forms, and thereby adapts itself to two classes of votaries. First, there is the race; second, there is the turn-out, the excursion, the picnic, for which the race is a mere excuse, and in comparison with the importance or the delight of which the race is a bagatelle—a part of the programme certainly, but by no means equal in importance to the momentous journey to and fro, and perhaps to be reckoned in the same scale as the "chaff" or the champagne. Just, then, as the mind of each individual visitor is enlisted in favour of one of these two forms, so will his opinion be of the relative amount of enjoyment extracted from any given Derby Day as compared with other anniversaries. On the whole, it is pretty clear that the lover of racing, for its own sake, occupies a more enviable position than the mere pleasure-seeker; for to him that formidable adversary, the weather, is very nearly a matter of indifference, while to his companion a north-east wind and a strong rain form insuperable obstacles to the realization of any dreams of enjoyment. Wednesday, the 20th day of May, was certainly signalized by the foulest weather that can well be imagined. It was windy, cold, and wet; the roads were miry, filthy, abominable; the mud such as even the armies on the Rappahannock would not have disdained. It was a trying time for class number two. As compared with last year, the attendance was less by one-third; yet how could the popularity of the day have been better proved? It is a marvel that any one person of the pleasure-seeking class went at all. Yet they did go, and were numbered by thousands and myriads. On the other hand, those who went to see the race came home not in the cleanest of clothes, nor in the most comfortable condition; but they had seen a wonderful race, their interest had been more than usually excited, and they were satisfied.

Of the history of this famous annual contest, it will be sufficient for the purpose to state that it was instituted eighty-three years ago, and that it rose with great rapidity to its present position as the greatest of all races. Noble names appear in the list of owners of winning horses, and the prize has been successfully contested by a Prince of Wales, the Dukes of York, Bedford, Grafton, and Rutland, and the Lords Derby, Egremont, Jersey, and Eglinton. As are the Two Thousand Guinea Stakes at Newmarket and the St. Leger Stakes at Doncaster, so is the Derby confined to horses of the age of three years. The entrances are made in the case of each of these three races, when the intended competitors are yet yearlings; and all the animals which eventually start for the Derby pay a subscription of £50, the absentees paying a moiety of that sum. The number of horses entered for the race of 1863 was 255, and the net value of the stakes reached the sum of £7,000. The male competitors carry 122 lbs., and the female sex is favoured with a reduction of five pounds in weight. Such are the conditions of the race. As to the course, perhaps the less said the better; but it is at least painful to think that the noblest animals are made to stake their reputation, and men are compelled to venture enormous sums in a contest waged on ground, which undoubtedly tests the endurance of the animal to a marvellous extent, but which is unfavourable to the grandest class of horses, and peculiarly adapted for the consummation of accidents. The best idea of its shape can, perhaps, be conceived by a comparison of the course to a syphon, the starting post being placed at the end of the longer leg, and the winning post at the end of the shorter leg of the instrument. The whole distance of the course is one mile and a half. The first half-mile is a steady ascent, the next half-mile a rather steep descent, and the remainder of the course rises in a very decided, though by no means abrupt manner. The turn at the lower bend of the syphon is unpleasantly sharp, and, as the hill is just at that point peculiarly steep, the occurrence of such an accident as will be presently noticed is less marvellous than the fact that the little Surrey village of Epsom, with so indifferent a course, should have acquired or retained so grand a reputation. The lower bend of the course, or "Tattenham Corner," marks the point at which the competitors burst upon the view of the spectators in the Grand Stand and at the Winning-Post; just below that point the horses reach the foot of the descent and come fairly into the "straight." Their perils are not even then at an end, for an ugly carriage-way has to be passed, which, though carefully covered with loose grass, has more than once proved sufficiently suspicious to the eye of the horse to induce him to jump the road at the imminent risk of smashing his joints, a contingency twice realized within the last seven years, and in both instances in the case of the leading horse. It we add that the last quarter of a mile has the additional aggravation of being on a side-hill, enough will have been said to show that Epsom boasts the most distressing and the most perilous of courses.

Thirty-one horses made their appearance at a quarter past 3 on the eventful day to take part in the contest, and as they cantered singly or by twos and threes past the Stand they certainly seemed not unworthy of the occasion. Maccaroni, the winner of the Two Thousand Guinea Stakes at Newmarket, was, in point of health and condition, perfect, and his victory in that race, at least, entitled him to a more favourable notice than that which audaciously placed his chance at the odds of ten to one. At the same time it is impossible to say that he is in appearance an attractive animal. Very sound, with capital points and the widest of hips, he yet lacks the style and grandeur which the Derby colt must have to be the popular favourite; and good and honest as he may be, it may well be doubted whether his fame will be handed down through a line of victorious descendants. His stoutness may be thought to disprove the assertion that his sire Sweetmeat has the taint of lack of endurance; but it must be recollected that his maternal grandsire is Pantaloon, and his grand-dam, the celebrated Banter, the mother of Touchstone, the stoutest of all known race-horses. The Rapid Rhone, one of Lord Glasgow's three, was pronounced "a coarse coach horse" with the same assurance which despised Voltigeur thirteen years ago, and odds of fifty to one were betted against him, with Clario and Lord Glasgow's other colt thrown into the bargain. The Gillie, who with Hospodar competed for the honour of being second favourite, betrayed his sire, Tadmar, too unmistakably to justify the belief that the Derby course could be to his taste; and the French Hospodar, looking a far better horse than he did at Newmarket, had yet defied the attempts of his trainer to alter the shape of his absurd fore legs, and to render him capable of galloping down hill. King of the Vale was magnificent in stature, size, and form, and looked dangerous enough on a day that so well suited a powerful horse; and Saccharometer, who ran second for the Two Thousand Guineas, at Newmarket, was pretty as ever, but without visible pretensions for effecting the overthrow of his then conqueror. But the favourite, Lord Clifden, was the true object of admiration; faultless in shape, yet decidedly a great horse, with power and speed everywhere visible, a stride that, once seen, cannot be forgotten;—quiet and dignified, as though he appreciated the occasion and the expectations concerning him, he seemed to justify the confidence of his owner and the public as amply as Wild Dayrell had done under similar circumstances—the odds laid against him were four to one.

The race itself was remarkable. First, it was quite in vain that the starter attempted to marshal the troop of horses in line. Twenty-nine horses were obedient even to docility, but Blue Mantle studiously clung to the front, and Tambour Major hung desperately to the rear. For forty minutes in cold and rain the crowd chewed the cud of their impatience, and the owners endured the painful suspense. At length the claims of Tambour Major were disregarded, and the line was despatched without him. The order of running as far as the upper bend of the course need not be observed, but shortly after commencing the descent, which attains its greatest magnitude at the lower bend, Saccharometer and King of the Vale rolled the one over the other, and Fantastic, jumping the former, was precipitated head foremost. The chance of all three was, of course, annihilated, and now Lord Clifden rushed to the front, holding a clear lead of more than a length, as the line burst upon the view of the spectators in the Stand, and gained possession of the straight run-in. He began to climb the final ascent with the same commanding lead, Maccaroni, the Rapid Rhone, and Blue Mantle fighting, it would seem, only for second place. At the Stand matters had undergone no change, and while the rider of Maccaroni was already prepared for the use of whip and spurs, the Favourite was galloping with undisturbed tranquillity. Suddenly he changed legs, that unerring mark of fatigue, and with a dash of amazing power, Maccaroni rushed to the front; it was too late for Lord Clifden to recover his stride, and he was beaten on the post by the shortest of heads. The Rapid Rhone was third, but half a length from the Favourite, and Blue Mantle followed him. The French horse, Hospodar, was defeated as hopelessly as he had been a few weeks before at Newmarket. The disappointment at the overthrow of the favourite extended far beyond the mere interests involved in a pecuniary point of view, and was intensified by the reaction from the joy that had greeted his assumed success but a few seconds previously. It may be presumptuous to criticise the skill of so accomplished a jockey as Fordham, but it must, we think, be conceded that he was not only out-generalled by Challoner, but that he failed to show his accustomed caution in the middle, or his admirable vigour at the finish of the race. The winnings of Mr. Naylor, the owner of Maccaroni, are said to amount to £70,000, but of the half million of money that is supposed to change hands on the event of the Derby, we imagine that the principal portion has gone into the pockets of the bookmakers.

The Romans under the Empire found it quite impossible to enjoy the exciting scenes of the circus without the risk of faction, of riot and of bloodshed. The White and Red, the Green and Cærulean Blue absorbed the passions, the lives and the interests of thousands of the degenerate mob, and the patronage of these mad follies was among the worst features in the reigns even of such men as Commodus and Caracalla. Transplanted to Constantinople, the evil thrived in a congenial soil, and the Greens, under the approval of Anastasius, avenged defeat in the circus by the slaughter of three thousand Blues; while these, in their turn, destroyed half the public buildings of the city, and thirty thousand of their foes in the famous Nika faction. On the other hand, the old Greeks thought it right to proclaim by peace-heralds throughout the land that the holy month had commenced, and that warfare, while the games of Elis were being celebrated, was sacrilege. The French Government would not venture to fill the race course at Longchamps with the holiday folk of Paris, except under the guardian care of two thousand bayonets. Yet at Epsom a small body of police, whose time is alternately occupied in seizing pickpockets, and carrying off those of their own body who have found the scene too joyous and the malt liquor too potent, are amply sufficient to keep the peace among the vast multitude. The love of order is characteristic of Englishmen, but on this great festival, which is to them more than the carnival to the Italian, or the bull-fight to the Spaniard, they surpass themselves; and neither the most miserable weather, nor even the melancholy defeat of the horse which they had chosen for their favourite, can make them forget that the day is sacred, and that to be morose or violent, irritable or turbulent, would be an offence, not only against the festival, but also against that confidence which is fearlessly placed in them.

A SECOND "UNCLE TOM'S CABIN."*

It is almost a maxim in English criminal practice that "an alibi is the worst defence that can be made to an indictment." Not because it is not logically conclusive, for nothing can be more certain than that, if A was dining with B and C at Greenwich at seven on Tuesday night, he could not at the same hour have been engaged in the robbery of D's house at Hampstead; nor because it is liable to fail in default of evidence, for nothing can be more easily susceptible of proof; but simply because it is of all defences the most easy to invent, the most likely to be resorted to by the guilty and supported by perjury, and therefore the most open to suspicion. Similarly, we may say that the publication of the journal of one who has lived on a Southern plantation is radically bad as evidence in favour of the assertions of Abolitionists, disproved as they are by a mass of reliable testimony on the other side; not because such a journal, if thoroughly truthful, honest, and impartial, would not furnish the most conclusive witness, as regards the sphere of the writer's observation, that could be given; but simply because nothing can be more easy than to get such a journal written to order, or to procure it from some Southern renegade, some man afflicted with that bitter hatred of his former friends which characterises the whole race of apostates, or some woman who desires to revenge her own misconduct and disgrace upon those who are conscious how she earned her present position. Of all such witnesses, had we an Abolitionist conscience and the management of the Northern case, we should probably prefer the last, both as more likely to win public credence, and as capable of more wilful, wanton, wicked, and malignant untruthfulness than male ingenuity can attain,—

"For men at most differ as Heaven and Earth,
But women, worst and best, as Heaven and Hell.

And if there were presented to us an Englishwoman willing to give the testimony, most likely to excite the feelings of her countrymen, and furnished with that knowledge of Southern life which would enable her to give her story the benefit of a true local colouring; one, too, whose intimacy with an Abolitionist family in the North had made her thoroughly familiar with the tricks of their trade, while her marriage with a planter would seem to the public to render her a competent and fair witness, and her divorce from him would assure, to any one who knows the evil side of female nature, that she would be towards him and his class the most malignantly and unscrupulously hostile witness that we could possibly produce; a woman whose profession had made her name familiar to all of us, while it had caused her marriage to be looked upon with a jealous eye, and excluded her from the best society of the South; a woman who had shown the tenderness of her conscience by her passionate denunciations of the wickedness of slavery, and the wrongfulness of living on the unpaid labour of slaves, while she proved the strength of her mind by nevertheless marrying a slaveowner, and freely enjoying the profits of his iniquity; a woman who, on her own showing, was well, kindly, and generously treated by her husband, and who nevertheless was all the time writing to a female friend letters reviling him, his order, and the institutions to which he was attached as a proprietor and as a citizen; a woman who could play the spy in her husband's household, and the agitator among his people, and who could tell us without shame that she had made it her business to do so; a woman who, after leading her husband to waste his money in ruinous speculations, or in the gratification of feminine extravagance, could desert him and turn upon him in his adversity; and who, when the laws of his country were invoked to release him from a hateful and unhallowed union, and to put asunder "them whom God had nowise joined," could defend herself by threatening to publish the results of her domestic treachery and espionage—we should certainly consider that Fortune had given the Southerners for the time into the hands of their enemies. What might not be made out of such a witness, if only her evidence were carefully pruned and toned down to the semblance of probability and an affectation of the modesty of nature? Something of coarseness would always be perceptible; vulgarity, bad faith, and malice would always be discernible by the close observer, but with a prejudiced court, and that lax cross-examination which the criticism of the press generally accords as the right of women, her evidence might surely be trusted to secure a verdict.

We say that a journal might be written by such a person, in the spirit and temper we have described; and that, if so written, it would undoubtedly be caught up eagerly by the Abolitionists, and published in London with a preliminary flourish of trumpets under the special patronage of the American Embassy, and the organs which receive inspiration and support from that quarter. And because such things are conceivable, we look with suspicion on this kind of evidence; and even though the journal now before us bears the signature of Frances A. Kemble, formerly the wife of Mr. Pierce Butler—an estimable Pennsylvanian gentleman and Georgian planter—we decline to put implicit faith in its statements until such time as we shall know the circumstances which led to the publication of such a book by a lady in that position at the present moment; the reasons why it was not published twenty years ago; and all the other particulars which a cross-examining counsel might fairly demand, in order to test the credibility of the witness. Until this essential condition is fulfilled we do not think it necessary to examine the details of her evidence. It is hardly worth while to ask what they prove, until we know whether any credit is to be given to them. The lady's veracity may be as unimpeachable as her professional reputation; or her ideas of truth may be as peculiar as those notions with regard to the construction of the English language which lead her to speak of trees, men, birds, and beasts by the generic name of creatures, and to pronounce the Shad of the Altamaha the "heavenliest creature" in existence. Her sense of justice and her love of accuracy may be as exquisite as the taste she displays in reading Shakespeare's English, or as eccentric as that displayed by some passages of her own composition. But until we know something more of her credibility as a witness, we must remain in absolute uncertainty; remembering only on the one hand that she is an Englishwoman, and on the other that she is a divorcée; and in the meantime we forbear from entering into a minute examination of her book.

We have only a very few words to say which bear upon the value of her evidence rather than on its credibility. Mr. Butler was a Pennsylvanian, though he had adopted the name of an excellent Carolinian family, and received a Southern inheritance. He was, therefore, no fair specimen of a Southern planter; for he was not a man born and brought up among his slaves. Again, he was habitually an absentee; and absentee planters naturally have the worst plantations and most miserable labourers, just the same as the estates of absentees in Ireland are distinguished by the wretchedness of their appearance and the squalor of the peasantry. Absenteeism is proverbially fatal to the well-being of the absentee's dependants, free or slave, and Northern men are proverbial in the South as harsh, unkind, and unpopular masters. We believe, moreover, that the conduct of Mr. Butler, in some subsequent dealings with his property, was such as to cause a good deal of coolness between him and his neighbours, who considered that he had hardly shown that care for his people which a Southern slaveowner should show. Therefore, he is on the whole an unfavourable example of his class, as stranger by birth and absentee by choice; and from any charges established by him, no general conclusions can be drawn applicable to the great body of Southern gentlemen.

Again, we notice a curious inconsistency in the statements of the journalist with regard to the treatment of the slaves. She represents them as suffering terribly from neglect, want, and scanty supplies of food and clothing; she speaks of the women as having their health destroyed by overwork, and as losing above half their children from the treatment they received. And this though food and clothing for slaves were admittedly very cheap, and slave property exceedingly valuable. Nor was Mr. Butler a harsh, cruel, or indifferent master. We are told how, on more than one occasion, he, the doctor, and the overseer, sat up all night with a sick or dying slave—and these not house servants, but field hands; we are told how once, after being abused by his wife about the separation of a family, which was no fault of his, in such a tone that even she, on reflection, felt ashamed of herself, he went without giving her a word of reply, and bought the wife and children of his slave, to prevent their separation; and then we are expected to believe that he was not only cruel enough, but foolish enough, to sacrifice the health of his female slaves by allowing them to be systematically put to work too soon after their confinements;—and that of all his people by leaving them to fall victims to disease engendered by want of sufficient food, by unavoidable filth, by inadequate shelter, by scanty clothing, and all the evils which attend on abject poverty in lands where slavery is unknown. Now it is possible that a cruel man might neglect his immediate interests in order to gratify the passion of the moment, or that a careless man might allow his property to go to ruin for want of adequate attention. But that a man fairly humane and tolerably alive to the considerations of prudence should allow negroes to perish for want of things so cheap and easily bestowed as food and shelter, or should ruin his own property by over-tasking women at a time when interest—to say nothing of higher considerations—would induce him to be peculiarly tender towards them, is simply a moral impossibility. The authoress does not seem to perceive the absurdity of the conduct she attributes to her husband; but it must be plain enough to every rational observer. Where corn is almost too cheap to have a price, and pigs may be reared by simply giving them the range of the woods, it is impossible that negro children can have been allowed to die for want of adequate sustenance and care, if for no other reason than that they would cost their owner little or nothing till they reached the working age, and would then be worth at least £100 apiece.

But there is one piece of evidence in this book to which we may certainly give credence. Negroes at the South are slaves; but they are neither spurned as offensive nor neglected as worthless animals. At the North they are free; but how they are treated let our Abolitionist witness tell us:—

If, in the early portion of their life, they escape the contempt and derision of their white associates—if the blessed unconsciousness and ignorance of childhood keeps them for a few years unaware of the conventional proscription under which their whole race is placed (and it is difficult to walk your streets, and mark the tone of insolent superiority assumed by even the gutter-urchins over their dusky cotemporaries, and imagine this possible)—as soon as they acquire the first rudiments of knowledge, as soon as they begin to grow up and pass from infancy to youth, as soon as they cast the first observing glance upon the world by which they are surrounded, and the society of which they are members, they must become conscious that they are marked as the Hebrew lepers of old, and are condemned to sit, like those unfortunates, without the gates of every human and social sympathy. From their own sable colour, a pall falls over the whole of God's universe to them, and they find themselves stamped with a badge of infamy of Nature's own devising, at sight of which all natural kindness of man to man seems to recoil from them. They are not slaves indeed, but they are pariahs; debarred from all fellowship save with their own despised race—scorned by the lowest white ruffian in your streets, not tolerated as companions even by the foreign menials in your kitchens. They are free certainly, but they are also degraded, rejected, the offscum and the offscouring of the very dregs of your society; they are free from the chain, the whip, the enforced task and unpaid toil of slavery; but they are not the less under a ban. Their kinship with slaves for ever bars them from a full share of the freeman's inheritance of equal rights, and equal consideration and respect. All hands are extended to thrust them out, all fingers point at their dusky skin; all tongues—the most vulgar, as well as the self-styled most refined—have learnt to turn the very name of their race into an insult and a reproach.

Subjectos tanquam suos; viles tanquam alienos. This is how those treat the negroes who do not hold them in servitude. Can the sympathies of reasoning men, after such evidence as this, go with the Northern champions of negro emancipation?

FEDERAL OUTRAGES ON CLERGYMEN.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—The Protestant Episcopal Church in the Confederate States of America has been duly organised; a constitution has been adopted, two general councils have been held; and every arrangement made for its future work. At the last general council, held in Savannah, George Bishop Elliot presided. Owing to the scarcity of books, &c., the Rev. Dr. Wilmer, formerly of St. Mark's Church, Philadelphia, was requested by several of the clergy and vestries to proceed to England, and procure a supply of Religious and Sunday School Church Literature. He was arrested, while on his way, by the Federal Government, and taken to Washington, where, having learned the errand on which he was sent, he was incarcerated in the "old Capitol Prison," with which the clergy of the Episcopal Church have become very well acquainted; there were three Episcopal clergy in that gaol at that time. One of them, the Rev. S. F. Cameron, had been requested by Dr. Stewart and others to proceed to Baltimore, and procure Bibles for the use of the army and Federal prisoners in the Libby Prisons. The agents of the Federal Government caught him with a trunk full of Bibles, and some children's shoes; so they cast him into the Bastille at Washington. Tears were in his eyes, and the officers asked him why he wept. He replied, "Those shoes were for poor little bare-footed orphan children, whose parents you have killed, and whose homes you have burned down." Dr. Cameron had been unwearied, in many battles, ministering to the wants of wounded and dying Federal officers and soldiers, many of whom will remember how, in Stonewall Jackson's battles, he gave them his own bread, water, and every aid in binding up their bleeding wounds. If any of them should see this, will they not take some trouble for him, as he languishes in prison?

Another clerical prisoner was known as Stonewall Jackson's chaplain; he was taken from his bed at night, when at home with his family. A detachment of Federal officers and soldiers lately proceeded to Leesburg, Virginia, and attempted to arrest the Rev. Charles E. Nourse, a Presbyterian minister; while sick and in bed at home and at midnight. Mr. Nourse declined going with them, stating "My daughter is recovering from a typhoid fever, and I cannot leave her." But when the captain attempted to call in his guard and force him off, Mr. Nourse knocked him down, and escaped. The chief honour is, however, accorded to the Episcopal clergy in these persecutions. A late military edict establishes an "interdict!" in all that part of Virginia now in Federal possession near Washington city, and no minister of that Church is permitted publicly to worship God, unless he deigns himself to change the Liturgy of the Diocese to accord with the wishes of the General in Command!!

This does not apply to the Church of Rome, for it would seem that the Federal Government was more afraid of the Irish than of God; or that the English and anti-Puritan element in the Episcopal Church was peculiarly obnoxious to them. During the occupation of Stafford Heights, Falmouth, &c., by the Federal army they took possession of a church for commissary purposes, and used the communion table as a butcher's block! One who heard of it, and contemplated the pews doors covered with blood, repeated the old words, "Proh pudor!" They drove all the Episcopal clergy from Alexandria, took possession, forcibly, of the Theological Seminary (the training school for ministers), the chapel, professors' houses, &c.; destroyed the choice libraries of the clergy; used the buildings for barracks, hospitals, &c., writing indecent and impious things over the walls, burnt houses, destroyed fences, imprisoned ministers, even taking them from the altar on the Lord's Day while celebrating divine worship, and carried the priest, robed in his surplice, through a mob of street loafers, and shut him up under an armed guard,—and for no other cause than that, when the Secretary of State sent an agent into the Church who interrupted the Litany, and demanded that the minister should offer up such a prayer as he should dictate, the minister simply proceeded with the prescribed Litany, without taking any notice of the officer. But time and space would fail to state the sufferings of the clergy of the Episcopal Church, not to speak of others. When Stonewall Jackson was conversing with the writer just before the late battle, it was observed: "General, it does not depend upon man, money, numbers, or munitions of war; your own past success has resulted, and your future will result from the fact that God is King, and that thousands of widows orphans, homeless wanderers, and ministers of religion, are pointing to their desecrated churches, their ruined homes, and new-made graves, and crying day and night to Him who says, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay." "Ah!" said he, "that is my dependence."

Notwithstanding Dr. Wilmer's imprisonment, an effort is being made to procure Sunday school and other books in this city for the Confederate States.

Yours, &c.,
RICHMOND.

A SOUTHERN REPLY TO "HISTORICUS."

(No. 1.)

A letter signed "Historicus" appeared in the London Times, of the 7th of November, 1862. It has been considered an exposition not only of the policy adopted by Great Britain in regard to the Confederate States, but of the principle upon which that policy rests. It is intended, as we suppose, to challenge for its own concurrence and respect. If the policy of Great Britain at this time in the determination of its conduct towards the Confederate States rested upon any principle now recognised by the nations of the world, as that which governs them in their conduct towards any political community; claiming its right to be admitted to the family of nations; no complaint or remonstrance would be uttered or heard. If without its adoption by the nations of Europe, Great Britain itself and alone, had in any manner declared that principle to be her guide, which now "Historicus" asserts directs her conduct; the Confederate States would scarcely compromise the self-respect dear to nations as to individuals; by a persistence in their efforts to secure their recognition. For these Confederate States have rights which they are justly entitled to claim from the United States; and they have rights even now, which they can with equal justice claim from the nations of the world. These rights, we will now consider, as they affect other nations; and such rights produce in their turn their correlatives, among which are high and solemn duties to be performed by those upon whom they devolve.

It will not be assumed too hastily that the Confederate States have asked more from Great Britain than was their right. Nor will it be denied that although not recognised, they have rights which are not the less clear because they may not be enforced. We have seen this in the declaration that the Confederate States are entitled to the rights of belligerents. They have this, and they have other rights; because all political communities, in whatever condition they exist, occupy certain relations to all other political communities. Out of these relations, certain rules are derived. Whether founded in selfishness or philanthropy they are nevertheless rules which must be recognised. One of these is, that communities must war with each other according to the mode which the consent of nations has determined to be proper. Every organised community has a right, therefore, to this rule.

When civil war is developed, and breaks the bonds in which

Government has held and controlled the society over which its authority was administered, it creates two parties, who occupy to each other the relations of public enemies. They have not, nor can they have a common judge. The international rule recognised everywhere, gives to each, the rights of equal parties in the contest. It is only thus that interference is avoided in their domestic concerns; the right secured to each to manage their affairs in their own way; and no violence done to "the essential attributes of their respective sovereignty." "For a nation to be entitled to respect in foreign States to the enjoyment of these attributes, and to figure directly in the great political society, it is sufficient that it is sovereign and independent; that it governs itself by its own authority and laws."

If, then, the Confederate States have certain rights, it will not be considered that Great Britain has discharged herself of the duties which are the correlatives of those rights, if by the neglect or denial of such rights such duties have not been performed. In the discussion of this question, there will not be any occasion to resort to argument, however easy and inviting it would be, to establish the rights of the Confederate States, or the duties of Great Britain. It will be sufficient to refer to her own acts; to repeat her own declarations; to insist upon no higher right than that she concedes; to impose no higher duty than that she admits. It is by her own faith we shall consider her professions; it is by her own standard we shall examine her conduct. And if it shall be made to appear, that with the most careful reflection, the Government of that country has published to the world the principles which it declared would govern it in a case like this; and now with the first occasion for the application of these principles, denies them and their application; the reproach of that Minister who said that Great Britain had two interpretations of every rule, one when applied to its own interest, another when it affected the interests of other nations, will have found a new justification for the severity involved in the rebuke.

It seems to have been assumed for the purpose of the argument of "Historicus," that the several States which composed the United States of North America sustained the same relation to the Government of the United States, as subsisted between Spain and the Spanish American colonies. Perhaps no illustration could be found more expressive of the confusion which is entertained of the relation of these States with each other, than that which is thus presented. And probably not even now, in the States which still adhere as the United States, would this illustration of their present political union by a reference to the connection between the Spanish American colonies and Spain, be received by them as historically or politically true. But the case of the Spanish American colonies, nevertheless, has a very decided influence upon the question now to be discussed. It will illustrate a principle of great consequence in determining the duty of Great Britain, and it will prove how enlightened was the statesmanship which then directed and controlled her policy.

It was in the correspondence which took place concerning the recognition by Great Britain of these Spanish American colonies, that the principle which governed Great Britain in relation to new Governments was placed by Mr. Canning upon those grounds—which have always subsequently been reiterated in explicit and positive terms—creating rights for those who are entitled to recognition or intervention, and duties for those who become bound to recognise or intervene. It was thus that the doctrine now contended for by "Historicus" received that qualification, which changed it from a cold and meaningless formula, to an active, living principle; reflecting the sentiment which the civilization of the age demanded. The statement too of the principle was in terms clear and direct. And there was no room for misconception, when at the same time it was practically adopted and applied to an existing state of public affairs. That principle has been since then expanded; high motives have been admitted to affect it; wide considerations enlarge its application. It was gratifying to all who watch the progress of civilization to believe that in such cases as now call forth this discussion, that conduct would be pursued by the leading Powers of the world, so solemnly announced, so consistent with every sentiment of justice and humanity.

It is true the Spanish American colonies had been engaged with Spain in a struggle which lasted many years. But it may surely be presumed that in this great question of public right there is not to be enforced any analogy to a statute of limitations. The fact of a present capacity for independence is the test. Its demonstration may be made in two years as well as twenty. No one has ventured to announce the proposition, that a certain number of lives must be lost, with which a new community must purchase an admission to the family of the Christian nations of the world. If these States were but revolted colonies, their citizens but rebellious subjects, the fact of a final separation from the Government of the United States—the fact of the capacity of the Confederate States to maintain that separation—the fact that the authority of the Government of the United States is not recognised in their limits—the fact that its laws are not, and cannot be enforced—are at this day unquestionable. In the Confederate States, therefore, internal sovereignty is indisputable. If so de facto, it is sufficient to establish it de jure. It is a State, says a publicist of repute, because it exists. This does not depend on recognition, but recognition follows as the consequence.

In the case then of a political community so circumstanced and yet not recognised, a question is presented for the consideration of the nations of the world, which seems in the case of the Confederate States to have been wholly overlooked. In that condition, of any political community, which is now exhibited by the Confederate States; the nations of the world have found the causes which may affect their own peace. To secure that peace, principles have been declared; and a course of conduct adopted in consistency with them. All organized Governments are mutually responsible to each other for the good conduct of those over whom their authority extended. All political communities must have an organized Government, for the control of those who compose it, and responsible to other nations for its duty in this respect. And if a portion of that people who have been under a common Government throw off its authority, other nations will require them to substitute, by the adoption of an organized Government, new obligations towards them. Recognition, therefore, of a new political community, is but the admission of the capacity of that community to maintain a separate political existence, and the imposition on the Government adopted by it, of the duties and obligations of every Government towards other nations.

It will be observed, that we are not now referring to the considerations which may affect recognition, so far as the welfare of the political community is concerned, which has been struggling for its freedom. We are directing attention to what may be called, but not invidiously, the selfish motive which prompts the action of the nations which do recognise.

It is a duty to themselves to place all communities under the safeguard which secures the good conduct of those who acknowledge a Government. That safeguard is the responsibility of the political community in its organized condition. Intervention, therefore, when it is necessary, and recognition are the modes in which the peace of the world is secured. New guarantees are thus obtained in place of those which have ceased to be effective; because the Government by which they were given has been overthrown; its authority is no longer obeyed, and its responsibility, therefore, cannot be enforced.

If this were not so, that a political community which has thrown off the authority of the Government, which formerly directed it, would be, with the evidence of its ability to maintain that independence, admitted to the family of nations, one of two consequences must ensue. The members of such a community must be either totally irresponsible as an unrecognised State; or they must be treated as pirates or outlaws. The first of these alternatives Mr. Canning declared to be "too absurd," the latter "too monstrous." And the necessary consequence, therefore, in the opinion of that distinguished statesman, "was to recognise in due time their immediate existence as States, and thus to bring them within the pale of those rights and duties which civilized nations are bound mutually to respect and are entitled reciprocally to claim from each other." That there should be a present capacity manifested by any political community, which has asserted its right to an independent national position, to maintain that position, is at once clear and just. The welfare of the civilized world requires that a premium should not be offered for tumult and confusion. Yet even in cases where there has not been exhibited such ability, in a revolutionary Government, to sustain itself; nay, in a remarkable case, where the authority of the former Government was about to be restored by force of its arms, Great Britain became a party to a compact by which the separation of Greece from Turkey was consummated; even at the moment when Turkey was about to reassert its authority and resume the exercise of its power.

It is far from aiding us in the consideration of so large a question, if we should confuse ourselves by an attempted discrimination, which, closely tested, has in it much more of sound than substance. It serves not to elucidate any doubt in this matter to rest substantial consequences upon an argument as to the difference between recognition and intervention. Intervention may become, as in the case of Greece and Holland the result of recognition. But recognition should precede intervention. Otherwise intervention would be but an interference with the domestic concerns of another State. Nor is the distinction taken between what is called the creation of a political community and the recognition of it, one that has any true basis for its support. Neither in the case of Greece nor Belgium did Great Britain create, as it is said, the political independence of either, except by its recognition of their rights to a separate Government, and intervention in support of that right. In each there was an organized political community; in each there had been exercised the authority of a Government, with which Great Britain maintained friendly relations; in each that Government had been resisted, and its rule denied; in each did Great Britain interfere, and in each by force compel the acknowledgment of that independence, which each of the two communities desired, but could not, unaided, accomplish.

Such was the condition of Greece and Belgium when their independence was recognised and secured by foreign intervention. Yet we are told in the argument of "Historicus" that to justify recognition, the independence of the Confederate States, de facto, must be established "beyond the probability or almost the possibility of reverse." The palpable contradiction between the doctrine of "Historicus" and the practice of Great Britain is too manifest to need explanation. And the consequence necessarily follows that the doctrine is not correctly stated, or that Great Britain in its conduct towards Greece and Belgium did flagrantly, and in violation of its interpretation of international rule, commit an act of gross injustice to Holland and Turkey.

It is not easy to perceive what weight was intended or expected to be added to the argument by the reference to the "declaration" by Great Britain of its causes of war with France. In that paper it is said that Great Britain treated the negotiation of a treaty of commerce with "the insurgent colonies," while she was engaged in a contest for their subjugation, as a lawful cause of war. And "Historicus" adds that he has never heard her right to do so disputed. If this was just cause of war with France, then did Great Britain, in the case of Greece and Belgium, voluntarily engage in an unjust war. But if "Historicus" has never heard the right of Great Britain to make war on France for this cause disputed, he has been inattentive to those declarations made by Great Britain; in which the denial of such an act as just cause of war, although not admitted in terms, is yet the necessary logical consequence. Nor will it be out of place here to say that the period to which this reference is made, is scarcely that to which he would properly turn for a true exposition by Great Britain of the principles of International Law. There was about this time, somewhat of confusion between might and right. It was about this period that Great Britain, in the waters of a neutral Power, and in a neutral vessel, seized and took the papers of the ambassador of a Power with which she was at war—and but for his fortunate escape would have seized his person. It may be safely presumed that Great Britain would not now assert that this conduct was supported by any rule of International Law. And yet no one can say that he ever heard, by the authority of her Government, "that her right to do so had been disputed."

When Russia was applied to, with other European States, to recognise the United States, she declined to do so, until that recognition was made by Great Britain. France did not consider herself bound to wait the recognition of Great Britain, and Spain and Prussia evidently agreed with France. The papers of that day will show the peculiar circumstances operating upon each of these Powers, which delayed their recognition. But the principle then asserted by Russia, and attempted to be enforced by Great Britain in the war with France, was wholly abandoned by Great Britain in the case of the Spanish American colonies. She acted then upon the principle as announced by the Government of the United States, "that the people of Spanish America do notoriously govern themselves; and the right of the United States to recognise the Government they have instituted is unquestionable." How completely Great Britain has modified the doctrine she held at the time of the American Revolution, will presently appear, when her conduct in relation to the Italian question is considered. To sustain, therefore, her present policy towards the Confederate States upon the principle she maintained in 1776, is to re-affirm, as of present authority, a doctrine she has abandoned, a principle she has renounced.

The declaration of Mr. Canning, in the case of the Spanish American colonies, shows that the right of recognition or intervention is asserted for the purpose of preserving the peace of the world. But the case of Greece goes a step beyond this, and asserts the same right for the sake, among other things, of the convenience which it affords to the commerce of neutral Powers. In the treaty for the pacification of Greece, concluded in 1827, between France, Great Britain, and Russia, the preamble sets forth, that the contracting parties were "penetrated with the necessity of putting an end to the sanguinary contest, which by delivering up the Greek Provinces and the Isles of the Archipelago to all the disorders of anarchy, produces daily fresh impediments to the commerce of the European States." In addition to the philanthropic obligation which is acknowledged and involved in this right asserted to interfere in the contest between belligerents when the terrible evils of war pass beyond the confines of those who are the immediate parties to it, and involve others, in the case of Greece, is the distinct assertion of the same right, when the prosecution of a war affects the convenience by disturbing the commerce of a neutral Power. It is true the justification was not wholly without precedent. When Portugal revolted from Spain, within a year of the proclamation by the Cortes of the Duke of Braganza, a treaty of peace and alliance was concluded between Charles I. of England, and John IV. of Portugal, wherein John is mentioned as a lawful sovereign and the King of Castile as a dispossessed ruler. The King of England sets forth, among other reasons for the treaty, his solicitude "to secure the liberty of trade" for "his beloved subjects."

But it would not be just if we should stop here, and in so doing lead to the conclusion that the principles which govern nations in such cases are determined by considerations of a purely selfish character. The most recent occasion in which this question has passed under the review of the leading Powers of Europe was in the contest of the Italian States. Great Britain then declared that "the people of Italy ought to be free to choose how they would be governed, provided they did not injure their neighbours." It further declared that "it had always recognised as a sacred rule of international obligation that no country has a right authoritatively to interfere in the internal affairs of a foreign State; or with sound policy long withheld its acknowledgment of any new form of Government, which may be adopted and established, without territorial usurpation or absorption, by the spontaneous wish of its people." By the same Power it was also then declared that "she uniformly withheld her consent to acts of intervention by force to alter the internal Government of other nations; she uniformly gave her countenance, and if necessary, her aid, to consolidate the de facto Government which arose in Europe or America." In 1850, Sir Robert Peel said, in allusion to the French Republic, that he advocated "the policy of recognising the Government which appeared to be most conformable to the will of the French people. I go further," said he, "and I think such a recognition ought not to be a cold, reluctant acquiescence in an unavoidable necessity."

The declaration of this principle by Great Britain did not command the acquiescence of Russia. The terms in which that Great Power expressed itself were careful and guarded. On the other hand the declaration of France was even more liberal than that of Great Britain. But that of Great Britain was liberal enough for all purposes; broad enough for all cases. It illustrated in the most striking manner the progress of liberal opinions; it was the crowning triumph of these opinions over the dogmas of absolutism. It expressed the great idea of the age, that the interests of government are not to be considered distinct from the interests of the people for whose welfare government was instituted. It solved the problem of the relation of the ruler to the ruled. It made the welfare of the people the standard by which the power of the ruler should be tested. And when that welfare was exhibited by a change of government in accordance with the "spontaneous wish of the people," no antagonistic principle was admitted to control or disturb it.

It is, then, of little advantage if, in the consideration of this question, we attempt to expound, for the purpose of a practical application, the general terms in which publicists in text books explain, in this connection, the rights and duties of nations. We need not inquire what should be the principle, or what should be the conduct of Great Britain; we have here the declaration by the Government of Great Britain of what is termed her "policy;" and which, as is said, "appears to have been directed by a consistent principle." This declaration of the principle adopted by Great Britain—this avowal of her policy, in consistency with it—was given to the world under circumstances calculated and intended to secure for it great attention. It was the rule, of which all the nations of the world were then informed. But it was also the pledge given to those political communities which, in the future, might struggle for existence. They had a right, a high right, when preparing to undertake the perils of their struggle, to expect that Great Britain would preserve inviolate her solemn declaration. It is this, and only this, which the Confederate States have ever asked. It is this which, up to this time, Great Britain has refused.

And this now brings us to consider what are the rights of the Confederate States, and the duties of Great Britain. But, to do this more completely, it is proper that we should consider in what manner the Government of the United States has been accustomed to consider the "rights" and "duties" which are involved in the discussion. If this "policy" of Great Britain, "directed by a consistent principle," has been recognised by the United States as proper—if the United States have insisted upon even a more latitudinarian rule—there can be no room for complaint by that Government, because of its exercise. To understand the "principle" and the "policy" of the United States, two cases may be referred to: those of Hungary and of Cuba.

In the case of Hungary two remarkable principles were enforced. Russia interfered, and the Czar justified the act upon the ground that his safety was affected by the condition of Hungary. The United States, speaking through Mr. Webster, claimed, that if they had formally acknowledged the independence of Hungary, though no benefit would have resulted from it to either party, it would not have been an act against the law of nations, provided they took no part in her contest with Austria.

In the case of Cuba, the Ministers of the United States who met at Ostend, and afterwards at Aix-la-Chapelle, advocated, in certain contingencies, "wresting it from Spain," if the United States possessed the power. And Mr. Marcy, the Secretary of State, does not dissent from the conclusion, if self-preservation "necessitates the acquisition of Cuba." It is beside the present purpose to discuss how far the principle of the Czar as applied to Hungary, or that of the United States as applied to Cuba, is true. It is sufficient to show that the interpretation of the law of nations upon this point of the right not only of recognition, but also of intervention, is not in the United States affected by any qualifications which would antagonize the application of that declared by Great Britain.

We are fairly, then, at the point in this discussion where we can understand the rights of the Confederate States and the duties of Great Britain. They both spring, to a certain extent, from the same sources. Thus, if the rights of a people to select that form of Government under which they can live happily, be, as it must, conceded; then must follow the duty of other nations to recognise the right. The "principle" and "policy" of Great Britain goes beyond this. She gives aid when necessary. The Confederate States seek not her aid. They only seek her recognition of their right. If they have any right, they have that. If the civilized nations of the world do not expressly adopt, they will not expressly dispute, the proposition of Sardinia, that "it is in opposition to the precept which modern civilization proclaims, that there is no legitimate Government but that which the people accept, if not with gratitude, at least with resignation." The next source of these rights and duties is in the right of a people able to maintain their independence, to be admitted to the family of nations; and to benefit the human race by the influence which they may exert upon its happiness and prosperity; and with this is the duty of other nations, by their recognition of that people to admit them to the family of nations, and impose upon them the responsibilities of its several members. The right of a people struggling for their independence to be guided in their approach towards the relations they are about to assume with the nations of the world by the declarations of those nations as to the principles which in such cases will govern their conduct, will not be disputed. And if so, then must follow the duty of such nations to maintain inviolate their declarations in the letter and spirit; and to believe that the character and fame of a nation involve its regard for truth as well as its repute for wealth and skill in arms.

When the Confederate States dissolved their connection with the United States they knew the nature and extent of the necessity which impelled them. They knew, or supposed they knew, the terms which the nations of Europe had prescribed for those who undertook for themselves the adoption of a new Government. They have come up to every term, performed every condition, executed every requirement. In extent of territory, in the sources of wealth, in the number of population, in the scale of civilization, they not only present the right to be recognised as an independent Power, but they exhibit the folly of anticipating their subjugation; the cruelty of a persistence in the effort to attempt it. Recognised or not, the fact of their separate national existence is beyond dispute. It is not to create that separate national existence that recognition is desired. If not with the same arrogance, so far as regards the fact of a separate national existence, they may say with the same truth as did Napoleon I., before the peace of Campoformio, when it was proposed to recognise the Empire, it is as unnecessary as to recognise the sun.

But when the fact is established "that there is the existence of a Government, acknowledged by the people over whom it is set, and ready and able to acknowledge and to prove its responsibility for their conduct when they come in contact with foreign nations," it is due to humanity that its recognition should not be withheld, when to withhold it is to multiply the miseries of such a war as that which is waged. In the language of one of recognised authority in Great Britain, "recognition is a right which other States are under an obligation to render, in such a case, for various reasons." The recognition of the Confederate States would be the evidence that the nations of the world regard the question of Right as determined—and then the question of Might could not be continued with the suffering it involves. Recognition is not a cause of war. "There is no proposition of law (says one of the authors already referred to) upon which there exists a more universal agreement of all Jurists, than upon this, viz., that the virtual and de facto recognition of a new State gives no just cause of offence to an old State." It could not bring war to Great Britain, but it would bring peace to America. If there was no rule of International Law—no declaration of Great Britain—no precedent in her history for her conduct in such a case—it would seem as if she could not hesitate. But with the rule plain, her declaration positive, her precedent uniform, the hesitation she exhibits is more than strange.

With the motives which prompt her present conduct we have no controversy. As they exist in reality, they have not been disclosed. They can only be judged when time will disclose them. But we have controversy with the statement that her position is in consistency with the obligations of International Law—with her own principles or her own policy. She may do whatever may be consistent with her pleasure. But in so doing it will be well for those who advocate her policy to claim for it other sanctions than those which have yet been produced. The obligations of International Law have often been said to hang too loosely upon her, to be agreeable to the weaker Powers of Europe. But in this case her own law has been as powerless in its control as in other days has been the Law of Nations. And that high morality which is preserved by nations, and is placed even beyond that of individuals, is exposed to fearful hazard, by contrasting at this time her declarations with her actions.

JURIDICUS.

THE LATE BATTLE IN VIRGINIA.

The following Northern accounts have appeared in the columns of the Times and the Morning Post. The subjoined is an extract of a letter from an officer of the Army of the Potomac:—

"Dear Brother,—Here we are, back again to our own camp at Falmouth after a raid with 150,000 men across the Rappahannock,—at least what are left of that number we started with, for the reports this morning are that some 30,000 are missing from all the various corps d'armee. Well, after six months' careful preparation, General Hooker came to the conclusion that he had repaired all the damages of the last defeat at Fredericksburg, re-inspired the troops, and had, as he said, now got 'the finest army on the planet,' and was determined to place it in Richmond within a week at the latest. You are aware that the term of some 40,000 men of this army expires in May, and, of course, they could only be made use of by an early attack upon the enemy. So last week the whole force was suddenly and quietly put in motion to surprise the rebels, who, it was said, had only some 30,000 troops at Fredericksburg. To effect this, and doubly outflank them, our whole army crossed in two places, one about 20 miles above and one about eight miles below that town. The latter seems to have, in fact, found but a small force of the enemy at Fredericksburg (by some it is said not over 10,000 men), because the heights so strongly and successfully defended last time were carried without any very serious resistance. It is probable that General Lee had due notice of the portion of our army that crossed above, but not of that below. This we cannot know, but it is certain that he at once massed an equal or greater force than ours at Chancellorsville; besides outflanking us by sending General Jackson to our rear. A fierce and general battle ensued. General Sigel's German division at the first shock broke and scattered at once. The rebels rushed in with fury, and our army was gradually forced back to the bank of the river. As soon as we began to give way General Lee seems to have transferred a heavy force to Fredericksburg, which at once retook the heights, and completely defeated that portion of our army. So passed that eventful Sunday. Monday but little fighting was done. Tuesday the same, but it was evident that the enemy were receiving large reinforcements. So about noon General Hooker issued orders to recross the river to our old position, and here we are after a complete defeat, which shows General Lee to be the first General of the age if he was surprised, and no mean one if he was not, and proves that his troops are as fierce and brave in attack as resolute in defence. The immediate results of this battle are difficult to learn. We have left the whole of our dead and wounded in possession of the enemy. At the early part of the first day we took about 2000 prisoners. The rebels boast to have taken 5000. As both sides were at times the attacking party the loss in killed and wounded may be about equal—say, 10,000 to 15,000 each; but, as the rebels will naturally take care of their own wounded first, we may expect to lose a vast number who might have been saved. It is said that about thirty guns are missing, while we have captured five or six of the enemy's. As it is probable that many of the troops whose time is so nearly out will desert, it is not at all unlikely that the Army of the Potomac will have lost some 30,000 men by this stupendous raid across the Rappahannock. The loss of prestige, both in this country and Europe, by the defeat of an army drilled and prepared with so much care no one can well estimate. Will France and England now say that there must be no more of this awful fratricidal strife? It will be galling to our pride, yet, perhaps, may best satisfy both sides."

The following is an extract from a private letter, dated Washington, May 8:—

"You are no doubt anxious to hear in regard to the great battle that has just been fought. I can only say, the same practice heretofore observed by the Government in all such cases is done in this, only to a much greater extent, and that much more to their shame. We have it announced this morning that the movement towards a new base is 'only a failure, not a disaster.'"

"It is known in Washington and publicly admitted by all parties connected with the army, that this is the most terrible disaster which has yet happened to the Government. The fact is, that not one-half of the army will ever get back, and the loss of artillery and stores is enormous. It will all come out in due time, but the Government wants to break the blow by putting out such a despatch as that published in the morning papers. Never before have such efforts been made to keep the public from learning the true state of affairs. Telegraphic-offices have been seized, and even correspondents of papers have been detained, when en route, to carry in person despatches that were refused even in the mails. The estimated loss of Hooker's army is not less than 25,000 killed and wounded, besides thousands of prisoners and innumerable pieces of artillery. He was shelled by the whole Confederate artillery at every point from the time he started until he reached the other side, and the only artillery saved was that sent over before he crossed. All that left to protect his crossing and his rear fell into the hands of the enemy. Whether or not he is being pursued of course no one here knows. For anything like particulars we must await the letters of correspondents. When the different advocates of the different generals get quarrelling among themselves, then we will have it all brought out. You may rest assured of one thing, there will be no further spring campaign in the east. We are expecting hourly to hear that Lee is either threatening Washington or has sent his army to Tennessee to crush Rosecrans, and thus get possession of Tennessee and Kentucky. The near approach of the end of the term of enlistment of some 250,000 men is now the great drawback of Government, and this battle was fought in hopes of winning it with these very troops before their term of enlistment expired."

THE DURATION OF THE WAR.—If the interests of the belligerents alone were at stake, it would be of little consequence to the rest of the world whether the war was of long or of short continuance. But it is otherwise. War or peace between the two American Confederations means to a large portion of the manufacturing population of England distress and starvation or happiness and prosperity, and may mean to the manufacturing population in France these and something more. The French nation has not the same ground, supplied by a long experience, for trusting implicitly in its Government as the English, and the present ruler of France is in a proportionate degree obliged to anticipate its wants, and to prevent, so far as in his power, distress pressing too heavily on any portion of his subjects. Some months since the French Emperor manifested unmistakable symptoms of impatience; and the recent fiasco of the Federal army, with the inactivity which is certain to succeed it, will not in all probability remain unnoticed by the French Government. Nor should it. As a principle of international law it is undoubtedly true that neutrals have no right to interpose between belligerents; but on the other hand, in order to claim this immunity from foreign intervention, belligerents are bound to prosecute the war in which they are engaged with reasonable despatch, and with such earnestness as would promise its tolerably speedy termination. It could not, for instance, be maintained that the North would be entitled to seek to tire out the Confederates by maintaining a strict blockade of their ports, and keeping in the field a sufficient army to secure the Northern States from the risk of invasion. Such a course of proceeding would not be war, and neutral Powers could not be expected to respect it.—The Morning Post of 25th May.

THE CONFEDERATE LOAN was dull during the morning at 2 to 1 discount, but after regular hours the price was 1 discount to par. It appears that Mr. Mason, the Confederate Commissioner, left London yesterday evening for Paris, and consequently increased strength has been imparted to the rumours lately circulated regarding the probability of French mediation. From Federal sources in London there is as yet, however, no symptom of an alteration in the tone such as to encourage a hope of the probability of an early and reasonable effort for a pacific adjustment.—Times City Article, May 27th,

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

We wish we could give a reliable account of the movements in the West, but it is impossible. We cannot make bricks without straw. Our latest direct advices are to the 12th May, and therefore we have only Northern accounts of the events that have transpired since then, except when it has pleased the Washington and New York papers to give an extract from Southern journals. Suppose we had full faith in Northern veracity, we should not be relieved of our difficulties. At the beginning of the week the Anglo-Federal organs announced that the Confederates had evacuated Vicksburg; and upon looking to the authority for the statement it really seemed authentic. The words of the telegram were as precise and emphatic as they could be. "Despatches from General Grant state that the Confederates had evacuated Vicksburg, and that the entire Confederate force was moving northwards to reinforce General Bragg, for the purpose of attacking Rosencrans." Here we have an official statement that Vicksburg had been evacuated; and more than that, we are told what had become of the Confederates—the entire force was moving to reinforce Bragg. Well, what follows? Of course the next news is that Grant has marched into Vicksburg. Not so. The latest New York advices inform us that "official reports" received in Washington state that a battle was still raging, "with the prospect of capturing the entire Confederate force in Vicksburg." Not being gifted with the prophetic vision of Mr. Seward we cannot indicate the result of Grant's operations, and there may or may not be a prospect of capturing the Confederate force. But it is manifest that if Vicksburg had been evacuated, and the entire Confederate force had been en route for General Bragg's army, the entire Confederate force could not be captured in Vicksburg. What reliance can we place on Federal official reports?

That there has been severe fighting is, however, certain. On the 14th May General Grant occupied Jackson, Mississippi. After burning the State capitol and half destroying the city—a feat of arms that highly delights the Federals—Grant left the place. On the 16th there was a battle at Edward's Point. The Confederates, numbering 12,000, were under the command of General Pemberton, the Federals under General Grant numbered 24,000. It was a stoutly contested and sanguinary engagement. The Confederate General Tilghman is reported killed, and we learn from the Mobile papers, via New York, that the Confederate loss was 3,000 and the Federal loss 9,000. If these estimates approximate to the truth Grant sustained a serious disaster. After the battle was over General Pemberton retired in good order to his entrenchments beyond the Big Black River. And here anything like an intelligible narrative of Grant's doings ends. Dates and movements are all contradictory and confused. Some reports fix the battle of Edward's Point for the 18th instead of the 16th. Then we are told that Grant, after the battle, marched eight miles, and encountered General Johnstone. One account says Grant has taken possession of the railroad bridge over the Big Black River, and another that he has been defeated and driven back. The last report is to the effect that Grant had captured Haines' Bluff and the works of Vicksburg, and that the battle was still raging. Perhaps the next mail may give us the result of the battle, upon which it would be idle to speculate. Grant has broken his connexion with Grand Gulf, taking with him provisions for eight days. There is, or was, much anxiety in Washington about his operations.

The raid of the Federal Colonel Grierson through a part of Mississippi terminated on the 1st of May. The Northern accounts say that Grierson injured the railroads and destroyed $4,000,000 of property. The amount is probably exaggerated, but we may be sure the invaders destroyed as much property as they could.

Port Hudson was bombarded on the 8th and 9th of May, without result. There is a rumour in the Southern papers that Admiral Farragut has burnt his flag-ship, the Hartford.

Alexandria, on the Red river, an undefended town was occupied by the Federals on the 6th of May.

Captain Dwight has been killed in the neighbourhood of Opelousas, and General Banks has ordered 100 of the inhabitants of that district to be arrested and kept in close confinement, until the "guerillas" are given up. It would be as well for Federal officers to recollect that they are invaders, and that they have no right to expect any consideration. Our New Orleans correspondent gives a full account of the state of affairs.

The Army of the Potomac has made a movement. It has taken up a line where it can better defend Washington in case that city is attacked. There are renewed rumours of General Hooker's downfall, and of General Halleck's assumption of the command. The Cabinet is divided on the question, and if this programme is carried out, General Butler and Mr. Sumner are to replace Mr. Seward and Mr. Stanton.

Besides the loss in men, the Federals lost heavily in material at the battles at Chancellorsville. The Richmond Whig says, there is an immense booty of small arms, estimated from 30,000 to 50,000, and "an almost infinite quantity of overcoats, knapsacks, coats, and blankets." It has been deemed necessary to reinforce Hooker with the troops around Washington and Baltimore.

The Confederates have surprised and cut up two companies of mounted rifles; and they have also captured a company of Federal cavalry, a portion of two infantry companies and forty waggons, in the Kanawha Valley. Two Federal despatch boats, Emma and Arrow, were captured on the 15th of May. This interrupts the Northern internal communication with Newburn.

Colonel Parker, commanding in Jackson County, Missouri, informed the Federal General Blunt, that if another Confederate citizen or soldier was executed without process of law, he should retaliate and execute five Federals. General Blunt did not deny that Confederate citizens and soldiers were executed without process of law, but in a letter full of vulgar abuse, in which Colonel Parker is compared to "a Hottentot or a South Sea Islander," he says, "every rebel or rebel sympathiser who gives aid, directly or indirectly, shall be destroyed or expelled from the military district. These resolutions will not exempt females from the rule."

The arrest and imprisonment of Mr. Vallandigham is still causing great excitement in the West, as well as amongst the Democratic party throughout the United States. After a mass meeting at Indianapolis, at which resolutions were passed denouncing the arrest and the war measures of the Government, forty or fifty persons were arrested for shouting for President Davis, and the soldiers were fired on from the railway trains. About 500 pistols and revolvers were taken from the passengers. In the Western cities all the newspapers are under military supervision, and in Indiana free discussion is entirely suppressed by General Hascall.

At a meeting held in Albany a letter was read from Governor Seymour, in which he says the arrest of Mr. Vallandigham "is an act which has brought dishonour upon our country. It is full of danger to our persons and our homes. * * * If this proceeding is approved by the Government and sanctioned by the people, it is not merely a step towards revolution—it is revolution; it will only lead to military despotism—it establishes military despotism. In this aspect it must be accepted, or in this aspect rejected. If it is accepted our liberties are overthrown." At a meeting of the Anti-Abolition State Rights Association, several strong resolutions were carried. One was, "That, in the meantime, it is the right of the citizen to protect himself against the violence of lawless power, where legal remedies are denied, with whatever force God and nature may have provided him, remembering always that 'resistance to tyrants is obedience to God'—that 'the price of liberty is eternal vigilance.'" At a meeting held in Union-square, resistance to the Government was advocated. Mr. M'Masters told his audience that they should "organize by tens and hundreds, by companies and regiments, and they should send to their Governor and ask him for commissions as soon as they had their regiments formed. It was written in the Constitution that the people had the right to have and to bear arms for the defence of themselves, and not of the Union, but of the State." Mr. Mallaly "predicted that the Conscription law would never be carried out in the State of New York, and judging from the character of the meeting he thought they were in favour of a discontinuance of this Abolition war." Mr. Mallaly referred to Stonewall Jackson, and said, "He would tell them that there had been new glory added to the name of Jackson. (Loud cheers, and "Bless the good boy!") There had been new glory added to it by the great hero, whose funeral solemnities were but lately celebrated in Richmond. That might be called treason, but was it treason?" ("No, no.") Captain Rynders addressed the meeting as subjects of Abraham the First, and came forward to see if the Lincolmites would dare arrest him. Professor Mason bade the New Yorkers remember "that the State was old when the Union was born, and that four millions of freemen having the mouth of the Hudson, and the canals and railroads reaching into the far West, can be a great empire, even if the enemies of the Constitution should succeed in breaking it into as many fragments as there are States. (Great applause.)" Mr. Van Loan appealed to the people to use their strong arms.

The New York Daily News has recommenced publication under the auspices of Mr. Benjamin Wood. It announces itself as opposed to the further prosecution of the war, and attributes to the Administration purposes ulterior to the reconstruction of the Union, and not according with the spirit of Republican institutions.

The resignation of General Meagher has been accepted by President Lincoln. The Irish Brigade, of which he had the command, was 5,000 strong when it took the field, and it now numbers less than 400 men.

The New York Caucasian calls attention to the profits made by New England contractors. As an example, it states that "The James Steam Mills Corporation of Newburyport, Massachusetts, declared on the 10th of May a semi-annual dividend of 20 per cent.—the third dividend for the year; the total dividends being in the time 80 per cent., or a return to the stockholders of $200,000 on the original stock subscription of $250,000. In addition to this enormous profit, the reserve fund has been added to in the sum of $40,000, showing a grand income, in the short space of twelve months, of $240,000, or within $10,000 of their entire capital."

The steamer Eugenie and the British schooner Linnet have been captured by the Federals.

Latest advices announce the safe arrival from London via the Blockade, of Messrs. Beverley Tucker, of Richmond, and J. G. Gibbs, of Columbia, South Carolina.

Gold in New York on the 23rd of May was 49 per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

The returns of the Poor-law Board show a diminution for the last week in the pauperism of the manufacturing districts of more than 6,000. At the same time it does not appear that there is any material or general improvement in the condition of the trade. In that respect the process which seems to be taking place is this. At the beginning of our troubles, there were large stocks of cloth held in various markets, which have been slowly cleared out at the advanced prices consequent on the condition of the cotton market. While these stocks remained it was impossible for any manufacturer to obtain a remunerative price for his goods; and therefore the quantity of cotton worked up was less than the very small quantity which the stock held and the imports coming in would have allowed the consumers to use. Now, there are much smaller stocks of cloth, and though high prices still limit the demand, still in certain kinds it is possible for the most successful manufacturers to work at a profit. Also, the home demand, which was kept for a long time as low as possible, in the hope of peace, naturally improves a little from quarter to quarter as no prospect of a speedy peace appears. But, as a whole, the cotton-trade cannot cease to be a heavy loss to all concerned in it, until there shall be sufficient cotton to employ at full time all the mills which are able to work—i. e., whose proprietors are not utterly ruined: and until prices of cotton and calico shall reach a point at which there shall be a remunerative sale for all that the manufacturers can produce. And of this, for years to come, we see but little hope.

Miss Rye, in a letter to the Times, virtually confesses the utter failure of her female emigration scheme. But she has nothing to tell us which might not have been told beforehand. Every one knows that a scheme which proposes the emigration of large batches of women to colonies where women are scarce, must of necessity bear an aspect not very agreeable to feminine delicacy; and that, therefore, the class of persons who are likely to be enrolled as emigrants will be women who, for the most part, are not too modest to go in search of husbands. Every one knows, too, that young women in large numbers are exceedingly difficult to manage. Whenever it has been attempted to assemble together large numbers even of female children, trouble and scandal have been the invariable consequence; and, as has been seen in the case of the Patriotic Fund Schools, the choice appears to lie between virtual anarchy and inappropriate discipline. In the case of grown-up girls there is no choice whatever; they simply please themselves; and the pleasure of young women of that class from which the greater part of Miss Rye's recruits were necessarily taken, when they break loose from control, is to behave with very little regard to conventional rules of decorum. In the dulness of a long voyage, when subject virtually to no rule whatever, many are sure to go beyond this. Of these things Miss Rye might have thought beforehand. Again, if she had condescended to inquire of those who know what is the ordinary condition of an emigrant ship, she would have learned that the evils which so astonish her and scandalize her readers are found inseparable from the practice of allowing young women to go out in such ships without parents or brothers to look after them; and that the presence of 100 young women at once in the capacity of emigrants on board any ship would ensure a scene of constant and flagrant immorality. We are sorry for a well-intentioned woman; but we can hardly excuse her for taking such a responsibility on herself without fully comprehending the nature and the difficulties of the task she had undertaken. For what goes on at the other end we must hold the Colonial Government answerable; and in this case the remedy, if not easy, is at least obvious and practicable. The colony can find proper accommodation under proper rules; the emigrant ship cannot. But the truth is that at present

New Zealand is in no state to receive any other female immigrants than such as go out under the care and authority of their natural guardians and protectors.

There has been a serious accident on the South-Eastern Railway, between Croydon and London. For once, the blame appears to rest with the engine-driver, who got behind time, put on steam to recover the lost minutes, threw his engine off the rails, and brought the train to what the Yankees call, "eternal smash." Several lives were lost, and many serious injuries inflicted. Possibly, if the matter were sifted, the greed of the Company, in omitting to provide engines up to their work, may prove in this, as in almost every other case, to be the real cause. Most railway accidents are due to no other cause than a lust of profit, which induces the directors to crowd trains close to each other's heels, and neglect costly precautions. It is found cheaper to pay for two or three accidents a-year, than to work the line safely. Collisions, at least, might be rendered impossible, but only at a cost which no railway board will ever incur while "accidents" merely entail pecuniary damages. If juries would in all cases return verdicts of manslaughter against directors, where it is shown that the rules of the line were likely à priori to result in a certain number of homicides per annum, and if judges would do their duty in carrying out the law which makes homicide by wilful neglect amount to manslaughter, we should seldom or never hear of a railway "accident."

On Thursday night, Mr. Walpole made an attempt, on behalf of the Conservative party, to rescind the vote taken a fortnight before in Committee of Supply to fulfil the contract for the carriage of the Dover Mails made with Mr. Churchward by Lord Derby's Administration. Mr. Walpole dwelt rather on the inconvenience and irregularity of the course pursued by Government than on the merits of the case; but this omission was amply supplied by Lord John Manners and Lord Robert Cecil. The Ministers relied on votes, not on argument and Mr. Gladstone was not supported by a single colleague or independent member of his party. After shouting "divide" at intervals for about an hour, the Liberals had their way, and carried the day by a majority of 14, in a house of 396. The only other notable parliamentary business of the week was the rejection of Mr. Somes's bill for "robbing poor men of their beer," by closing public-houses on Sunday. It is plain that the gentlemen whose religious and philanthropic zeal leads them to propose such a measure understand nothing whatever, either of its moral effect on the temper or its practical bearing on the comfort of the London working-men.

Mr. Bernal Osborne, the other day, entertained his constituents at Liskeard, by delivering, in his peculiar style, his views upon everything in general and nothing in particular. He spoke with approval of the American policy of the Government as one of strict and prudent neutrality, but expressed the same sympathy with the Confederate cause, which is felt by all educated and most uneducated Englishmen—save and except always those who believe in the divine right of the rabble, and those who have no other political faith than a hatred of slavery as profound as their ignorance of its character. Mr. Osborne said, whatever a man's feelings might be in regard to North or South, he could not look upon the gallant stand made by the South in defence of their liberties without wishing them success. (Cheers.) Englishmen, too, would also regret the loss of that brave and noble hero, "Stonewall" Jackson, over whose tomb a nation's tears would fall (applause), and whose memory would be consecrated for ages to come. It was impossible to say at present what would be the result of this war. It seemed to him that there must soon be exhaustion of credit on the one side, and exhaustion of men on the other; for, after all, the resources of both North and South in respect to men was limited, although he knew that the North were at this moment recruiting in the sister country. But take it as we might, a struggle of mercenary soldiers against a gallant band, however small, who were fighting for a good cause, could not succeed, and he did not believe that the Union would ever be restored. There can be no doubt about the thorough unpopularity of the Federal cause in nearly every constituency in England. Indeed, we could count on our fingers the boroughs in which an advocate of the Union, or of President Lincoln, would have any chance of favour.

The City of London, in the absence of a Conservative candidate, has elected without opposition a young Liberal of the name of Goschen ("Gosling") who distinguished himself at school some twelve or thirteen years ago, and of whom, since then, no one has heard any harm—or indeed anything whatever.

The Brazilian Minister has demanded his passports, and the Legation is withdrawn. The cause of this strong but inevitable measure is the refusal of Lord Russell to apologise for the seizure of Brazilian vessels in the territorial waters of the Empire, in order to enforce the preposterous claims set up by Mr. Christie to compensation for a shipwreck, and to the punishment of a police-guard which arrested three British officers out of uniform on a tipsy frolic. No independent Power could patiently submit to such an outrage. If, however, the affair should end in the removal of Mr. Christie from Rio, the interruption of diplomatic relations may, perhaps, prove the opening of a renewal of friendly feeling between the two countries.

EUROPE.

ALTHOUGH no official confirmation has yet been given to the rumour to which we referred last week, of an agreement between the three Powers to present to the Russian Government demands founded upon an amalgamation of the propositions of England and Austria, it is now placed almost beyond doubt that such an understanding has been arrived at. The three Powers will invite Russia to offer Poland a purely Polish administration, a provincial representation, full liberty of religion, the establishment of the Polish as the official language; a system of military recruitment according to the laws of 1859, i. e., by lot or ballot, and a full and complete amnesty. They also ask her, in case she accepts their proposal, to agree to a suspension of hostilities. The form and details of the peace, as we may term it, would then be settled by a conference, and the definitive arrangement would be guaranteed by Europe. The proposal is to be conveyed to the Russian Court in identical notes. If this scheme has been determined upon, we must assume that Earl Russell has not really made the application to the Russian Government for an armistice, and still less to the Polish national Government, as a Ministerial organ has stated. He could hardly, after acting isolatedly in so offensive a manner, take part in a joint intervention. Will the Russian Government accept the terms suggested? We fear not; and if it would the insurgents certainly cannot. The intervention of the allies is confined to Congress Poland, and Congress Poland now forms but a small portion of the country in insurrection. The men who have been fighting for the last three months in Lithuania and Ruthenia, will not lay down their arms because liberty is given to Congress Poland. The Chas, of Cracow, the principal organ of the revolution, has already declared the Austrian proposals altogether insufficient. Moreover, even if the Poles should be satisfied, of which there is not the slightest chance, Russia would still have an insurrection to contend with. The movement has ceased to be Polish. It has spread, so the Poles assert, to provinces which have no sympathies or associations with Poland, and certainly have no notion of forming part of a Polish kingdom. The journals of the insurrection declare that it has now spread far beyond the Dnieper, and possesses the whole south of Russia. They describe it as existing in the governments of Tchernigov, Kiev, Poltava, Kharkov, Jekaterinoslov, Kherson, down to the very gates of Odessa, and even to the far-off Kazan. Nay, some even represent Moscow as in insurrection. These stories are, no doubt, for the most part, pious frauds, designed to keep alive the spirit of the combatants and impress Europe; but there can be no doubt that in a portion of this immense territory there have been some disturbances. These disturbances can have nothing to do with the claims of the Poles to independence. They evince a dissatisfaction natural enough under the present circumstances of the Russian empire, but a dissatisfaction which no concessions to Congress Poland can remove.

The war news is as conflicting as ever. The Russians report numerous victories. The insurgents claim signal successes. The Russian generals report the extinction of bands and the re-establishment of order throughout provinces which the insurgents insist have risen en masse against the Muscovites. What credit is to be attached to these stories it is hard to determine. Unfortunately, we cannot adopt the easy method of accepting the accounts of both sides as correct, and setting off the one list of achievements against the other; inasmuch as unfortunately both sides sometimes claim the victory in a particular engagement. How are we to decide between the two following stories? A telegram from Cracow declares that Okoinski gained, on the 25th of May, a brilliant victory over six Russian companies at Koniecpol, in the palatinate of Cracow; 150 Russians were killed, and the rest dispersed. That was the one story which the telegraph purveyors considered suitable for English readers. The French papers, however, which printed this telegram, printed another for Warsaw, dated the 29th of May, which says that the insurgent bands which had united at Koniecpol, under the command of Delacroix and Lettich, were attacked on the 25th of May by a detachment of troops under Major Benkowski. Koniecpol was taken by assault, and the insurgents routed. They lost 100 men killed, and 30 prisoners, and dispersed into the woods. We must wait a week to see which bulletin has "told the truth." There is no presumption in favour of either story.

The general tenor of the news is, however, unfavourable to the insurgents. The Russians seem to be learning guerilla tactics, and they have evidently the peasants on their side. The traditional hatred of the peasants to the gentry has been confirmed by the severe measures which the insurgents have taken against all the peasants whom they have supposed to be hostile to them. We do not accept the Russian commander's reports of the atrocities committed upon the peasant class by the insurgents. But it has been proved by the admission of the insurgents that they have hung and shot without the slightest hesitation any person whom they suppose to have given information or aid to the Russians, as traitors. The peasants do give that aid; and it is no uncommon thing for the Russians, on returning to a village, to find some half-dozen swinging to the trees. The two or three sympathizing correspondents who have penetrated a few miles into Poland, have been surprised to find so many of these victims of Jack Ketch. The insurgents may plead self-preservation as the excuse for these arbitrary measures—we do not discuss them; but it is certain that when such a system is pursued no promises of emancipation and land will allure the peasants to the national cause.

The most remarkable feature in this contest is, perhaps, the power which the secret National Government exercises in Warsaw. Under the very eyes of General de Berg, it prints its proclamations, collects its taxes, and executes its sentences. The chief of the city, a few days since, issued an order of the day, in which he announced that the decree of the National Government had been executed upon the person of J. Miniszewski (assassinated as he was leaving his home in the morning), condemned as a traitor to the country by the public voice; denounced every person collecting taxes for the Muscovite Government as a traitor, and required the citizens to denounce him, that the National Government might take measures to execute sentence upon him. The position of the public functionaries in Warsaw has thus become a very painful one. On the one hand, if they do not do their duty they may be shot or deported. On the other hand, if they do it they are sure to be assassinated. So great is the terror which the National Government inspires, that the wife of Miniszewski dared not even attend his funeral, or accept a pension from the Government; she was warned that if she did the fate of her husband would be hers. It is said that, thanks to this system, the National Government collects taxes with great facility, whilst the Russians can get nothing.

Public attention in France has been almost entirely monopolised this week by the elections. As the eventful days drew nearer the contest became more exciting and, we are sorry to say, more acrimonious. M. de Persigny and the prefects rained circulars and communiqués. Official journalists quoted the allied candidates against each other, and the opposition journalists quoted the prefects and the official journalists against themselves. The bishops stepped forward to satisfy the scruples of some members of their flock. Three archbishops and four bishops published a reply to some inquiries addressed to them, in which they vehemently censured the policy of abstention, and professing to leave it to the consciences of each citizen to decide how he should vote, gave a pretty strong recommendation to vote only for candidates who would resolutely support the temporal power and maintain religious liberty. The letter is drawn up with very great skill, and adopts a very liberal tone. It has earned for the prelates a rebuke from the Minister of Public Worship, who declares their combination to be in opposition to the obligations of the Episcopate.

The result of the elections is, of course, generally in favour of the Government. It will have a very large majority in the Chamber. But it has received some decisive defeats. In eight of the nine districts of Paris the Opposition candidates have been elected in the first ballot. In the ninth, one of the Opposition candidates is at the head of the poll, but had not the requisite majority, and a new ballot, in which we may suppose he will have no competitor of his own side, will no doubt return him. MM. de Berruyer and Marie have been returned for Marseilles, and in Bordeaux an opposition candidate, M. Lavertujon, was at the head of the poll, although, owing to the number of votes given to M. Dufaure, he had not the requisite absolute majority. The enemies of the Empire will attempt to represent this rejection of the Government candidates by the great cities as a declaration of their hostility to the Empire, and unfortunately the language of M. de Persigny and the Prefects gives them but too much pretence for the assertion. The fact, however, is that the elections imply no such thing. The Opposition candidates frankly accept the Empire;—that was the necessary condition of their candidature, and they have taken care to leave no doubt upon the point. Rightly regarded, their return to public life is the consecration of the Empire. There are no longer any adherents of the old dynasties and systems. The men who represented them have now accepted the accomplished facts, and giving up their dreams, seek to take their proper part in the development of the power and glory of France and the Empire.

The attention of the Parisians has not been given entirely to the elections. The race for the Grand Prix de Paris on Sunday was a counter attraction to the ballot boxes. Messieurs les Anglais were in great force. The betting ring was there combining pleasure with business, and under able leadership defied before the Emperor and Empress and saluted them with a British cheer. The Parisians, with whom racing has lately become a passion—the interest in it used to be confined to the upper classes—turned out in great numbers to see an English horse, Ranger, defeat the French mare, La Touqueuse, and to learn by their own observation, that there are a great many Englishmen who only keep Sunday strictly when they are at home.

The Prussian Constitution empowers the King in urgent circumstances, when the Chambers are not sitting, and under the responsibility of the whole Ministry, to decree ordinances not contrary to the Constitution, which shall have the force of law. Herr Von Bismarck and his colleagues have availed themselves of this clause to issue a decree empowering the Administrative authorities to prohibit, temporarily or altogether, after two warnings, the publication of newspapers whose attitude is upon the whole dangerous to the public welfare; and also to prohibit the introduction into Prussia of foreign newspapers. It has long been apprehended that some coup d'état of this kind would be attempted. We may expect to see the suppression of the freedom of the press, followed up by attacks upon individual liberty. The gross illegality of the measure is apparent. The Chambers are not sitting, because the Government has brought the session to an abrupt conclusion: they might be called together again in a few days. There are no urgent circumstances, and the principles of the ordinance are in violation of the Constitution. Hitherto the King of Prussia has been able to vindicate his acts by a narrow interpretation of the Constitution, and none of these were absolutely inconsistent with a belief that he was honestly adhering to his oath. Now he has entered upon a path for which it is impossible to find the slightest excuse—a path which may lead him and his reckless advisers into exile.

The acceptance of the Greek throne by Prince William seems determined. The official organs of the Danish Government join with those of the English Government in announcing it. The chief difficulty appears to have been the civil list. It is said that the Prince is to have 1,200,000 francs and two domains in the Ionian Islands, worth about five thousand a-year. Of course these statements are not deserving of much credit, any more than the programme of the Prince's journey, according to which he is to travel by land to Ancona, then embark upon a Danish vessel of war, to be transferred in the Adriatic to a Greek squadron, which is to convey him, unaccompanied by a single Dane, to Athens. How a mere lad is to restore order at Athens and throughout Greece, we cannot tell. Every mail brings a worse account of the state of affairs in the kingdom. There was an émelée the other day with the object of restoring Bulgaria, the chief of the Provisional Government, to power. Two companies of the National Guard had a regular engagement in the streets of the Piræus. The brigands approach to the very gates of Athens, which is filled with adventurers from all parts of Greece. The army is utterly undisciplined. It commits the grossest crimes with impunity. We hope that the Conference now sitting in London for regulating the question, and which has already got so far as to declare the throne of Greece vacant, will be able to devise some means by which the hapless Prince will at least be secured a chance of establishing his authority.

The Spanish Protestants who had been condemned to long terms of travail forcé, have had their sentences commuted to banishment. It will be hardly credited that some Spanish journals explain away this act of clemency by saying that the Queen wished to preserve from Protestant contagion the baynes in which the condemned persons must have suffered their punishment.

A commission has been appointed to reform the ancient etiquette of the Court of Spain, and harmonise it with constitutional customs; the leading men of all parties are members.

The Italian Parliament has begun the work of the session. A number of diplomatic documents, of no great interest out of Italy, have been laid before the Chamber, together with some projects of law for the imposition of new taxes. The committee appointed to inquire into the Neapolitan brigandage has presented a project of law which has startled and surprised the warmest friends of Piedmont. The law establishes the state of siege in the provinces in which brigandage exists. It directs that at the capital of every such province, a commission is to be appointed, presided over by the prefect, to draw up the list of persons suspected of brigandage. If these persons do not present themselves within a certain time, they may be arrested and pursued by arms by all citizens; military tribunals are alone competent to judge crimes of brigandage. Brigands when taken with arms in their hands are to be shot. Brigands taken without arms and their accomplices will be condemned to transportation. The Prefect may take rigorous preventive measures. Seventy has been tried already, and failed. It was hoped that the committee would recommend justice, even indulgence, but they have preferred to give the reactionists something like authority for their charges of inhumanity.

BRAZIL.

The session of the Brazilian Chambers as opened by the Emperor on the 3rd of May. His Majesty said, that through God's mercy there had been no scarcity of provisions, and that the public health had generally been satisfactory, although in some provinces the cholera had made great ravages. Adverting to the "deplorable dispute with the British Legation," he said "its complete solution depends upon the arbitrament of the King of the Belgians, and on the satisfaction and compensation we claim from the British Government." His Majesty noticed the satisfactory arrangement of a dispute with Peru, and announced that on the first half of the current year, the public income had decreased. The great subject of interest in Rio is still the dispute with England. On the 5th, the Chamber went in a body to congratulate the Emperor on the position he had taken, and to declare "the firm resolution of every Brazilian to make every necessary sacrifice to maintain and protect the honour and dignity of Brazil as a free and independent nation." This feeling will not be diminished by the refusal of the British Government to give the satisfaction to which the Emperor alluded, and the consequent departure of the Chevalier Moreira.

THE EAST.

A telegram gives the leading features of Sir Charles Trevelyan's Indian budget. A surplus for 1862-3 of £937,000,—a revised estimate, we presume, as the original showed a deficit—and a surplus for 1863-4 of £815,000; a reduction of duty on iron, beer, and wine; 1 per cent. taken off the income tax; and the expenditure of five millions and a-half for public works and education respectively, in which year—62-3 or 63-4, we are not told. There is much agitation amongst the foreigners in Japan. Admiral Kuper has arrived at Jeddo with four ships of war. The French Admiral was expected.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

Mr. Roebuck has given notice that on the 30th of June he will move the following resolution:—"That a humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying her Majesty to enter into negotiations with the great Powers of Europe for the purpose of obtaining their co-operation in the recognition of the independence of the Confederate States of North America."—Lord R. Montagu and Mr. Conyngham have given notice of their intention to move amendments.

[Owing to the pressure upon columns of direct Southern News received at a late hour, we are compelled to omit our Parliamentary Notes.]

A NEW ALABAMA AT CARDIFF.—A good deal of commotion has been caused among the shipowners and brokers of the docks, through the strange conduct of the United States' Consul of the port attempting to interfere with the loading of the steamship Lord Clyde. This splendid vessel arrived from Greenock, a distance of 450 miles, in twenty-four hours, and is stated to be of extraordinary swiftness and power. Her paddle-boxes being too large for entrance into the East Bute dock, her cargo has been shipped alongside, and from the fact of its neat appearance, has caused considerable interest and much speculation. This consists of several boxes tightly bound with iron and brought by the South Wales Railway. The American Consul attempted to interrogate the captain as to the nature of the contents of the boxes, and induced the Controller of Customs to accompany him. It need hardly be said the attempt was unsuccessful; and on Saturday morning the splendid steamer steamed down the Channel, not before a scene had occurred, by the agitated manner of the Consul who arrived at the docks shortly after 2 o'clock in the morning. The ship has cleared for Nassau with a cargo of wool-n goods.—The Times.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

PRESIDENT DAVIS ON EDUCATION.

At a Teachers' Convention, lately held at Columbia, South Carolina, the following letter from the President was read:—
Executive Office, Richmond, Virginia,
April 22, 1863.

Messrs. C. H. Wilcy, J. D. Campbell, and W. J. Palmer, Raleigh, North Carolina.

Gentlemen,—I have the honour to acknowledge your invitation to attend a meeting to be held in Columbia, South Carolina, to deliberate upon the best method of supplying text books for schools and colleges, and promoting the progress of education in the Confederate States. The object commands my fullest sympathy, and has for many years attracted my earnest consideration.

It would be difficult to over-estimate the influence of primary books in the promotion of character, and the development of mind. Our form of Government is only adapted to a virtuous and intelligent people, and there can be no more imperative duty of the generation which is passing away than that of providing for the moral, intellectual, and religious culture of those who are to succeed them. As a general proposition it may, I think, be safely asserted that all true greatness rests upon virtue, and that religion is in a people the source and support of virtue. The first impressions on the youthful mind are to its subsequent current of thought what the springs are to the river they form, and I rejoice to know that the task of preserving these educational springs in purity has been devolved upon men so qualified to secure the desired result. I have only to regret my inability to meet you, because it deprives me of the pleasure your association would give.

With my best wishes, I am, very respectfully, your fellow-citizen,
JEFFERSON DAVIS.

The delegates to this numerous-attended Convention were conveyed by the railways without charge. A resolution was passed to admit no more Yankee books into Southern schools.

THE CONFEDERATE FLAG.

The Richmond Examiner says:—"In the true national standard, the battle flag is not a mere scrap, like the union of the Federal banner; it occupies two-thirds (not one-third) of the whole width of the flag. When properly constructed and displayed with honours due, by the civil and military authorities of the Southern Confederacy, it will, we hope, present a very noble and splendid appearance.

"To prevent any more mistakes of this sort, we think it proper to publish here the words of the law, which read as follows:—

"AN ACT TO ESTABLISH THE FLAG OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA.

"The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That the flag of the Confederate States shall be as follows:—The field to be white, the length double the width of the flag, with the union (now used as the battle flag), to be a square of two-thirds the width of the flag, having the ground red, thereon a broad saltire of blue, bordered with white, and emblazoned white mullets or five-pointed stars, corresponding in number to that of the Confederate States.

"Approved May 1st, 1863. "JAMES M. MATTHEWS.

"A true copy, "Law Clerk, Department of Justice."

The Charleston Courier, of May 5th, says, "Both Houses of Congress, on Friday, passed a Bill establishing the flag of the Confederate States, and it has been approved by the President. It differs from the one adopted by the Senate, a few days ago, only in the omission of the blue bar, and consists of a pure white field, with our battle flag as the union. It will be seen by the following despatch to Mr. Villere, of Louisiana, that it is a favourite design with one of the greatest leaders of the Confederate army.

"C. CHARLESTON, South Carolina, April 24, 1863.
"To Hon. C. J. Villere,—Why change our battle flag, consecrated by the best blood of our country on so many battle-fields? A good design for the national flag would be the present battle flag as Union Jack, and the rest all white or all blue.
"G. T. BEAUREGARD"

THE CONFEDERATE MOTTO.

The Confederate Senate has proposed a substitute for the motto adopted by the House of Representatives for the seal. In the course of an elaborate speech Mr. Semmes, of Louisiana, observed:—

The Committee are dissatisfied with the motto on the seal as proposed by the House resolution. The motto proposed is as follows:—"Deo Duce vincemus," "Under the leadership of God we will conquer."

The word "duce" is too pagan in its signification, and is degrading to God, because it reduces Him to the leader of an army; for scarcely does the word "duce" escape the lips, before the imagination suggests "exercitus," an army for a leader to command.

That it degrades the Christian God to the level of Pagan gods, goddesses, and heroes, is manifest from the following quotation:—"Nil desperandum Teuero duce." This word "duce" is particularly objectionable, because of its connexion with the word "vincemus," we will conquer. This connexion makes God the leader of a physical army, by means of which we will conquer—not must conquer. If God be our leader we must conquer, or He would not be the God of Abraham and of Isaac, and of Jacob; nor the God of the Christian. This very doubt implied in the word "vincemus," so qualifies the omnipotence of the God who is to be our "leader," that it imparts a degrading signification to the word "duce" in its relation to the attributes of the Deity.

The word "vincemus" is equally objectionable, because it implies that war is to be our normal state; besides it is in the future tense, "we will conquer." The future is always uncertain, and therefore it implies doubt. What becomes of our motto when we shall have conquered? The future becomes an accomplished fact, and our motto thus loses its significance. In addition to this there are only two languages in which the words "will" and "shall" are to be found, the English and the German, and in those they are used to qualify a positive conclusion of the mind, and render it uncertain—they are repugnant to repose, quiet, absolute and positive existence.

As to the motto proposed by us, we concur with the House in accepting the word "Deo"—God. We do so in conformity to the expressed wishes of the framers of our Constitution, and the sentiments of the people and of the army. The preamble of the Provisional Constitution declares that "We, the deputies of the sovereign and independent States of South Carolina, &c., invoking the favour of Almighty God, do hereby ordain," &c.

The preamble of the Permanent Constitution is more explicit still; it declares that "We, the people of the Confederate States, &c., invoking the favour and guidance of Almighty God, do ordain," &c.

In this respect, both our Constitutions have deviated in the most emphatic manner from the spirit that presided over the construction of the Constitution of the United States, which is silent on the subject of the Deity.

Having discarded the word "duce," the Committee endeavoured to select, in lieu of it, a word more in consonance with the attributes of the Deity, and, therefore, more imposing and significant. They think success has crowned their efforts in the selection of the word "Vindex," which signifies an assertor, a defender, protector, deliverer, liberator, a mediator, and a ruler or guardian, as may be seen from the following examples:—

1. A defender: "Habet sane populus tabellam quasi vindicem libertatis."—Livy. The people hold a bond, the defender as it were of their liberty.

2. A protector: "Vindicem periculi Curium, res suppeditat."—Livy. The circumstances suggest or afford Curius as a protector against danger.

3. A mediator: "Nec Deus intersit nisi dignus vindice nodus incidit."—Horace, Arts Poetica. Let not God intervene unless the catastrophe be worthy of such a mediator or interpositor.

4. Ruler or guardian: "Vindicem eum regni reliquit."—Justin's History. He left him ruler or guardian of the kingdom.

Vindex also means an avenger or punisher.

1. "Furia vindices facinorum."—Cicero. The furies the avengers of crime.

2. "Me vindicem conjunctionis oderunt."—Cicero. They hate me the punisher of their conspiracy.

No word appeared more grand, more expressive or significant than this. Under God as the assertor of our rights, the defender of our liberties, our protector against danger, our mediator, our ruler and guardian, and as the avenger of our wrongs, and the punisher of our crimes. We endeavour to equal, or even to excel, our ancestors. What word can be suggested of more power, and so replete with sentiment and thoughts consonant with our idea of the Omnipotence and justice of God?

The debate resulted in the adoption by the Senate of the motto "Deo Vindice," and the rejection of the proposed addition.

THE LATE BATTLES. GENERAL LEE'S ADDRESS TO THE ARMY.

General Orders No. 59.

Head-quarters, Army of Northern Virginia, May 7.
With heartfelt gratification, the General Commanding expresses to the army his sense of the heroic conduct displayed by the officers and men during the arduous operations in which they have just been engaged. Under the trying vicissitudes of heat and storm, you attacked the enemy in the strongly entrenched depths of a tangled wilderness, and again on the Hills of Fredericksburg, fifteen miles distant, and by the valour which has triumphed on so many fields, forced him once more to seek safety beyond the Rappahannock. While this glorious victory entitles you to the praise and gratitude of the nation, we are especially called upon to return our grateful thanks to the only Giver of victory for the signal deliverance He has wrought. It is now, therefore, earnestly recommended that the troops unite on Sunday next in ascribing to the Lord of Hosts the glory due to His name. Let us not forget in our rejoicing the brave soldiers who have fallen in defence of their country, and while we mourn their loss, let us resolve to emulate their noble example. The army and the country alike will lament the absence for a time, of one to whose bravery and skill we are so much indebted for success.

The following letter from the President of the Confederate States, is communicated to the army as an expression of his approbation of its services:—

"I have read your despatch, and reverently unite with you in giving praise to God for the success with which He has crowned our arms. In the name of the people, I offer cordial thanks to yourself and troops under your command, for this addition to the unprecedented series of great victories your army has achieved. The universal rejoicing produced by this happy result will be mingled with general regret for the good and brave numbered among the killed and wounded."
(Signed) R. E. LEE, General Commanding.

CAPTURE OF COLONEL STRAIT'S COMMAND.

Official Report of General Bragg.

To General S. Cooper, A. and I. General.

TULLAHOMA, Tenn., May 5, 1863.—On the 18th April the enemy, moving from Corinth towards Tusculumbia, crossed Bear Creek with five regiments of cavalry and two of infantry, and ten pieces of artillery. Col. Roddy, commanding, fought them on the 18th with one regiment, killing a large number and capturing more than one hundred prisoners and one piece of artillery, with horses and caisson, losing six killed and twenty wounded. The enemy, after burying their dead, fell back, and on the 10th were reinforced to three full brigades, the whole under command of Gen. Dodge. Skirmishing continued on the 19th, 20th, 21st, 22nd, and 23rd.

On the night of the 19th the enemy landed troops at Eastport from a large number of steamers and burned the town, and houses on several plantations. On the 24th Roddy fought them. Their loss was heavy, ours slight. He contested every inch of ground, but falling back before overwhelming forces, the enemy advanced and entered Tusculumbia on the 25th. The enemy advanced towards Decatur as far as Town Creek.

Nothing more occurred until the 28th. On that day Forrest, with his brigade, having been ordered by me from Columbia, arrived, and engaged them all day, with the loss of one killed and three wounded; the loss of the enemy heavy. Forrest falling back.

On the 28th Forrest discovered a heavy force of cavalry, under Col. Strait, marching on Moulton and Blountsville. Gen. Forrest pursued this force with two regiments, fighting him all day and night at Driver's Gap, at Sand Mountain, with a loss of five killed and fifty wounded—Captains Forrest and Thompson it is feared, mortally. The enemy left on the field 50 killed, 150 wounded, burnt 50 of his waggon, turned loose 250 mules and 100 negroes, and pursued his way towards Blountsville, Gadsden, and Rome, Georgia.

On the 3rd of May, between Gadsden and Rome, after five days and nights of fighting and marching, General Forrest captured Colonel Strait and his whole command, about 1,600, with rifles, horses, &c.

BRAXTON BRAGG.

THE RICHMOND PRESS OF THE 7TH OF MAY ON THE RESULTS OF THE BATTLES NEAR FREDERICKSBURG.

The Enquirer says:—

"As to the materials of war, we have heard no estimate, but are informed that, as for knapsacks, haversacks, overcoats and coats, the ground was literally covered. Thousands of arms were scattered over the field. Fifty-three pieces of artillery were captured. The prisoners are said to number ten thousand.

"The condition of the wounded brought to the city is most remarkably good. The very large number that walked to the hospitals, apparently but slightly wounded, was most gratifying.

"The estimate of our loss has decreased from 10,000 to 8,000, and many that we have conversed with do not think it will reach 8,000, including killed, wounded, and missing."

A correspondent of the Enquirer writes concerning the main battle at Chancellorsville:—

"Our losses are fully 5,000, whilst those of the Yankees are confessed to be fully 25,000, and about thirty pieces of artillery. We have captured very near 8,000 prisoners, and have lost, I suppose, about 1,000 prisoners. These results of the fight point most conclusively to a most brilliant Confederate victory. We have captured one brigadier-general and any quantity of field and staff officers.

"Generals Slcomb, Howard, and O'Neill, of the Yankee army, are reported killed, and 'Fighting Joe' said to be slightly wounded. There are also many other good and true officers and men who have fallen, but our report would be too lengthy to enable us to make mention of all, so, presuming that my report is long enough, I will close."

The Examiner reports:—

"Our loss in killed, wounded, and missing is roughly estimated at ten thousand. The enemy's killed and severely wounded alone, it is thought, will amount to that number, leaving out of the account his slightly wounded who escaped, and the seven or eight thousand prisoners who have been taken. A gentleman who walked over the ground after the battle informs us that for ten miles around Chancellorsville the Yankee dead almost literally cover the face of the earth. From a casual observation he estimates the enemy's loss as five times greater than ours.

"We have been unable, in the confusion attendant upon the arrival of the wounded, to obtain any satisfactory details of the respective loss of our different regiments and batteries. There are many wild stories of regiments being 'cut to pieces,' which are unworthy of credit or repetition. The army intelligence office will, in a few days, be able to give to all who have friends or relatives in the army, authentic information regarding them."

The Sentinel says:—

"It is now certain that the late victories near Fredericksburg were the most decisive of the war. General Lee himself has so declared. The number of prisoners captured is still uncertain—six to ten thousand. The loss of the enemy supposed to be five to ten times ours. The number of our killed estimated by some at eight hundred to a thousand."

CONFEDERATE NOTES FUNDED.—The amount of Treasury Notes funded in 8 per cent. bonds up to the 22nd of April, inclusive, has been as follows at the points mentioned:—Charleston, $13,245,700; Columbia, $6,039,000; Greenville, $1,000,000; Augusta, $2,500,000; Atlanta, $1,234,000; Mobile, $8,000,000; Montgomery, $8,000,000; Petersburg, $3,000,000; Lynchburg, Virginia, $1,700,000; Staunton, Virginia, $5,000,000; Columbus, Georgia, $1,497,000; Macon, $1,000,000.

THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

MAY 1.—The Senate to-day passed the House Bill placing in military service, after the first of July next, all citizens of the United States, including Marylanders, residing or sojourning in the Confederate States. The House amendment to the Bill establishing a Confederate flag was concurred in.

A message was received from the President, returning, with his disapproval, the Act to authorise the transmission of newspapers to soldiers free of postage.

In the House nothing of interest transpired except the adoption of the amendment to create the Bill establishing the Confederate flag.

Congress adjourned sine die after passing an Act relative to the Congressional election in Tennessee. All Bills have been approved and signed by the President, except the Acts relating to staff officers, and the Acts for the conscription of Marylanders, which were not signed.

The Wilmington Journal says:—

"We are deeply pained to hear of the death of Major Henry McRae, of the 5th Regiment North Carolina Train, which took place in Charleston, on Wednesday last, the 22nd inst. By his death the Army of the Confederacy has lost a brave and true man, and a gallant soldier, and this, his native town, one of her worthiest sons. Though not falling on the battle field, his life was none the less a sacrifice to the cause of his country."

Dr. Samuel A. Cartwright died on the 2nd inst., at the residence of H. H. Smythe, Esq., near Jackson. At the time of his decease he occupied the position of Assistant Surgeon General of the Western Department.

The steamer Charleston, Captain H. S. Leiby, while going into Wilmington, on the morning of the 23rd, got ashore through the negligence of her pilot, but was got off by her energetic captain, through a heavy fire from the blockading fleet, and ran the gauntlet of the enemy's fire up to Fort Fisher, having 136 shots fired at her, but received no damage.—Columbia Guardian.

MARTIAL LAW.—The following resolutions from the Committee on the Judiciary have passed the Confederate House of Representatives:—

I. That Martial Law, in the sense of an arbitrary suspension of all the laws and civil jurisdictions, cannot exist within the Confederate States.

II. That Martial Law, in any sense, if it can exist within the Confederate States, can exist only by virtue of Legislative authority.

III. Military Law (for the government of the forces) is distinct from Martial Law, and it is enacted by Congress in pursuance of the Constitution.

IV. Without Martial Law military commanders may sometimes exert extraordinary powers at and near the places occupied by their troops, and may be justified by the nature and necessities of the service, and, therefore, by the laws authorizing the employment of the forces; but they assume the hazard of responsibility according to known principles of law.

V. For the security of liberty and the certainty of law, powers which are necessary to be conferred on the President, or on military commanders, in lieu of the power to declare Martial Law within the Confederate States, ought to be conferred by distinct enactments.

The resolutions passed by the following votes:—Yeas—Messrs. Arrington, Ashe, Atkins, Baldwin, Batson, Boyce, Bridgers, H. W. Bruce, Chambers, Chambliss, Chilton, Clapp, Clark, Clifton, Collier, Curry, Davidson, Davis, De Jarret, Farrow, Foote, Foster, Gaither, Garland, Garnett, Goode, Gray, Hanly, Herbert, Hodge, Holcombe, Marshall, McLean, Perkins, Raile, Read, Russell, Sexton, Singleton, Smith, of North Carolina, Strickland, Vest, Villere, Wright, of Georgia, Wright, of Texas—45. Nays—Messrs. Barksdale, Conrad, Conrow, Currin, Dargan, Dupre, Elliott, Ewing, Freeman, Graham, Hilton, Holt, Jones, Kennan, of Georgia, Kennan, of North Carolina, Lewis, Lyons, Machen, Martin, Miller, Munjelynn, Pugh, Royston, Swann, Tripple, Welch, Wilcox—27.

AN ENERGETIC WAR MEASURE.—The Senate has passed a bill from the House of Representatives, turning out of office all the clerks in the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments who are capable of shouldering a musket, and authorizing the detail of disabled soldiers to fill their places. The following is a copy of the Act:—

"The Congress, etc., do enact, that the Act entitled 'An Act to provide for an increase of the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments,' approved February 15th, 1862, be and the same is hereby amended by striking out the proviso at the end of the same, and inserting in its stead the following:—

"Provided, That no Quartermaster, Assistant-Quartermaster, Commissary, or Assistant-Commissary be authorized to employ as a clerk any one liable to military service. And the commanding officer of Quartermasters, Assistant-Quartermasters, Commissaries or Assistant-Commissaries, may detail from the ranks under his command such person or persons as may be necessary for service in the offices of said Quartermasters, Assistant-Quartermasters, Commissaries and Assistant-Commissaries; Provided, That only disabled soldiers shall be so detailed, while one can be found for such service."

SOUTHERN WAR ITEMS.

The following are from the files of the Charleston Courier, May 1 to May 11:—

Vicksburg, May 7.—Nothing new from the front to-day. The enemy has made no movements this side of Big Black river. The enemy's cavalry is reported about Cayuga. A party of Yankee cavalry crossed at Hankerson's Ferry on Tuesday night, captured Mr. Owen and son, planters, and recrossed the Big Black again.

Vicksburg, May 8.—All quiet to-day along the lines. The enemy is reported to be using the spado on the other side of Big Black river. The Yankees, it is said, occupy Utica, Illinois county, Mississippi.

Jackson, Mississippi, May 3.—Governor Pettus has received official information that our troops have driven the Yankees from Tupelo, and we now hold that town.

A gentleman who has arrived from New Orleans, says Banks has published an order requiring all registered enemies by the 1st of May to take the oath, or prepare to leave the Yankee lines on the 15th of May. The negroes are disgusted with Yankee freedom, and prefer to be whipped by Confederate masters to being shot by Yankees.

The new oath promulgated by Banks is far more binding, and will subject all who take it to Yankee conscription.

A riot had taken place at the Varieties Theatre, New Orleans. H. M. Gunners struck Mrs. Baker, who was acting on the stage, because she would not play the Yankee Authors.

Vicksburg, May 9.—Nothing new from the front to-day. The enemy have been landing troops at Young's Point. It is supposed that they are destined to reinforce Grant. The Whig newspaper office was destroyed by fire this afternoon. Origin of the fire unknown.

Richmond, May 9.—Imboden's Confederate force has destroyed the great Cheat River Brad lock, on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, built at an enormous cost, and regarded as one of the greatest triumphs of science.

From Georgetown.—Yankee re-appearance at Marrell's Inlet.—Our attentive friend and correspondent at Georgetown sends us the following account of the Yankees' re-appearance off Marrell's Inlet. It will be seen that the Yankees were well received, and left several trophies behind, as mementoes of their visit:—

Georgetown, May 6, 1863.

The Yankees, on the 31st inst., under cover of the fire from their steamer, landed again a boat's crew on Magnolia beach. A detachment of Captain Snowden's men met them and extended a hearty welcome. The Yankees left, deeply impressed with our hospitality. One decided to remain and attach himself to the soil. Captain Snowden's men allotted him a small farm, taking in exchange three fine rifles with accoutrements to match, four hats, and sundry other tokens of the Yankees' visit.

The Yankee steamer opened fire on the five vessels in port, and succeeded in striking the schooners Julia and George Chisholm in the hull, the Antoinette in the spars, and the Rover in the rigging. The wind since Sunday has been from the East, and doubtless prevented them from renewing their firing. As soon as there is a lull they will probably open again.

Vicksburg, May 4.—A Yankee craft with two barges in tow, loaded with medical stores and rations for the army below, attempted to run past our batteries last night, and was set on fire by our guns. The craft and barges were all burnt to the water's edge. The crew were taken off in skiffs and brought here.

Jackson, May 2.—A special despatch to the Mississippian from Snyder's Bluff, states that the enemy maintained a steady fire yesterday on our works at Grave Yard Hill, temporarily dislodging one gun. Deserters report General Sherman in command on board the flag-ship De Kalb. He has only ten regiments with him, averaging 3,000 men. The deserters state that the present demonstration is only a feint, and that no real attack is intended. They also report two persons killed on board the turreted gunboat Choctaw. Over forty of our shots struck the Choctaw.

A despatch from Cairo says:—"Jeff. Thompson with 2,500 men had attacked Cape Girardeau, but withdrew with a loss of forty killed. The Federal loss was small. Colonel McNeill was commanding."

The mouths of the Arkansas and White Rivers had been connected by a canal. Grant's head-quarters were at New Carthage. An important movement is afoot.

The enemy made several furious assaults on our troops in their entrenchments at Grand Gulf, and were badly repulsed. Bands of our troops have been placed at different points, where, in all probability, they will intercept and capture Grierson. Grierson had destroyed the Government tannery near Magnolia.

Jackson, Mississippi, May 1.—Grierson's Yankee force was at Summit, Mississippi, last evening. Dan Rice, the famous circus rider, is one of his captains. The Yankees burned a wood shed at Summit, but burned no cotton or private property. They have 200 negroes mounted on mules. Fighting just below Grand Gulf commenced at 12 o'clock last night. General Tracy is reported killed. The Yankees bombarded Snyder's Bluff furiously for several hours yesterday, but unsuccessfully. Our works remained uninjured. The only casualties on our side were two or three wounded. Lieut.-General Pemberton went to Vicksburg yesterday.

The Memphis Bulletin, of the 27th ult., says the river had fallen twenty-four feet in all.

A Cincinnati despatch of the 24th ult., says the shipment of stores in the past week had been the largest ever known.

The Commissary department at St. Louis is very active. Three hundred thousand rations were being got ready for Grant's army.

Several ladies of Covington, Kentucky, have been arrested for writing secesh letters, and are to be court martialed.

A skirmish had taken place at Patterson, Mobile. The Federals lost eleven killed. They burned the town and then evacuated it.

General McNeill, of the Palmyra Massacre notoriety, is reported captured.

Two regiments of militia replace the garrison at St. Louis, which goes into the field. It is believed the rebels have captured Cape Girardeau. A report from Louisville, Kentucky, states that Morgan, with a numerous force of cavalry, is in Wayne county, Kentucky. An order has been received in Nashville requiring the entire population, ladies included, to take the oath of allegiance within ten days, or be sent South.

Jackson, Mississippi, May 1.—The enemy advanced, and fighting began at Grand Gulf to-day, about one o'clock, continuing until four o'clock, at which time the enemy were repulsed. The battle was renewed at eight o'clock this evening. The enemy took Wade's Virginia battery, which was re-taken this evening. The Yankees have been driven one mile from the battle field, and the firing has ceased. The loss is heavy on both sides. General Bowen's horse, was struck four times in a charge on the enemy.

Jackson, Mississippi, May 2.—A despatch from Woodville says:—"The enemy is advancing on that point from above and below. The citizens are hastily organising, and will make the best defence possible."

Natchez, May 1.—A gentleman who left Alexandria on Wednesday morning, brings intelligence that Banks's army is not now, nor has it been, nearer than within fifty miles of Alexandria. He also reports that General Mouton, with fifteen hundred cavalry, gained the enemy's rear, and destroyed 175 waggons belonging to Banks's advance trains.

It is reported that the late movements of the Yankees on the Teche river, in Louisiana, were checked in great part by our torpedoes, and were thus prevented from working greater injury to us.

THE GULF DEPARTMENT.

(From our own Correspondent.)

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA.

Saturday, May 9th, 1863.

We had heard nothing from General Banks, save a telegram two days ago, that his advance was thirty miles from Opelousas, and that he was following with the rest of the army on the road towards Red River. To-day, however, to the surprise of all of us, Admiral Farragut, with three or four of his officers, arrived in town. He left the flag-ship Hartford, in Red River, took a smaller gunboat, came down through the Atchafalaya and Grand Lake to Brashear City, and thence by rail to this city. He has not been to Alexandria; but Admiral Porter, with two or three gunboats and his iron-clads, went up the river and occupied Alexandria on the 6th inst. The advance of Banks's column arrived on the 7th inst., and Banks was expected "with the rest" on the following day. The occupation was easy; there was no Confederate force there, and the few inhabitants, of course, made no opposition. I did not think there would be any very serious resistance to so large a force as was brought against the place. The nearest encampment of Confederate troops in that section of the country is at Archidelpia, on the Wachita river, in Arkansas, under command of Kirby Smith. They could have come down by means of the steamboats lying at Camden, fifty miles below, through the Black River into the Red; but it would have been at the risk of the loss of their boats, and at the sacrifice of lives that can be lost—if lost they must be—on far more noble and important fields. So Alexandria is quietly occupied, and, although it is not the season therefor, we may look for a speedy and greedy cotton gathering.

Grand Gulf, too, is gone. It is on the Mississippi, one hundred and eighty-five miles above Port Hudson, and sixty miles below Vicksburg. There was a battery there of three 8-inch columbiads, and two 42-pound rifled guns. On the night of the 29th ult., Porter shelled the place, while Grant crossed the river with his troops to get in the rear. The Confederates retreated to Fort Gibson, eight miles inland, taking with them fifty field pieces. There was a considerable force at Port Gibson, and Grant marched upon the place. Report says he has taken it.

These things indicate that the places have been held by very small forces, while Vicksburg and Port Hudson have been strengthened. There will be no diffusion of Confederate troops to places of little or no importance, when a great battle is impending in Tennessee, and another at Vicksburg.

Banks's campaign is probably ended with the occupation of Alexandria. The return of Farragut to the city leads me to believe that he intends to take the fleet below Port Hudson, while Porter acts with the iron-clads above, and that they will bombard the place within a few days. You may be very sure there will be no more attempts to pass the batteries.

I had nearly forgotten to tell you that before Porter went to Alexandria, he sent the gunboats Arizona, Albattross, and Estrella up Red River, to reduce a small earthwork known as Fort de Russy. It was reduced, or evacuated, and a little boat belonging to the Confederates was disabled, while another boat escaped. The Federals lost two killed and three wounded.

Those persons, in this city, who refused to take the oath of allegiance to the United States when Butler came here were registered as enemies. There were about 4,000 in all. An order has recently been issued that they must leave on the 15th inst. Most of them will go gladly. The business season is over till autumn. Many of them have their families and plantations in the Confederacy. They must, by the order, go into the Confederate lines, though a few of them would be glad to go to Cuba or to Europe. Circulars have been issued to many of them, within a day or two, calling their attention to the order, and inviting them to get ready.

Men who have property here are notified, while some of the young men without means have received no circulars. No one will be allowed to take anything with them, beyond ten days' provisions, their clothing, their Confederate money, and all the greenbacks they choose to carry, but no gold or silver. It may be policy to send these "registered enemies" into the Confederate lines just now, and, as the Federal authorities insist upon it, of course they know best; but the enemies go home with a full knowledge of the Federal forces and many of their plans. All the young men will at once join the Confederate army, and the others will be conscripted. The movement adds at least 2,000 good fighting men to the Confederates. Moreover, the exodus of the "enemies" will occasion another display similar to the one when two hundred exchanged officers and soldiers recently went away by boat to be "restored" to the Confederacy at some point above Baton Rouge. There were nearly ten thousand people, a large majority of them ladies, on the levee to see their friends off. Cheers were given for Jeff. Davis, and the "red, white, and red," was seen everywhere. This, for a "Union city," was somewhat striking, particularly as it was found necessary to scatter the crowd at the point of the bayonet.

An attempt was made, a few nights since, by a few disorderly persons, to force the orchestra at the Varieties to play Hail, Columbia. It resulted in the closing of the theatre. The very same persons attempted it again at an amateur concert in the Opera House this week, and amidst much confusion the concert was broken up. Scarcely any of the Federal officers here approve of the proceeding; and General Sherman, commanding the city in Banks's absence, issued an order to-day requiring all programmes of entertainments to be submitted to him, and stating that no programmes approved shall be departed from, under any circumstances, and that persons disturbing entertainments, as laid down in the programme, shall be punished. But as he recommends the inclusion of national airs, we shall probably have no more amusements this season.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, May 6th, 1863.

Pending the arrival of the iron-clads, expected from Port Royal so soon as they recover from the terrible "banging" received at Charleston, when there may be another attempt in conjunction with Porter's and Farragut's fleets upon Port Hudson, we are watching with interest the movements of General Banks in Western Louisiana. In the advance upon Alexandria, after four fights with comparatively small opposing forces, and the capture of, he says, two thousand prisoners, to say nothing of a general gathering in of all the horses, mules, and cattle in the region, he rested at Opelousas with Weitzel and the larger part of the army. Meanwhile, Grover was sent with two brigades to Barre's Landing on the Bayou Courtaubeau, and Dwight with one brigade advanced to Washington, eight miles above.

This happy triangular arrangement afforded the following advantages,—an opportunity to gather in at Opelousas all the district could possibly afford: to send cotton and cattle in any quantity to Barre's Landing, for shipment to Berwick's Bay, while Dwight was in advance to warn them of any danger which might threaten them from Red River. But Farragut, with two gunboats, was known to be in the vicinity of Red River, and it was supposed that by this time Porter must have joined him with four iron-clads and one or two gunboats. It was desirable that the two naval officers should be informed of General Banks's position, so that they could co-operate in the advance upon Alexandria.

Accordingly last week Banks hazarded the sending of the gunboat Arizona through the Atchafalaya and into Red River to communicate with Farragut. She successfully performed her mission, finding Farragut and Porter at the mouth of Red River, delivering her despatches and safely returning. Meanwhile, Banks was by no means idle. Large quantities of cotton and numerous droves of cattle were sent to Barre's Landing. I do not know that the object of the expedition was to collect cattle and cotton; but the Opelousas correspondent of the Government official organ in this city writes yesterday as follows:—

On both sides the bayou, at Barre's, cotton was piled bale upon bale over several acres; along the road from there to Opelousas, immense army waggons, each containing a half dozen bales, lined the road, each waggon driven by a jolly contraband, who seemed to think the millennium had come. Reaching Opelousas, the first object that attracted my attention was a warehouse, with a large yard attached, piled high with a fleecy cloud, and the surrounding streets were filled with waggons, mules, and darkies, waiting to haul it away to some bayou landing, to be shipped from thence to New Orleans.

He thinks that at least 200,000 bales have been collected; but I entirely discredit his account. The parishes, St. Mary, St. Landry, St. Martin, Lafayette, and Vermillion, have never yielded in any season more than 20,000 bales. It is the sugar region. When Banks gets to Alexandria he will find cotton in abundance.

Now as some persons were willing to lose their character as Confederates, for the sake of saving their cotton and cash, and as many came in to head-quarters to take the oath of allegiance, I am charitable enough to believe that some of this cotton will be shipped on account of its owners. But it should be remembered that the larger part of the cotton and cattle belonged to avowed secessionists, and was summarily confiscated. When Butler was here he made it his business to find out, first if a man was a secessionist, and then the amount of his property. Banks is not rapacious, nor is he a thief. But I think he is willing to make the secessionists pay smartly for the war, while he would not use his position to enrich himself.

It is certainly hard upon those men who have professed to be Union, but who have contributed liberally to the Confederate cause, to have a Federal army come and strip them of all the rest—even to the last chicken in the coop. Banks announced that what was taken for the use of the army should be paid for. He issued orders against "straggling and pillaging," and Dwight shot one man therefore, last week. But beyond the little the tailors put in the coats to "swell the martial breast," soldiers do not use cotton, and armies do not need it. An invading army cannot go through a country without feeling that all that is in it belongs to the army. In the first Teche movement, which extended no further than Pattersonville, and which resulted in no more than the destruction of a miserable old steamboat, and the loss of several lives—after Weitzel had ordered the return of his regiments, several lawless men went back on the Bayou, entered two deserted mansions on Mrs. Mead's plantation, stripped them of everything that was portable down to the pitchers in the pantries, "smashed" the black walnut furniture, and then burned the houses to the ground. There is a general idea among the soldiers, that silver spoons and clothing are "contraband of war"—at all events, it isn't stealing, if they are "conveyed" from a "d—d rebel."

What a perfect farce it is to think of thus "conciliating" the States called by Mr. John Van Buren "our wayward sisters," and restoring them to the Union! There are claims enough now for damages against the United States' Government to make up an amount that never can be paid—no, not even in "greenbacks."

But to return to Banks. We know by telegram from Opelousas last night that Porter was advancing with his iron-clads up Red River; and Banks's column was to advance upon the same place this morning. They will meet with but little resistance. The Confederate troops are concentrated in more important positions, and they will not weaken those places at present, for the sake of saving the cotton and sugar of all Opelousas. The place can be seriously damaged, and an extensive foundry and machine shop will doubtless be destroyed. The loss of communication by Red River to Texas, which is wholly in the hands of the Confederates, and this with the mouth of the Rio Grande, the great outlet for cotton and inlet for supplies, will be a serious calamity. But let no Confederate croak yet—let us see what happens.

There is a little more news. The Opelousas telegram of last night says that "Grand Gulf (on the Mississippi) is captured with all its guns." Porter found it annoying, no doubt, but he will find warmer work at Vicksburg and Port Hudson. General Grant was reported to be on the east bank of the Mississippi "driving the enemy before him," and he was said to have taken 400 prisoners. What adds to the exuberance of this telegram is Porter's belief that "Vicksburg will be evacuated."

At Opelousas, Monday, Captain Dwight was sent with despatches, and was shot on the road by three men. They probably ordered him to surrender and shot him as he was trying to escape; but Dwight, a younger brother of the General who had the advance, was much loved in the Federal army, and General Banks issued an order to arrest 100 men in the vicinity and send them under a strong guard to New Orleans, where they will be kept in close confinement, "as hostages for the delivery of the murderers into the hands of the military authorities of the United States."

In this city two general orders just issued are important; one requires all the "Registered Enemies of the United States" to leave the department before May 15th. You may expect many summer visitors abroad—though many will go into the Confederate lines. The next order says that "Any person who shall be convicted before the Commanding-General of this Department of furnishing supplies to the enemies of the United States in arms, shall suffer the penalty of death." Last week, before the issue of this order, Mr. W. G. Batten was convicted of concealing articles contraband of war, in barrels, supposed to be beef, and sending them into the Confederacy. He was sentenced to pay a fine of $25,000 (£5,000), and to imprisonment at hard labour one year, in Port Pickens.

Business here is dull—inexpressibly so, and will grow duller as the season advances. There is no yellow fever as yet, but vessels coming from Havannah and other Gulf and West India ports, are already, thus early, subject to fifteen days' quarantine. Of course, summer is already here, with a profusion of strawberries, blackberries, peas, and new potatoes in our markets. I will advise you of the progress of the Banks' movement by the next steamer, which leaves for New York on Sunday.

THE FEDERAL FLEET AT ST. THOMAS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

ST. THOMAS, West Indies, May 12, 1863.

The Federal war vessels seem to have possession of this harbour, and there are, at this moment, no less than three here,—the Vanderbilt, Commodore Wilkes, the Wachusett, and Sheppard Knapp;—the Gembok is being dismantled, and laden with coal for the use of the fleet. The Consul is receiving large quantities of coal for that purpose.

My advices from Bermuda state that the Robert E. Lee, Captain Wilkinson, late Graffe, arrived there on the 15th ultimo, from Wilmington, with about 1,000 bales of cotton, &c., and that she left Bermuda on the 25th; the Beauregard had arrived at Charleston, and the Merrimac, from Bermuda, at Wilmington, on the 22nd ultimo; more steamers were expected on the 13th. I have been furnished with the following list of the Federal war vessels, in port, up to last evening—two arrived yesterday after my having written you:—

U.S. Steam Frigate	Vanderbilt,	Adml. Wilkes,	14 guns.
" "	Corvette	Wachusett,	Fleming, 9 "
" "	"	Alabama,	Nichols, 10 "
" "	"	Oneida,	Lieut. Allen, 9 "
" "	Gunboat	Chippewa,	Boysen, 4 "
" "			from Capo de Verdes.
" Ship	Shep. Knapp,	Estrange,	8 "
" Barque	Gembok,	Canendy,	7 " to be a coal depot.

One left last night, supposed to be the Wachusett. I understand that the Governor has notified Admiral Wilkes that this harbour is not to be used as a depot.

The Columbia had also arrived at Bermuda, from Wilmington, North Carolina.

THE PARIS PRESS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, June 2nd.

ELECTION WEEK.—These two words are the summary of the Paris Press for the last eight days, and if there had not been also the great £4,000 race on the Course of Boulogne last Sunday, I should have little but the elections to write about. As a serious man, I begin, of course, with the race to which all Paris crowded, leaving the polling-booths deserted. The ground is so well watered, that the slight shower which fell just before the race came off was only required to lay the dust which the hundreds of equipages of all kinds had raised along the road, and was slight enough not to spoil the running. The Emperor made his appearance just before the great race was run, looking in excellent spirits, and the animation with which the Empress entered into the sport seemed to prove that she has quite recovered from her late illness. I need not speak of the race and its result in favour of Mr. Saville's Ranger, but I may mention the applause with which his gift of a tithe of the prize to Paris Charities was received. Nor can I dismiss the subject without referring to the Derby, which supplied the Presse with a most instructive article on the origin and decorations of the Garter. Taking Mr. Disraeli's celebrated comparison literally, it announced that the winner had just received the blue ribbon, and then went on to explain the great part played in England by blue ribbons. They are the highest prize for all species of excellence—the successful statesman, the aristocrat who unites broad acres to long lineage, the fleetest racer, are alike distinguished by this enviable decoration. The writer forgot to add that this privilege of the blue ribbon was formerly not confined to England, but was worn also by the French knights of "the King's orders," and metaphorically (but he does not understand metaphors), by those female benefactors of mankind whose culinary preparations are pronounced above par.

French elections offer no subject to a Hogarth. They develop no humours but bad humour. The Constitutionnel has for a week filled its chief columns with attack on M. Thiers, consisting of ingenious if not always candid quotations from his writings and speeches. In England the author of the "Romance of Revolution and Empire" has a very different value to that which he had in France. It may be doubtful if it was good policy to expose the inconsistencies of a man to whom the Napoleon dynasty owes so much, and whose credit as a historian would, on the showing of his present adversaries, be so terribly weakened by his opinions as a statesman. A the world moves on it is folly to require the Minister who should move with it to maintain views which new events must alter. The most mischievous acts of M. Thiers, including the perpetration of his History, are not those which are brought forward as accusations. His warning against unlimited credit, which reminds him of the assignats and scaffolds of the Terror, his disbelief in the conveyance of private messages by the telegraph, his opposition to a uniform rate of postage, are among the crimes laid to his charge. He is the spoiled child of Fortune, who, not content with loading him with her favours in his early years, draws him now from a retreat in which, his part played out, he had disappeared from public view, to make him again one of the foremost figures in France.

The elections are over, and although the result is not yet officially proclaimed, it appears that all the opposition candidates, with one doubtful election, have succeeded in Paris. It cannot be denied that, thanks to M. de Persigny's and M. Haussmann's active interference in urging the danger of such an election "of lawyers and journalists," the Government has unquestionably received a severe check. The worst mischief of the present system of patronised candidates is, that in the popular mind the candidate and the Government are necessarily identified; and in voting against the one, the electors are told by the Ministers themselves that they are voting against the other. Thus the whole principle of Government is submitted to the placet of the population every six years, and the day that a majority of opposition deputies is returned to the Legislative Chamber, a revolution will have been voted by universal suffrage. The opposition newspapers have carried their entire list in Paris and there are many parts of the country where the Government candidate is hardly expected to be returned. After all, the number will be insignificant, fewer than any English minister would wish to see on the opposition benches, but the French opposition is elected as the avowed opponents, not of the ministers but of the Government, and the mere fact of their election, on this understanding, must render nugatory all attempts to limit the nature of their opposition. Thanks to M. de Persigny, it is not his Majesty's opposition, but the opposition to his Majesty.

The elections being thus concluded, Poland, which has been somewhat neglected during the last week, will probably resume its place in public sympathies. The last news have been all of a kind to justify the hope that the peace of Europe would not be disturbed, but it must not be concealed that the result of the elections here may react unfavourably on this question. The opposition press, which has just returned two of its editors to the Chamber, will now write with greater authority and not less strongly in favour of an armed intervention in Poland. How this may affect the Emperor's decision will probably, in a great measure, depend upon the tone of these papers in other matters. I remarked, as significant, the appearance in the Opinion Nationale of last night, of long extracts from a Life of Carnot, by his son, highly unfattering to the first Consul.

From Berne there come news which may have an important bearing on American affairs. Many of the Swiss emigrants to the United States have applied to the Federal Council for protection from the effects of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation for a general conscription. The Swiss Government has a treaty, concluded in 1850 with that of the United States, by which its subjects are exempted from military service. The Council regards the claims of its citizens to exemption from the conscription as well founded, as the mere fact of having declared an intention of being naturalised in America cannot withdraw them from the protection of their native Government. Such a declaration must be regarded, not as a contract entered into, but as a promise of a contract which can entail no duties till it has been completed. Nevertheless, the Council hesitates to interfere, not from any doubt on the subject, but because England and France have treaties of the same tenor with the United States, and it feels that if they are silent, its representations at Washington have little chance of being listened to. It is well known that by English law, a natural born subject of the Crown cannot escape his allegiance; but as England would not protect him from the consequences of his acts, in case of his naturalization in a foreign country, it may be doubted whether the Government, which has always shown such unwillingness to raise difficulties with the Northern States, will now do so in favour of men who have declared their intention of abandoning its protection. France, which permits the naturalization of its citizens abroad, is likely to take the same view of its duties as the Federal Council of Switzerland, in which case the Emperor will interfere to save French blood from being spilt in this hopeless struggle.

The Moniteur, in publishing the details of the battle of Chancellorsville, remarks in its bulletin that the Confederates were again victors, but with a loss of 15,000 to 18,000 men on either side, and without the gain of one inch of ground by either army. The accounts of the military operations of the war, which have appeared from time to time in the Moniteur are remarkably well written, and evidently by a professional pen. In this report it especially praises the military coup d'œil of General Lee, who, with the intuition of a great general, at once divined the enemy's object, and so signally baffled him. It concludes thus:—"We have here another proof of how little value must be attached to the theoretical generalship which plans its campaigns in the cabinet. The position of Chancellorsville had been carefully studied. Hooker and the generals under him knew both the weak and strong points of the position. They brought the plan of the battle in their baggage, and fancied they had brought a victory along with it. But the enemy was expected from the North, and he came from the South."

The Paris quid-nuncs have been busy with conjectures about the cause of Mr. Mason's visit. I need not say that they are mere conjectures caught in the air, as Germans would say. The last has been too busy a week in Paris for negotiations on any subject not bearing on the elections.

Your readers probably take little interest in the fossil man, the discovery of whose jaw, near Abbeville, in a gravel bank, along with a large number of flint hatchets and fossil bones of elephants, rhinoceros, &c., led to a congress of French and English savans in the beginning of last month. M. Elie de Beaumont, the greatest authority on such matters, has pronounced judgment against the pretensions of the owner of the jaw to an antediluvian or pre-Adamite existence. He was simply a workman of the period called the age of stone, surprised in his manufactory of arms by one of those sudden inundations which from time to time overwhelm a district, overturning whole tracts of land, and laying bare the deposits of ages. It was thus that the truly fossil remains of a far earlier date came to be mixed in the gravel-bank of Moulin-Luignon with the handiwork of man and a part of their maker's skeleton, and Bishop Colenso must draw no new argument from the discovery.

THE DEATH OF STONEWALL JACKSON.

(From the Richmond Inquirer of May 13).

General Jackson, having gone some distance in front of the line of skirmishers on Saturday evening (May 2), was returning about eight o'clock, attended by his staff and part of his couriers. The cavalcade was in the darkness of the night mistaken for a body of the enemy's cavalry, and fired upon by a regiment of his own corps. He was struck by three balls, one through the left arm, two inches below the shoulder joint, shattering the bone and severing the chief artery; another ball passed through the same arm between the elbow and wrist, making its exit through the palm of the hand; a third ball entered the palm of the right hand about its middle, passing through, and broke two bones. He was wounded on the flank-road, about 50 yards in advance of the enemy. He fell from his horse, and was caught by Captain Wormley, to whom he remarked, "All my wounds are by my own men." He had given orders to fire at anything coming up the road, before he left the lines. The enemy's skirmishers appeared ahead of him, and he turned to ride back. Just then some one cried out, "Cavalry, charge!" and immediately the regiment fired. The whole party broke forward to ride through our line to escape the fire. Captain Boswell was killed, and carried through the line by his horse and fell among our own men. Colonel Couchfield, Chief of Staff, was wounded by his side. Two couriers were killed. Major Pendleton, Lieutenants Morrison and Smith, escaped uninjured. General Jackson was immediately placed on a litter, and started for the rear. The firing attracted the attention of the enemy, and was resumed by both lines. One litter-bearer was shot down, and the General fell from the shoulders of the men, receiving a severe contusion, adding to the injury of the arm, and injuring his side severely. The enemy's fire of artillery on this point was terrible. General Jackson was left for five minutes until the fire slackened; then placed in an ambulance, and carried to the field hospital at Wilderness Run. He lost a large amount of blood, and at one time told Dr. McGuire he thought he was dying, and would have bled to death, but a tourniquet was immediately applied. For two hours he was nearly pulseless from the shock. As he was being carried from the field frequent inquiries were made by the soldiers, "Who have you there?" He told the doctor, "Do not tell the troops I am wounded."

After the reaction a consultation was held between Drs. Black, Coleman, Walls, and McGuire, and amputation was decided upon. He was asked, "If we find amputation necessary, shall it be done at once?" He replied, "Yes, certainly, Dr. McGuire—do for me whatever you think is right." The operation was performed while he was under the influence of chloroform, and was borne well. He slept on Sunday morning, was cheerful, and in every way was doing well. He sent for Mrs. Jackson, asked minutely about the battle, spoke cheerfully of the result, and said:—"If I had not been wounded, or had an hour more of daylight, I would have cut off the enemy from the road to the United States Ford, and we would have had them entirely surrounded, and they would have been obliged to surrender, or cut their way out. They had no other alternative. My troops sometimes may fail in driving the enemy from a position, but the enemy always fail to drive my men from a position." This was said smilingly. He complained this day of the fall from the litter, although no contusion or abrasion was apparent as the result of the fall. He did not complain of his wounds; never spoke of them unless asked. On Sunday evening he slept well. On Monday he was carried to Chancellor's house, near Gurness's depot. He was cheerful; talked about the battle, the gallant bearing of General Rhodes, and said that his Major-General's commission ought to date from Saturday, the grand charge of his old Stonewall brigade, of which he had heard; asked after all his officers; during the day talked more than usual and said, "Men who live through this war will be proud to say, 'I was one of the Stonewall brigade' to their children." He insisted that the term "Stonewall" belonged to them and not to him.

During the ride to Guinea he complained greatly of heat, and, besides wet applications to his wounds, begged that a wet cloth might be applied to his stomach, which was done, greatly to his relief, as he expressed it. He slept well on Monday night, and ate with relish the next morning. On Tuesday his wounds were doing very well. He asked: "Can you tell me, from the appearance of my wounds, how long I will be kept from the field?" He was greatly satisfied when told they were doing remarkably well. He did not complain of any pain in his side, and wanted to see the members of his staff, but was advised not. On Wednesday his wounds looked remarkably well. He expected to go to Richmond this day, but was prevented by rain. This night, while his surgeon, who had not slept for three nights, was asleep, he complained of nausea, and ordered his boy Jim to place a wet towel over his stomach: this was done. About daylight the surgeon was awakened by the boy saying, "The General is in great pain." The pain was in the right side, and due to incipient pneumonia and some nervousness, which he himself attributed to the fall from the litter. On Thursday Mrs. Jackson arrived, greatly to his joy and satisfaction, and she faithfully nursed him to the end. By Thursday evening all pain had ceased. He suffered greatly from prostration. On Friday he suffered no pain, but prostration increased.

On Sunday morning, when it was apparent that he was rapidly sinking, Mrs. Jackson was informed of his condition. She then had free and full converse with him, and told him he was going to die. He said, "Very good; very good. It is all right." He had previously said:—"I consider these wounds a blessing. They were given me for some good and wise purpose. I would not part with them if I could." He asked of Major Pendleton, "Who is preaching at head-quarters to-day?" He sent messages to all the generals. He expressed a wish to be buried at Lexington, in the valley of Virginia. During delirium his mind reverted to the battle-field, and he sent orders to Gen. A. P. Hill to prepare for action, and to Major Hawks, his commissary, and to the surgeons. He frequently expressed to his aides his wish that Major-General Ewell should be ordered to command his corps. His confidence in General Ewell was very great, and the manner in which he spoke of him showed that he had duly considered the matter.

MR. ROEBUCK'S MOTION.

It seems to us to be high time that the Government should reconsider the propriety of that policy which they have hitherto obstinately pursued towards the American belligerents—a policy which they, in common with the great majority of Northern partisans in this country, dignify by the title of a strict and impartial neutrality, but which is generally considered, both at home and abroad, to savour of an unworthy timidity, and to involve much practical injustice and not a little possibility of future peril. No one can pretend to say that this policy has been successful. It has, indeed, allowed us to maintain peace; and this is all; for we cannot say that it has averted war. We have been constantly threatened with war. If we are to judge the intentions of the Federal Government by its official demeanour, or those of the Northern people by the language of Congress, of the press, and of public meetings, we must say that we have been once at least in every ninety days on the verge of war, and have only avoided it by a series of unjust, unrighteous, and undignified concessions. We have seen our flag insulted, our ports blockaded, our commerce pillaged by Federal cruisers acting under distinct orders from the Navy Department at Washington, while the Secretary of State has amused us with apologies never followed by amendment, and with promises never meant to be fulfilled. The policy of partial concession and one-sided conciliation, which ministerial special pleaders call neutrality, is a complete and ignominious failure. It is time for a change of measures. We would rather that such a change should be initiated by the Government themselves, and that no serious division of opinion should be apparent in the national councils. But we are convinced that such division would be no more than apparent; and that more than three-fourths of those who would feel it their duty to support Lord Palmerston in adhering to his present policy would much more willingly and heartily follow him in a more manly and more English course. And, therefore, we heartily approve and wish success to the motion of which Mr. Roebuck has given notice, requesting her Majesty "to enter into negotiation with the Great Powers of Europe for the purpose of obtaining their co-operation in the recognition of the independence of the Confederate States of North America," a course which we conceive to be the only course consistent with justice and with the honour and interests of Great Britain. We believe that the success of such a motion would administer a wholesome and very necessary rebuke to the outrageous insolence of the Federal Government; that it would tend to promote the restoration of peace; that it would be a blessing to the North, to the Confederacy, and to the world at large; and that it would secure for generations to come the peace and prosperity of our possessions in North America.

We think—and nine Englishmen in ten think with us—that the argument as to the right of recognition, which has been discussed with ample ability and deliberation on both sides, has been definitely decided in our favour. It has been shown that this right has been repeatedly exercised by foreign powers on much more slender grounds; that it has been asserted and acted on by the United States wherever their convenience or their sympathies prompted; and that England has exercised it in the case of Governments not half as strong or well-established as that of the Confederate States. The Confederacy has a constitution which works as regularly and quietly as our own; its laws are administered and obeyed as well and as generally as those of any country in the world; everything goes on as if the Government had been in existence for twenty years, and as if the title of Mr. Davis were as indisputable as that of Queen Victoria. We need not contrast the maintenance of liberty and order in the South with the alternation of anarchy and military despotism in the North, or with the turbulence and civil conflicts of the Spanish-American republics ever since they sprang into existence. We will merely say that no one of the various states which from time to time policy or principle has induced us to recognise had so stable or so respectable a Government as that which now rules at Richmond, and that if such a Government be not entitled to recognition we do wrong in recognising the kingdom of Italy, and we did wrong in recognising Texas, or the Spanish American States, or the empire of Brazil. It is true that the Confederate States happen, one and all, to be slave-holding communities. So is Brazil; so is Spain; so are the United States; so were we but a generation back. We have nothing to do with the internal institutions of foreign countries—with polygamy in Turkey, or despotism in France, or slavery in Cuba. It is true that the limits of the Confederacy are in some sense undetermined. Recognition does not involve us in any question of frontiers; it simply brings us into relations with a Government, not with its territory. The frontier question must be settled afterwards—by negotiation, by foreign intervention, or in the last resort by the sword. It is true that the enemy's armies still occupy a certain number of places on the Confederate territory—that is to say, war and invasion are still going on. But this fact does not disturb the independence of the Confederacy. France was an independent power while England held Calais; Spain is independent, though we hold Gibraltar; Russia was independent, even when a French army penetrated to Moscow. There is no shadow of a chance that the North should subdue the South. The "Grand Army" has been for the fifth time hurled back, in defeat and disgrace, from the road to the Confederate capital. It has sustained such reverses and disasters as would have taught any nation not devoid of its senses that the war was a hopeless one. It has been thoroughly beaten at Charleston; it has accomplished nothing but rapine, pillage, and devastation in the West. The God of Battles has decided on the appeal of the combatants; we cannot be bound to submit to the madness which induces the aggressor still to refuse to listen to the decision, and renounce an enterprise as desperate as it is wicked. We are not bound to refuse recognition to the Confederate States simply because the folly and frenzy of the North refuse to understand that the arbitrament of war has been given in favour of those who are fighting for independence and against those who are fighting for empire or for vengeance.

By withholding recognition we are actually doing our utmost to prolong the war. The appeals of those patriots who are endeavouring to save the prosperity and liberty of the Northern States by inducing them to withdraw from this wanton and impossible endeavour to subjugate an unlimited territory and an Anglo-Saxon people, are answered by the taunt that while the European Powers refuse to acknowledge the independence of the Confederacy it ill becomes citizens of the North to advocate the abandonment of their country's claims—that it is not for Unionists to be the first to proclaim the disruption of the Union, and come before the world, like the unfortunate Cope, "with the news of their own defeat." Nothing would have so great an effect on the public opinion of the North, nothing would do so much to prove to statesmen and to people that peace must be made and that separation must be endured, than the formal recognition of the South by two or three of the Great Powers. They might bluster, they might rave, they might threaten, but they must and would submit. They might hate us, and vow vengeance against us; but their hatred would be utterly impotent, and it could hardly be more savage than it is at present. As to war, that is utterly out of the question. War against France and England would be too wild an act of suicidal madness, even for a nation already, to all appearance, afflicted with that insanity which falls on those whose ruin is decreed on high. We have yielded already too much to our fear of an open breach with the United States. For the last two years our American policy has been governed wholly by that fear. We have submitted to wrong, and we have done wrong to the South, in order to avoid at any price an open quarrel with Mr. Lincoln and the unfortunate people over which he rules. It is time that there were an end of this; time that England should act with a sole regard to her own dignity, duty, and honour; leaving the Americans of the North to learn at their leisure that they are powerless either to avenge or to control her. It is time that we should do justice to the South, and show by the first token of kindness she has received from a European Power that England knows how to value the heroism, and sympathise with the struggles of a thoroughly English nation—a nation English in its character, temper, and tendencies; English in courage, constancy, and endurance; English "in blood, in language, in religion." English in the calm resolution which counts all individual sacrifices cheap for the sake of national independence and national honour. It is time that we should pay somewhat less deference to the countrymen of Seward, Wilkes, and Butler; and somewhat more regard to the country in whose cause such men as Stonewall Jackson have fought and died.

THE FEDERAL EXPECTATION OF GETTING THE ENGLISH COTTON TRADE.

The New York Herald, of May 20, says:—"The failure of the cotton supply from America—one of the direct results of the Southern rebellion and consequent blockade of the rebel ports—has created such distress among British operatives as they never before, and, perhaps, will never again experience. Manufactories that have hitherto employed thousands of men, women, and children, are totally deserted, and some of the hitherto most extensive and flourishing mills are now as silent as the grave. Nor is there any indication that there will be an early resumption of trade and industry in the English manufacturing districts. The probability is that matters will grow worse instead of better; and the people are beginning to foresee the terrible evils which must arise out of a continuance of the paralysis of the most important branches of industry in the United Kingdom. For this reason we see so many of the trained and experienced operatives in the manufacturing districts of England and Ireland breaking up their once happy homes on the other side of the water and coming to cast their lot among us. No man can undertake to say what will be the result, in less than fifty years, of this wholesale emigration of skilled and accomplished artisans. Coming to a land where they will meet with nothing but hearty encouragement and the highest wages for their industry, these men will lay the foundations of manufactories in America that may hereafter rival, if not surpass, anything that has ever been seen in Europe. Let us then welcome, heartily welcome, every operative who comes to us from any part of Europe, whether they be connected with the cotton or any other manufacturing interest. Here they will find wealth and capital in abundance; and, although the nation is in the midst of a devastating revolution, we are, for all that, more prosperous than England or any other country in Europe. Let all active and industrious operatives come to the West, and we can safely guarantee them not only continuous prosperity, but such a future as they can never hope to achieve in the land of their birth."

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JUNE 4, 1863.

BRITISH JACKSON MONUMENTAL FUND.

We cheerfully comply with the request of several correspondents to lend our assistance to the collection of a fund, by British subscription, for the purpose of erecting a monument to Lieut.-Gen. Thomas J. Jackson, C.S.A., at Richmond, Virginia. According to the desire of the originators of the movement, Mr. J. B. Hopkins, of this office, will receive subscriptions to this fund, and hold the same at the disposal of any association that may be organized here or in Liverpool to carry the object into execution.

Mr. J. B. Hopkins acknowledges receipt, for the British Jackson Monument Fund, from the Editorial Staff and Employées of THE INDEX Newspaper, of £10 10s.

What the North is Fighting For.

THE fact was first announced to the British public some months since by Commander M. F. Maury, in a letter to the Times, but has since been abundantly confirmed by the official statements of the Confederate States Treasury, that the receipts from customs at the Port of Charleston have been larger since the commencement of the blockade than at any previous period within thirty years. In other words, the blockaded Confederate port, under a reduced and exceedingly moderate tariff, imports a larger quantity of foreign merchandise than it did in the same space of time as an open port of the United States. Or, to state the case still more clearly, the commercial system of the old Union proved a more effective blockade upon the direct importation of European goods into Southern ports, than do the fleets of men-of-war actually stationed at their entrance. In this pregnant fact will be found the solution of most of the mysteries which still enshroud, to the eyes of many, the great Transatlantic Revolution. If we examine it ever so little in detail, we shall be at no loss to discover what it is that the North is so obstinately and desperately fighting for.

We have now before us the official report, published by order of the United States' Congress, of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the "Commerce and Navigation" of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1859. From this report it appears that in that year, the last but one of the existence of the Union, the total value of the foreign imports of all the States was $338,968,130. Of this amount the twenty-two Southern ports of entry imported only $32,865,557, or less than one-tenth. In the same year, according to the same report, the value of the total exportation of all the States to foreign countries was $335,894,355, of which the Southern ports furnished $186,521,527, or more than one half. If, then, we assume that the South consumed, of foreign imported merchandise, only its pro rata share according to its white population, omitting the negroes altogether as consumers of foreign merchandise, say eight twenty-sixths of the whole, it follows that it bought from the North, at second-hand, of such merchandise to the value of at least £14,000,000, that being the difference in round numbers between the amount directly imported and actually consumed. If, however, we estimate the capacity of the South for consuming foreign goods by its share of the exports, the amount of such goods bought from the North, or of Northern manufacture substituted in their place, swells to largely upwards of £30,000,000.

Eloquent as these figures are, they do not nearly tell the full truth of the enormous gains annually derived from the Southern trade. First, because the direct foreign exportation from the Southern ports, large though it is, does not represent the whole amount of exportable and exported values annually produced by the South. The cotton and tobacco crops are exclusively Southern, but not the only Southern staples, and these two alone are estimated in the official statistics at $207,710,102; or more than the entire Southern exportation to foreign countries. A vast portion of Southern products—cotton, tobacco, sugar, rice, naval stores, etc.—are therefore sent to the North as raw material for its manufactures, or are consumed there, or are reshipped from Northern ports. Secondly, the North has itself long been the most successful competitor with Europe in the Southern market, and has supplied that market with its own manufactures far more than with those of its rivals. The value of the annual product of nineteen leading manufacturing pursuits in all the States, was, by the census of 1860, estimated at over one thousand million dollars in round numbers, deduction being made for exportation abroad. As the same authority places the value of the entire manufacturing industry of the South at less than 150 millions, it is clear—even if we were again to omit from the calculation the 4,000,000 of blacks—that, to have consumed its share of the domestic manufactures, the South must have bought from the North, in these nineteen articles alone, to the value of over $150,000,000.

We have thus the means of forming an idea, albeit still an inadequate one, of the truly magnificent prize for which the North is contending. A writer who has profoundly studied the commercial statistics of the United States, and whose figures have never been impugned, has drawn the international balance-sheet between North and South with a nearer approach to precision than we in a newspaper article could venture to do. He estimates the credit side of the Southern account, annually, and for bills upon Europe for produce shipped directly, and for raw material and produce of every description furnished the North, at $462,000,000; against which he places the debits as follows:—

	Dolls.
Domestic Goods (Northern manufacture) . . . . .	240,000,000
Imported Ditto (supplied by the North) . . . . .	106,900,000
Interest, Brokerage, and Commissions . . . . .	63,000,000
Southern Travellers . . . . .	53,000,000
	$462,000,000

The same writer, Mr. T. P. Kettell, a Northern man, in a book written and published at the North, and with a view of averting, if possible, the danger of disunion, then only impending, thus commented on these facts three years ago:—

This is the vast trade which approximates the sum of the dealings between the North and the South. These transactions influence the earnings, more or less direct, of every Northern man. A portion of every artisan's work is paid for by Southern means. Every carman draws pay, more or less, from the trade of that section. The agents who sell manufactures, the merchants who sell imported goods, the ships that carry them, the builders of the ships, the lumbermen who furnish the material, and all those who supply means of support to them and their families. The brokers, the dealers in Southern produce, the exchange dealers, the bankers, the insurance companies, and all those who are actively employed in receiving and distributing Southern produce, with the long train of persons who furnish them with houses, clothing, supplies, education, religion, amusement, transportation, &c., are dependent upon this active interchange, by which at least one thousand millions of dollars come and go between the North and South in a year. The mind can with difficulty contemplate the havoc and misery that would be caused on both sides by the breaking up and sundering of such ties, if indeed it were possible. If we were to penetrate beyond a rupture and imagine a peaceable separation, by which the South should be sundered without hostilities, we might contemplate the position and prospects of each. From what has been detailed above, as revealed to us from the returns of the census, it is quite apparent that the North, as distinguished from the South and West, would be alone permanently injured.

Its fortune depends upon manufacturing and shipping; but, as has been seen, it neither raises its own food nor its own raw material, nor does it furnish freights for its own shipping. The South, on the other hand, raises a surplus of food, and supplies the world with raw materials. Lumber, hides, cotton, wool, indigo—all the manufacturer requires—is within its own circle. The requisite capital to put them in action is rapidly accumulating, and in the long run it would lose—after recovering from first disasters—nothing by separation. The North, on the other hand, will have food and raw materials to buy in order to employ its labour; but who will then buy its goods? It cannot supply England; she makes the same things cheaper. The West will soon be able to supply itself. The South, while having the world as an eager customer for its raw produce, will not want Northern goods; but she will supply with her surplus manufactures the Central and South American countries, as now, with her flour. As the world progresses, manufacturing nations will deal less with each other, because they make the same things. Their customers must be tropical and agricultural communities. But if they quarrel with the manners and customs of these countries to the extent of attempting to force upon them a new system of morality, their piety will be its own reward, and the crown of commercial martyrdom may be mistaken for a Zany's cap.—"Southern Wealth and Northern Profits," p. 75.

The agricultural semi-tropical South has, in fact, been to the North what the Eastern and Western Indies have been, and still are, to many European countries; with this additional advantage, however, that the Indies of the North lay at its very door, instead of athwart the broad ocean. It is upon this Southern trade that great cities like New York and Philadelphia have been built; it is upon this Southern trade that the merchant marine of the United States has thriven, until it equalled that of Great Britain; it is this Southern trade upon which the whole dazzling fabric of Northern prosperity has been reared these fifty years. No nation, without a desperate or even a death struggle, ever surrendered such imperial wealth and domain; and the very greatness of the prize compels the North to persevere. National pride and popular madness have, doubtless, much to do with the obstinate prosecution of the war, but these are not the real obstacles in the path of peace. These passions, and even the still fiercer one of fanaticism, are at last controlled and made subservient to the cool calculating instinct of commerce and monopoly. New York and Philadelphia might have prevented this war at the outset; they might have stopped it any time these two years; they have not done so because peace implied to them a greater sacrifice than the war has yet exacted. Indeed, the war has heretofore afforded a fictitious compensation for the losses of the Southern trade. A country not actually invaded or blockaded, seldom feels the sufferings of war until the reaction sets in. On the contrary, it almost always enjoys for a time a sort of feverish prosperity, and as in certain diseases, the approaching dissolution is concealed by a morbid exhilaration. The ponderous figures which represent the annual war expenses of the nation take the place of its legitimate and profitable trade, and so long as the bubble lasts there is an intoxication of prosperity. All the cotton and tobacco and rice and sugar and naval stores of the South could not have bought more labour, more manufactures, employed more tonnage, and yielded larger apparent profits, than the "greenback" issues of Mr. Chase have done. It is a mere truism to say that a system so hollow cannot last for ever; the practical truth is that political economy has not yet discovered the formula by which to compute its precise duration. France, tenfold ruined and bankrupt, defied all Europe in arms for twenty years. Left to itself, the North must some time or other abandon its attempt at subjugation, but at what precise moment that time will arrive, the boldest speculator may well hesitate to predict. At present, there are no such symptoms of exhaustion and collapse as to warrant a hope that this time will come this year or the next, or even the next succeeding.

We have endeavoured to direct attention to the magnitude of the stake for which the North is contending, and which in a measure justifies the tenacity of purpose that has surprised the world. We cannot conclude without adverting to the blindness with which the European statesmen of the period, who, by a word, might command a peace, seem smitten. The greatness of the interest which the North has in the war, measures the interest which Europe, and especially England, has in peace. The monopoly which the North loses, gives to Europe a customer who is able to pay annually for upwards of £80,000,000 of goods. If a colony of such unparalleled resources were suddenly added to the British empire, without the expense and anxiety of its management and political government, every trade and every industry in the home country would feel the impulse of additional activity and increased profits. This is virtually what peace with an independent South would do. Even assuming that the North, by its proximity and its ingenuity, should recover a portion of the trade which before the war it monopolized, enough would be left to swell the gains of every wholesale house in Great Britain. We have, in the preceding computations, purposely, and very unfairly to the South, omitted the entire negro population as consumers of imported goods. It will be sufficient to illustrate the vastness of this single branch of the Southern trade to say, that for negro shoes, boots, and hats alone, the South has heretofore paid the North upwards of £2,000,000 annually. The annual consumption of agricultural implements, machinery, and hardware, for plantation use alone, is by careful and accurate calculations placed at over double this amount. In these two items the North has hitherto admitted no European competition. Were a list made out of the values of the chief articles of foreign production which the South in a state of peace is able annually to consume and to pay for, and which it either cannot itself produce or finds it cheaper to buy, it would astonish even those who believe themselves best acquainted with the statistics of the Southern trade. It would leave no doubt on the minds of practical business men what it is that the North is fighting for, and why Europe, in her own interest, as in that of common humanity, should exert its moral authority to make peace.

Jack in Office.

If we could imagine that a shadow of self-distrust, a twinge of shame and remorse could cross the mind of our confident and complacent Secretary for Foreign Affairs, we should conceive that Lord Russell's reflections, in the leisure allowed to him by the dignified quiet of that happier place to which he has been translated from the din and bustle of the Commons, must sometimes be of a painful and humiliating nature. He has tried every kind of political functions in turn, and he has failed in everything. He has had the charge of Reform, and he has made Reform the abomination of one half of the people, and the laughing-stock of the other half. He undertook to lead and to profit by the Anti-Catholic excitement, called forth by the so-styled Papal Aggression; and he contrived to reduce that excitement to so utter an absurdity, that if the Pope were to send over to-morrow a Legate latere with the fullest powers and in the utmost pomp of ecclesiastical dignity, it would scarcely be possible in any sane assembly to talk of "aggression" without provoking an outburst of laughter. In due course, we may hope he will take up the ballot, abolition of Church-rates, peace-at-any-price, and other public nuisances of the same sort, and extinguish them and himself in a general storm of ridicule; for it needs only that he should handle a question to make it obviously and irresistibly ludicrous. He has been Prime Minister, and in that capacity he succeeded in reducing Her Majesty's Government almost beneath contempt, and in making the highest office in the Sovereign's gift seem scarcely respectable. He has been a self-important Paymaster of the Forces, an insignificant Secretary for the Colonies, a leader of the House of Commons sheltered from open ridicule, though not from visible contempt, by the presence of such colleagues as Lord Palmerston, Mr. Gladstone, and Sidney Herbert. He has been Ambassador to Vienna on a great occasion; and there he was, in the first place, thoroughly outwitted by the Russian negotiators, and led to pledge himself to inadmissible terms of peace; and in the second place irritated by his defeat to a degree which seems to have deprived him for a time both of the sense of truth and of the sense of political discretion. He came home, and in his place in Parliament told something so like a falsehood, that when his diplomatic rivals, indignant at the slur cast upon them, proclaimed the real facts which he had suppressed or perverted, the country was utterly disgusted; and the wrathful protest of influential members of his own party, jealous of the honour which he had compromised, compelled his resignation. In no capacity has he ever conducted himself as a loyal and honourable gentleman; never has he taught his colleagues to feel that they could depend on his good faith; never has he been able to inspire even that degree of confidence which is essential to all harmonious relations between gentlemen. No one ever felt sure, while acting with "Lord John," that he might not be at any moment tripped up by his insidious friend, and discover that while they had been concerting measures together for a common and creditable purpose, the Whig leader had been devising underhand an intrigue, by which to raise his own popularity or secure his own escape from danger at the expense of his colleagues. By one such disreputable trick—by pledging himself to strong measures of Reform without a word of consultation with his Cabinet—he forfeited the friendship and support of the most high-minded member of the old Whig party—the present Lord Grey—who has never again been reunited with his old allies. An intrigue still more cowardly, because more deliberately planned, and carried out with more wanton and wilful treachery, resulted in his evasion from the Aberdeen Ministry on the eve of its overthrow—an overthrow which was currently believed to have been planned with his foreknowledge and connivance, and which was certainly due in no small degree to his sudden but not unpremeditated defection. He is a traitor by taste and temper; and if they could only rely on his fidelity to his employers, the Federal Government could hardly choose a more efficient man to conduct their system of espionage in England. Unfortunately for himself, his treachery is so completely a matter of natural disposition, that he could not possibly be true to any party for twelve months together; he would always be considering some means of making a profit out of a new treason. We do not mean to say—despite his Vienna escapade—that he would tell a lie; first, because lies are terribly apt to be found out, and secondly because we are not quite sure whether his theory of constitutional law embraces the doctrine that mendacity is one of the privileges of a Minister of the Crown. He would look for a precedent in the history of Lord Somers, Marlborough, Charles James Fox, and other eminent Whigs, and failing to find one, he would probably shrink from incurring so serious a risk on his own responsibility. We might, therefore, in most cases depend upon his word, if it were so explicit and distinct, that no double interpretation or secret reserve were possible, and if the circumstances were such that an untruth would be immediately exposed and held up to public odium. But beyond this no man can trust him; for he loves always the shady and the tortuous path, and can no more deal frankly with friend or foe than a reptile can walk erect.

There could hardly be a greater contrast than between Lord Russell and his former subordinate and present chief. Lord Palmerston is able, as an experienced diplomatist should be, to mislead and bewilder impertinent questioners. But he is frank wherever frankness is possible; and if he has on grave occasions stooped to tamper with official documents and suppress inconvenient evidence, yet when charged with the act he attempted neither shuffling nor concealment, and defended what few believe him to have done rather than try to shift the blame on deceased colleagues. He has made most unpopular appointments to gratify the memory of old political friendship; he has stood manfully by the unreasonable and unpopular measures of his colleagues; he risked his tenure of office on the Chinese war rather than abandon a subordinate whom he did not choose, and who was no particular friend of his; and he sacrificed power somewhat later rather than refuse to the Emperor of the French a satisfaction which he thought due to an alarmed and perhaps an injured ally. Lord Palmerston never betrayed a colleague, never abandoned a subordinate, never forgot a friend; in a word, he is, with somewhat too much of the tactician and diplomatist, a loyal English gentleman at heart; and this is just what Lord Russell is not. And, therefore, though Lord Russell is a Liberal, and Lord Palmerston is more than half a Tory, the Liberal party trusts Lord Palmerston and distrusts Lord Russell; while the Tories despise Lord Russell almost too much to hate him, and admire Lord Palmerston so heartily that they almost forget to oppose him.

As a Foreign Minister, Lord Russell's genius for intrigue, and his still more remarkable genius for being found out and exposed in every intrigue he undertakes, are almost eclipsed by a quality more extraordinary and un-English still—a restless love of meddling, lecturing, and bullying, which was never equalled, unless in the composition of some strong-minded lady of the Bloomer persuasion from the New England States. But both peculiarities have been constantly apparent, with results varying in kind, but always disastrous to the honour and dignity of England. In Denmark the lecturing propensity was most perceptible; and by advising the King practically to dismember his kingdom, and hand over one half of it to Prussian domination, Lord Russell contrived to create so much mischief and arouse so much displeasure, that little notice was taken of the proceedings of a certain consular spy of the Schleswig-Holstein faction, despatched by the Foreign Minister of England on a journey of observation through Southern Denmark, to report on the condition of that country under the rule of our ally, its present Sovereign. But if the utterly unintelligible character of the German claims upon Schleswig, and even upon Holstein, had not deterred Parliament from a searching inquiry into a question from which the guilty Minister was certain to escape in a bewildering fog of myths and forgotten technicalities of mediæval law, we might have had an edifying history of this very curious transaction. The intrigues which have been going on in Italy for some years past are not yet unravelled; but we know enough of Lord Russell's proceedings to understand why France grows more angry and impatient at every reference to the Roman question, and why England has no influence whatever over the destinies of that unfortunate country. The little plot laid to inveigle the Pope from Rome to Malta was so sure to be found out, and so certain to put the French Government into a state of great and just irritation without achieving any practical result, that it could only have been devised by a brain to which intrigue for intrigue's sake is a positive enjoyment. Intrigue has cost us still more dearly in Greece. First Greece was held in suspense, and even England was allowed to doubt whether Prince Alfred would accept the Hellenic crown of thorns, until Lord Russell had enjoyed the pleasure of a diplomatic victory over Russia, who seems to have affected resistance for no other purpose than to afford him the delight of such a grateful triumph. Then she was told that Prince Alfred could not be her king; and to bribe her to forgive the treacherous unkindness with which she had been treated, and still to lean on the protecting arm of the English Foreign Office, the bait of the Seven Islands was held out. The well-being of the miserable Ionians and the power of England in the Eastern Mediterranean are sacrificed that Lord Russell may enjoy the sport of king-hunting. He has a crown to give away; and he has three times offered it, and induced the Greeks to endorse the offer, to no purpose. Meantime, anarchy reigns in Athens—Δίνος βασιλεύει, τον Δ' εξεληράκως—and the prospects of the future king grow darker and darker with every week's delay. Heaven only knows how much of English treasure, and perhaps of English blood, may be spent hereafter in undoing the mischievous work of John Earl Russell in this quarter alone.

What he is doing in Poland and in Russia, we do not know. Rumour affirms many things which seem far too bad to be true. It is even said that Lord Russell proposed to France and Austria an intervention with a view to an armistice between the Czar and the insurgents; that, being refused by France and Russia, he made the proposal to the Czar; that, meeting there with an indignant negative, he has addressed himself to the so-called "National Government of Poland,"—a secret committee, of whose members not one is known even by name. If but one of these statements be true, or approach the truth, Lord Russell ought to be shut up for the rest of his life, in safe keeping, as a desperate and dangerous lunatic. No one in this country, except a few maniacs, a few hundred ignorant politicians of the pothouse (who don't pay income-tax), and a certain number of gentlemen who see in war with Russia the best security for peace with America, is ready to go to war for the restoration of the kingdom of Poland; and this being the case, it is either utterly mad or desperately wicked to offer any deceptive encouragement to the resistance of the Poles. They have been cruelly, horribly wronged; they may be quite right in fighting, quite right in deeming it better to die fighting to the last than to submit;—we should so choose to die, if we were Poles; but there is no hope for them, and no stranger has a right to encourage a nation in a war of sheer despair.

In regard to Brazil, Lord Russell's conduct has been of a kind which cannot be described in Parliamentary language. From first to last, Brazil has been wronged; and has been treated, with right on her side, as France or Russia would not have been treated, however thoroughly they might have been in the wrong. Lord Russell sent there a minister, whose own despatches prove him unable to control his passion so far as to write the language of a diplomatist, and whose temper constantly involves him in personal altercations disgraceful to him as a minister and as a gentleman. No one would have dreamed of sending Mr. Christie to the court of a great Power. A shipwreck occurs; a Consul, troubled with mental hallucinations, insists that there has been a general massacre of the crew and plunder of the vessel; the Government acts at once; it is decided by its tribunals on sufficient evidence that there has been no murder; that there has been pilfering; that some of the persons accused by the Consul are quite innocent, and that others have fled the empire. Those who are caught and convicted are punished. England demands satisfaction. Brazil denies her liability, but does all in her power to settle the affair peaceably. Lord Russell refuses arbitration on the merits, and refuses to have the case referred to London. Meantime three British officers go ashore in mufti, quarrel with the police, and are locked up for being drunk and disorderly, but released on proving their character and nationality. Mr. Christie demands an apology, and the punishment of the police. Brazil refuses, as of course. Whereupon Admiral Warren is ordered to seize Brazilian vessels in Brazilian waters; and Brazil yields to force. The end of the matter is that diplomatic relations are interrupted between ourselves and Brazil; a Power eminently friendly, respectable, and well-conducted. This is Lord Russell's policy towards the weak, who cannot resent his insults.

An officer in the Federal service seizes four gentlemen on board a British mail-packet bound from one neutral port to another, kidnaps them, and carries them into port, where they are kept in close confinement. Lord Russell is satisfied with their surrender, in the least formal manner possible; he neither asks an apology, nor the punishment of the guilty officer. That officer is appointed to the command of a squadron in West Indian waters—Lord Russell takes no notice of this act of flagrant discourtesy. He seizes British ships on their way to British ports; the owners remonstrate; Lord Russell bids them give up a trade which, however legitimate, is offensive to American feelings. He blockades British ports; he intercepts British trade by a regular system of illegal captures; Lord Russell apologises for him, and bids the victims rely on American Prize Courts for redress. British subjects are arrested and imprisoned for months in the United States, without charge and without trial;

British officers are imprisoned at Washington, and threatened with death without trial; and Lord Russell is silent; for silence and endurance are his policy towards a Power ready to maintain her own quarrel.

In private life, a man who maltreats the weak without provocation, and submits without resistance to affronts from the strong, is called a bully and a coward. We leave it for Lord Russell's friends to select the terms which most fitly describe the character of his conduct as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, towards Brazil and towards the United States. For our own part, we would only say that, since his accession to office, the influence and the prestige of England have constantly and rapidly waned; that she has been alienated from all her allies, and placed on the verge of war with several of her old rivals; that she has gained a character for brutal injustice to the weak and timid servility to the strong, which she never had before; that she has lowered her high repute by a series of mean, petty, underhand intrigues of a peculiarly unworthy and un-English character; and that this is not the result of any change of temper or disposition on the part of the nation, but is due simply to the individual bent and temperament of the present Foreign Secretary. We think it highly probable that he is fully satisfied with what he has achieved; but we conceive that the country desires to be somewhat differently served, and that she would do well, therefore, to select a statesman of a somewhat different character.

Vicksburg.

ALTHOUGH there is nothing in the latest official accounts received at Washington to warrant the report that Vicksburg had fallen, it would be useless to deny that the position of the Confederates in the State of Mississippi is a very critical one. We should feel much more assured of the safety of the army holding the key of the defences of the South-west if we knew anything of its numbers; but the inviolate secrecy, which has everywhere surrounded the movements of the Confederates, has completely left us in the dark as to the strength of the forces they can bring into line against the invaders, and we can only speculate upon the amount of resistance they can offer. It is inconceivable that a post whose retention President Davis long ago pointed out as of vital importance to the Southern cause should have been left weakly garrisoned, or unsupported by an available army in the field, when it was known that the Federals were directing the whole resources of the West to its capture. Nor is it likely that General Johnstone, whose ability and daring marked him out as one of the ablest generals of the Confederacy, would be sent into Mississippi rather as the leader of a forlorn hope, than the conductor of a great and probably successful campaign. We are justified, therefore, on these grounds, in assuming that the defences of Vicksburg have been intrusted to an efficient and powerful army. On the other hand, General Grant's forces, cavalry, artillery, and infantry, do not fall far short of 50,000. They are assisted by a very formidable flotilla of gunboats and transports, and they have cut the railroads by which Confederate reinforcements from the East could reach Vicksburg. It is possible that the call for troops in Tennessee, and North and South Carolina may have deprived General Johnstone of an adequate force; it is possible, too, that the restriction of the area from which supplies could be drawn, by the closing in of the Federal armies and flotillas, may have compelled the advance of that portion of the army which was not absolutely necessary to hold the river defences at Port Hudson, at Grand Gulf, at Warrenton, at Vicksburg, Haines' Bluff, and Fort Pemberton. However this may be, it is perfectly certain that the Confederates have not a soldier too many in Mississippi, and that unless reinforcements are forthcoming they will have hard work to hold their own against the invader.

General Grant, after having shattered army after army against the strongest portion of the Vicksburg lines, has now struck at the weakest. We have repeatedly pointed out that the only assailable point of the defences was the rear of the city, and that the march for a successful attack should be from Jackson. How to get at the rear of Vicksburg was the problem. The river batteries, on the Mississippi banks, were not to be passed. The Yazoo River was barred by the guns of Haines' Bluff and Fort Pemberton. At last, some half-dozen gunboats ran the Vicksburg batteries, and, with Farragut's flag-ship, destroyed the forts of Grand Gulf, some seventeen miles below Vicksburg. Once in possession of a secure footing, the landing of the Federal army was an easy matter. They crossed in overwhelming numbers from the Louisiana banks, and the inland march commenced at Boulingsburg, a mile or two below Grand Gulf. Moving in a North-west direction, the Federal advance under McClernand came upon a Confederate force at Thompson's Hills, the defences of Port Gibson. According to the Federal accounts, an action took place here, lasting a whole day, and resulting in the retreat of the Confederates, at sunset, into Port Gibson. The ground was well contested, the Federals meeting with severe losses. Not less than 20,000 men were engaged on their side, whilst General Bowen had only two brigades to oppose to them. Nevertheless, he retreated in good order upon Port Gibson, which he reached unmolested. Threatened by the continued advance of the enemy, the Confederate general retreated across the Big Black River; from that point the reports of the movements of the two armies are so confused, that it is almost impossible to credit them. General Bowen's army, if it crossed Big Black River, must have fallen back upon Vicksburg, but Grant's army appears to have continued its march upon Jackson. It is next heard of at Raymond, a few miles south of Jackson, where another battle is fought, in which General Greg, with 5,000 men, after fighting for two hours is compelled to retire. Two days afterwards, Jackson is reported in the hands of the Federals, after a whole day's engagement, the capitol and half the city in flames. Grant's forces seem to have marched forward in two columns, one striking at the Vicksburg and Jackson railroad a few miles above Black River Bridge, the other moving on Jackson. In this case the Confederate army must also have been divided, the force which defended Jackson retreating northward, the force detailed for the defence of Vicksburg holding the approaches along the Vicksburg and Jackson railroad. On the 14th, General Johnstone is reported to have marched northward towards Livingston. On the 16th, he telegraphs that the column under General Pemberton has been attacked by General Grant, and driven back across the Big Black River. The loss of Pemberton's army is estimated at 3,000, and that of the Federals at three times this number. Thenceforth, the accounts become more perplexing than ever. From Murfreesboro' it is reported in twenty-four hours, that Grant has been beaten and driven out of Jackson, and that he has crossed the Black River bridge and attacked Vicksburg. Of General Johnstone's movements there is not a word. But on the 20th official despatches at Washington clear up all doubt. It is officially stated that Haines' Bluff and the entire works of Vicksburg have been captured, with a large number of prisoners, and fifty-seven guns. Now it is quite possible that General Grant has captured Haines' Bluff and fifty-seven guns. The works there were for the defence of the Yazoo River. It is possible that General Grant had turned them. They were then no longer defensible, and were probably abandoned. But the capture of Haines' Bluff is one thing, and the capture of the entire works of Vicksburg is another, and the account that the entire works of Vicksburg had been captured whilst "a great battle was raging" for its defence, casts an air of doubt on the whole statement, which dispels much of our anxiety. No doubt the Confederates are "cornered." The Federals are in their rear and on both flanks, and their only hope of safety lies in the defeat of the enemy in the field; but they have a great advantage in their leader, who is reputedly a very able officer, and in their superior knowledge of the country; and we shall not be surprised to learn that the statements of the Washington press are not only premature, but unfounded. The report that "a great battle is raging" can hardly be quite satisfactory to the North. Whenever that report has reached Washington, it has invariably been ominous of disaster and defeat. Its very incompleteness is suggestive of doubt. It has nothing of the confidence of assured success; we may reasonably, therefore, suspend our judgment, and refuse to believe that a brave and numerous army, under one of the most skilful Confederate commanders, has been either annihilated or captured, on the faith of what may be a manufactured bulletin, from General Halleck's bureau. The Federal authorities want a victory badly enough. They may be pardoned in their present straits if they have invented one. At the same time, we do not disguise from our readers our conviction that Vicksburg and its defenders are in serious danger, and that the rapid movements and continued successes of General Grant's army have somewhat dispelled our estimate as to the strength of the forces the Confederates would bring into the field in Mississippi. But the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. We have faith in the gallantry of the Confederate troops, in the skill of their leaders, and in the justness of their cause. We still hope that Vicksburg will remain a Confederate stronghold. But if the worst is to be feared, if Vicksburg is to fall, not the less will its desperate defence have been an honour to the Confederate arms. For two years it will have resisted successfully the land and river forces of the Federals; attack after attack it has beaten off, army after army has been dashed to pieces against its entrenchments, or wasted away in sight of its batteries. If it falls now, the work of its brave defenders will not have been in vain. The North will find itself, after its two years' struggle, in possession of a barren conquest. There will be new Vicksburgs where the fight will have to be fought again. Not a jot nearer will its capture bring the Federals to the subjugation of the Confederates. Only deeper and wider and more impassable will flow the river of blood which for ever separates the people of North and South.

Our Southern Exchanges.

THANKS to the vigilance of our friends, we are in receipt of Southern newspapers to the 11th of May, from which copious extracts will be found in another part of our impression. Some of our quotations are unusually interesting. It will be gratifying to those who sympathize with the South in her gallant efforts to defend that independence which has been her immemorial possession, and which was solemnly recognised by Europe in the last century, to observe that in the midst of the trying contest the important subject of the education of the young is not neglected. The letter which we publish, addressed by President Davis to the Teachers' Convention lately held at Columbia, South Carolina, adequately represents the national anxiety to provide sound text books, as being essential to a sound intellectual development. Then, again, the care manifested in reference to the adoption of a Confederate flag and a Confederate motto is significant. The Confederates naturally desire that the symbols of that independent Government, for the maintenance of which they are pouring out their best blood as though it were water, and expending their treasure as though it were dross, should be expressive of the character and greatness of the people. The speech of Mr. Semmes, of Louisiana, in which he discusses the propriety of the proposed motto, must commend itself warmly to those who believe that it is good for a nation at all seasons and at every opportunity to pay reverent homage to the Almighty.

We have also reprinted a number of the Southern war telegrams, particularly those which relate to the movements on the Mississippi. Although they do not give us the latest war news they will be found useful in explaining and correcting the reports of the Northern newspapers.

When we last glanced at our Southern files, which came down to April 14, we remarked that the clamour about raising an abundant supply of food had nearly subsided, because the patriotic entreaties had not been in vain, and in every State and in every county the land had been sown with those things necessary for the sustenance of man and beast. The hopes then expressed, that the coming harvest would be plentiful, have been wonderfully strengthened; and at the beginning of May the Confederate newspapers were teeming with accounts which not only warrant the expectation that the fertile South will yield enough to feed all her inhabitants—for that was never doubted, except by the Federal partisans—but that there will everywhere be a surplus of necessary provisions, and that wherever the armies are moved they can be kept without any extraordinary exertions, and without any considerable aid from railroad transport. Nor is this all. There is a promise of a superabundant supply of meat as well as of bread, for there is now little fear that there will be any lack of food for raising and rearing cattle. The Charleston Courier presents some valuable reports upon the crops. A correspondent, who had been travelling through Georgia, writing from Macon, says:—"From personal knowledge and information from others, I know that the coming wheat harvest, should no accident befall it, will be such an one as the oldest inhabitant has never seen. The whole State is literally one great wheat-field. The severe cold of last winter has destroyed the 'fly' and all other insects. Nothing can now damage it except 'rust,' but as we have had a dry spring no danger from that is apprehended. Unless there is an entire failure in all the other States, wheat will sell here before the first day of July for less than one dollar per bushel. Georgia alone will be able to furnish the whole Confederacy in wheat bread for twelve months. After harvesting the wheat farmers intend to plant the fields in corn, making two crops in one year. This can be easily done in our Southern climate." Another correspondent in Noxubee County, Mississippi, writes:—"Notwithstanding the season here has been rather unpropitious, we have fine stands of corn, which we are now working. The wheat crop is exceedingly fine, and promises an abundant and overflowing yield. It is now heading out, and it is altogether too late for rust. The oat and rye crops are also remarkably good. Little or no attention has been paid to King Cotton in this section." A correspondent writes from Abbeville District, under date April 21,—"Our wheat crop is fair, and the corn a good stand for the season. The wheat crop in the district is very encouraging, more so than it has been for some time. I trust there will be from 75,000 to 100,000 bushels for sale in this district. In Edgefield it is generally promising." A correspondent from Selma, Alabama, under date May 4, says,—"The crops in this section will be immense. Harvesting will commence in our lower counties next week." The Yorkville Enquirer of April 25, says,—"The weather has set in most beautifully, and our farmers are busily engaged in planting their crops, which promise to be the largest grain crop ever before known in these quarters. 'Speed the plough,' gentlemen, and God will speed you and our gallant soldiers. Large quantities of the Chinese sugar cane will be planted this summer." But the anticipation of a bountiful harvest does not make the Confederates less indefatigable. The rigid laws against the distillation of whisky are not relaxed. We have already recorded the conduct of the patriot soldiers, who are saving what they can to buy Confederate Bonds in order to relieve the pressure on the currency, and employing their leisure at stationary camps in cultivating vegetables for their own consumption, and now we learn from the Charleston papers that the soldiers on the coast have set to work to make salt, and that the produce of their labour is now being sold in Charleston. The waters also are yielding their increase. At suitable localities—and they are very numerous in the Confederacy—the troops are being supplied with fish. The Richmond Examiner reports that "The fisheries on the Rappahannock are being worked for the benefit of the soldiers in that section, and that daily rations of fish are being issued to the soldiers. This supply from Neptune's repository comes very opportune at this season, when fresh beef is scarce, and transportation difficult."

The benevolent attempts to prevent suffering from the high prices have, in some instances, been crowned with an unlooked-for success, for they have reduced the market prices of food. We are told by the Savannah papers, that "The proceeding of Mr. G. B. Lamar has settled the question that, so far, at least, as one article of food is concerned, there is not such a scarcity as to warrant the high price previously asked for it. This gentleman gave notice that he would sell 300 tierces of rice to soldiers' families at ten cents a pound. At the time the offer was made rice was held at twenty-two cents, but in one week thereafter it went down to thirteen cents. Rice would doubtless have been thirty cents in Savannah but for the course of Mr. Lamar." The Planters' Committee of Sumter, as we learn from the Watchman, fixed the following prices for May:—Bacon and lard, $1 per pound; corn, $3 per bushel, delivered at the nearest railroad depot; peas, $3; fodder, $3 per hundred, delivered; and the Committee will allow two cents per mile for every 100 pounds transportation for meat and lard. No sooner were these prices announced, than "Captain F. H. Kennedy agreed to furnish the Committee with 500 bushels of corn at $2.50 per bushel less than the price fixed." Another effort to aid the poor deserves mention. We are informed by the Mobile Register that "Major Samuel B. Marks, of Montgomery, Alabama, has sold 10,000 lbs. of bacon to the poor at twenty-five cents per pound. He has also brought 7,000 pounds of bacon to the Commissary Department to be exchanged for sugar." There will probably be little further need of this kind of benevolence. Prices are already coming down, and we may now understand that if the planters had the most distant prospect of selling cotton, they have had to make a heavy sacrifice in cultivating cereal crops. The Columbia South Carolinian, of the 2nd May, states that a heavy fall in flour had taken place.

The same ceaseless activity is exhibited in all departments. It is stated that Messrs. Haiman, Brother, and Co., of the Firearm Company of Columbus, Georgia, have their machinery nearly ready, and will then be able to turn out twenty-five pieces of arms daily for Government. We also learn that a company is being formed under the auspices of Mr. T. E. McNeill, of Macon, Georgia, who is represented as "an accomplished machinist and mechanical engineer," for the manufacture of locomotives, cars, axles, wheels, and railroad findings generally. Then, to come to matters of less moment, we find from the Charleston Courier that vinegar is being made from sorgho syrup when molasses cannot be procured, and also from persimmons. Ladies have been plaiting straw hats, and are now trying what kind of hats can be made from the pine leaf. If any stimulus were needed to induce the Confederates to render themselves independent of foreign aid, it is supplied by a statement of the Richmond correspondent of the Knoxville Register, to the effect that the Yankees, not satisfied with the fat war contracts they get from the Federal Government, are so jealous of the trade done with the South by Europe, that they manage to smuggle in some cargoes through the blockade under false pretences, and that the Federal Government furnishes private signals to protect their vessels, so that they can afford to laugh at their European competitors, because they run no risk of capture. Even Lord Russell must admit that this is rather an ultra-liberal construction of the law of blockade, though, in his opinion, it may be a proper punishment for English merchants who dare to infringe upon what the Yankees consider their particular monopoly—trade with the South. One article, however, the Yankees do not smuggle in, for it is unsaleable. No one in the South will buy a Yankee book, or even a Yankee reprint of an English book. The Confederates who have, as our readers are aware, passed a law of international copyright, would be glad to get English editions, whilst paper and printing materials are so scarce, but as they cannot do so Messrs. S. H. Goetzel and Co., of Mobile, are reprinting foreign books. This is the firm which voluntarily remitted to an English author a sum of money as compensation for the re-issue of his works.

The supply of native medicine continues to enlist attention. We learn from the Georgian papers that "At the Druggists' Convention, in Augusta, an interesting statement from Dr. J. B. Walker, of Virginia, was made in regard to ipecacuanha found in our country, equal in efficacy to the imported article. He also dwelt on the manufacture of sulphuric acid from iron pyrites. Dr. J. L. Large presented some facts connected with the manufacture of chemicals at the Chemical Works, at Hamburg, South Carolina. Dr. Large is making sulphuric ether, spirits nitrous ether, chloroform, chlorate potass, sulphate potass, nitrate silver, and other articles." The Charleston Courier has an article on "Our Botanical Resources," in which it notices a book entitled, "Resources of the Southern Fields and Forests, Medical, Economical, and Agricultural; being also a Botany of the Confederate States, with practical information on the useful properties of Trees, Plants, and Shrubs. By Francis Peyre Porcher, Surgeon, P.A.C.S. Prepared and published by order of the Surgeon-General, Richmond, Virginia." Dr. F. P. Porcher gives an account of 400 substances possessing every variety of useful quality. The list includes textile fibres, grains, silks, seeds, oils, gums, resins, dyes, starch, acids, liquors, materials for paper and cordage, medicines of all qualities, wood for all uses, &c., all of which abound in the greatest munificence, and need but the arm of the authorities, and the enterprise and energy of private citizens, to be made sources of utility and profit. We may also notice that the poppy, which is found to yield salad oil as well as opium; the castor oil bean, which is so necessary for the health of the army; and the potato fly, a capital substitute for the Spanish blistering fly, are being produced in large quantities.

Truly the resources of such a country, in the hands of such a people, are wonderful, and its natural riches inexhaustible. Thrown open to the commerce of all the world, it will again be an overflowing source of wealth. No wonder the North is maddened at the prospect of Europe sharing in what they have hitherto considered their own to use and abuse.

GENERAL T. J. JACKSON.

At this time everything relating to the life and character of the lamented Patriot Soldier, General T. J. Jackson, is interesting to the British public; and we take pleasure in laying before our readers the following communication from the Rev. M. D. Hoge, D.D., one of the pastors of Richmond, Virginia, and chaplain in one of the camps in the vicinity of that city.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—During my temporary absence from my native land, and engaged, as I am, in a mission which has for its object the supply of our army with Bibles and religious books, like others of my countrymen here, I have been filled with grief at the death of one who, as I have reason to know, regarded my errand to England with deep and abiding interest, and for whom I cherished the profoundest respect and affection.

I readily comply with your request to give you some impressions of his character and worth, derived, in part, from personal acquaintance with him. I feel it to be a privilege to add, if possible, a single leaf to the wreath which so many grateful hands are now weaving for the urn, beside which a nation weeps.

Since the commencement of this cruel war, Virginia, in common with her sister States of the Confederacy, has often had occasion to lament the fall of the noble and the good; but in no former instance has she sustained a loss which so many mourn as if it were a personal bereavement, as well as a public calamity. While General Jackson commanded the highest respect by those qualities which ennobled him as a man, and excited an admiration which readily kindled into enthusiasm by his successful heroism as a soldier, he had also the happy faculty of attracting the kinder regards of those who knew him, and of exciting in the popular mind and heart emotions of commingled reverence and love.

There was something in the brilliancy of his exploits which dazzled the imagination, in the suddenness and unexpectedness of his military movements which kept alive the public curiosity, so that it happened that he was, more frequently than any other officer in the service, the subject of conversation among the soldiers, and among the people at large. On the march, in the bivouac, around camp fires, in family circles, in all places of popular resort, he was the favourite theme of discourse. The people were ever eager to know where he was, what he was doing, what he intended to do; and all information respecting his acts, his plans and probable purposes, was received with an avidity which showed how deep was the interest felt in everything with which he had any connexion. Nor was his name a household word in Virginia, and in the Confederacy alone. No name has been more widely honoured abroad; and the spontaneous and touching tributes to his memory now daily appearing in British and continental journals, give expressive testimony to the estimate in which he was held wherever courage, and patriotism, and piety, are revered throughout the world.

It may be interesting to dwell for a moment on the characteristic qualities which secured to General Jackson this universal homage.

As before the war he was comparatively little known, it was his military reputation, of course, which at first arrested the attention of the country. But this does not account for the peculiar estimation in which he was held. Other commanders have been as skilful and as fortunate, who have failed to elicit the kind of admiration he excited. It was not to his achievements in the field alone that we must ascribe the peculiar reputation he obtained, but to certain moral excellences, most happily blended, which gave to his character that symmetrical development which has so rarely been exhibited by men of his profession. And first among these I would specify his single-eyed devotion to duty, unaccompanied by any selfish aims. No man was ever more devoid of personal ambition. The question with him was not what will men think or say, but what is right. He cared nothing for criticism, nothing for the misrepresentation that might temporarily result from measures which others did not comprehend, because the time had not come for making known the reasons that led to their adoption. He was willing to wait for the verdict of time—the great vindicator, or if the verdict did not come, was willing to do without it if he but had the approval of his own conscience. He was singularly reticent with regard to his own purposes. His own officers were not always advised of his plans, and they were sometimes restive under the seeming want of confidence which such silence appeared to imply. He kept his own counsel, and when he had decided upon what he thought to be best, he went forward to its execution with a directness which nothing could deflect. He shrunk from no responsibility where he believed himself to be right. And regardless of his own fame, absorbed as he was in his intense devotion to duty, he obtained what he never sought, and though he cared little for the discovery—in only aiming to do right, he was rewarded in finding that the world gave him renown.

It need not be added that no such mean emotion as that of envy or jealousy could find a place in such a bosom.

While detraction and slander have been rife in the camp of the enemy, and one general after another with basest arts has striven to supplant his superior, it is refreshing to note how those highest in command in our army have only vied in laying laurels at each other's feet. The admiration and love of Jackson for Lee was unfeigned and intense—and it was all returned. On hearing of Jackson's wound, Lee wrote:—

I cannot express my regret at the occurrence. If I could have directed events I should have chosen, for the good of the country, to have been disabled in your stead. I congratulate you upon the victory, which is due to your skill and energy.

Another characteristic trait was his rare modesty of demeanour, and freedom from everything like pretension in his intercourse with others. In private circles he preferred to let others lead in the conversation. When with a congenial friend, he talked with animation, if the topic were one in which he was interested; but in mixed companies he was more inclined to listen than to speak. I never knew a man, in any position in life, more free from stilted, artificial dignity. Nothing could be more simple and unpretending than his manner. Unlike some military men, who seem to delight in making subordinate officers feel their disparity of rank, he never seemed to think of rank at all, and was as polite to a private as to the President. In riding through his camp, when the men saluted him as he passed, he invariably raised his cap from his head, instead of returning the abrupt recognition of their courtesy with which some officers content themselves. He never courted, but rather shunned observation and marked attention. Sometimes in going to the camp of another officer, when he suddenly came in view of a body of troops and the men began to cheer, as they always did when they caught sight of him, he would spur his horse into a rapid gallop, as if anxious to escape the clamorous homage so joyously accorded to him. One Sunday morning, when our army was encamped near Richmond, he rode to town, unattended, dressed in a well-worn and faded suit of Confederate grey, and coming into my church very quietly, took a seat near the door without being recognised except by those who sat nearest him; but when the congregation was dismissed, finding himself the object of general observation, he was evidently disturbed by the attention he attracted, and hastily withdrew, to pay a visit of sympathy to an afflicted mother, who had recently sustained a sore bereavement, and then rode back to his camp. That afternoon there was Divine service in his camp, at which he was present, of course. When the service ended, he invited the minister who had officiated to go with him to his quarters, and giving his own horse to an orderly to lead, he got into the buggy of the clergyman that they might converse more conveniently on their way to his tent. At the foot of a very long hill the horse refused to pull, when the general immediately got out, and taking the refractory animal by the bridle, insisted on leading him, in view of hundreds of his men, to the very top of the hill, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the minister, who was not willing to ride while the General walked, and who greatly preferred to change places with him. But such was his simple, unaffected courtesy and respect for the office of the man about to be his guest, that all remonstrance was unavailing. In riding through the woods where his division was encamped, if he saw two or three of his soldiers cooking their plain rations, if he chanced to be hungry or fatigued, he would stop and ask permission to share in their homely meal, or he would lie down on the leaves, and catch a few minutes' sleep, watched by the men who felt honoured by his presence.

If such incidents seem too trivial for a place in the portraiture of such a man, you will suppress them. They are mentioned only because such incidents often give to others a more distinct impression of character than any didactic reflections; and it may be that you will regard them as illustrative of that sweet simplicity of spirit, that freedom from ostentation, and condescension to men of low estate, which formed one of the most winning characteristics of the lamented Chief.

Though a strict and rigid disciplinarian, he never exacted of those under his authority more than he was ready to yield to his superiors in command. If he required implicit obedience to his orders, he set the example of prompt and unhesitating compliance with those he received himself. The length and rapidity of his marches were unsurpassed in military annals, but whatever were the fatigues, the privations or the dangers to which his men were exposed, he shared equally with them, in all. When exposed, as he often was, to the most terrible fire of the enemy, his calm and imperturbable demeanour awoke the admiration, while it excited the apprehension of those who were more solicitous than himself for his personal safety. On one occasion, in the midst of an engagement, while writing an order, a shell struck and shattered the tree beneath which he sat, without arresting the movement of his pencil, or seeming to attract his attention. Yet no man was ever more free from that rashness that recklessly encounters peril. His was the lofty and serene courage, which, while it appreciates danger, meets it fearlessly, because personal considerations are not to be weighed when the path of danger is the path of duty.

The possession of qualities like these would have made General Jackson deservedly dear to his army, and secured for him the admiration of his countrymen, even could nothing more be added to the enumeration. But these traits, so admirable in themselves, were all heightened and hallowed by the pure and elevated piety which pervaded every utterance and act. "A Christian is the highest style of man." Piety towards God is the surest incentive to the full discharge of all duties toward man—the most unfailing inspiration of honour,—the strongest safeguard of personal integrity,—the truest source of the sublimest courage. For many years General Jackson had been an active and efficient member of the Presbyterian church under the pastoral care of that beloved and honoured minister, the Rev. Dr. White, of Lexington, Virginia. As an office-bearer in that church, as a teacher in the Sabbath school, and in every department of Christian labour, he sought to make himself useful to the community in which he lived. He was especially interested in the religious instruction of the negroes, and when at home, spent a portion of every Sabbath in teaching a class of coloured children. His solicitude for the spiritual welfare of this portion of our population was intense, as it was a frequent subject of conversation with him after he joined the army. All his great cares and responsibilities as commander did not divert his attention from this interesting field of Christian philanthropy.

But in the army he had another field of Christian activity. In every possible way he laboured to elevate the moral and spiritual character of the soldiers. He gave to chaplains, to colporteurs, and to the clergymen who occasionally visited his camp, all the encouragement and co-operation in his power. When the Holy Sacrament was administered, he assisted in the distribution of the elements. And when revivals of religion occurred among the troops under his command, he rejoiced with a joy which even victory did not inspire.

In the last conversation I ever had with him he said he intended to make every effort to increase the number and the efficiency of chaplains in the army.

None, save those who are familiar with camp life, and who know how much soldiers are affected by the example of their officers, can estimate the influence for good exerted by a general whose piety was as conspicuous as his patriotism, and who was as well known in the army in his character of a Christian as in that of a commander.

There was nothing morose or ascetic in his piety. He was a genial, warm-hearted, cheerful Christian. He told a minister who occasionally visited his camp, that he had never enjoyed the hopes and comforts of the gospel so much as he had done during the war. The secret of his happiness is easily explained. He lived in close communion with God, by prayer and the diligent study of His Word. No pressure of military duties caused him to neglect these necessary offices of religion. Prayer was mingled with all his plans and acts. A distinguished officer, who ascribes his own religious impressions to his association with General Jackson, told me that on one occasion he went with a comrade to the General's tent to consult him about the plan of a battle, soon to be fought. After some interchange of views, the officer said, "General, what is your decision?" "Call to-morrow morning," was the reply, "and I will inform you." On leaving the tent, his comrade said to the officer, "Do you know why the General said he would give us his decision to-morrow?" "No: I suppose he wants to think it over," was the answer. "Not exactly that," rejoined the other, "he wants to pray it over." In about half-an-hour the officer had occasion to return to the tent on some other errand, and on thoughtlessly entering, without being announced, was struck with awe at seeing the General on his knees, engaged in prayer. He then remembered what his companion had remarked, somewhat jocosely, about praying over the plan of the battle, and he believed that what had been lightly conjectured was a serious truth; for there was the man who knew how to stand up like a stone wall against the enemies of his country, bowed humbly before God, begging his guidance and powerful aid.

The voice which once trembled in prayer, or rang out like a clarion in battle, is now for ever hushed. The soldier has gone from the assault to the victory—from the camp to the palace—from the earthly tent to the "House not made with hands, eternal in the Heavens." But his spirit will still live to nerve the limbs and fire the heart of every soldier in the army that adored him. Like all the other disasters which have befallen our Confederacy, this, the greatest, will, as I devoutly believe, be overruled by Divine Providence for our good. If with minds chastened, and hearts purified by affliction, it leads our people to "cease from man whose breath is in his nostrils," and to look with more implicit faith and earnest prayer to Him whose right hand and holy arm hath so often gotten us the victory—then this sad bereavement will have accomplished its salutary purpose.

This much is certain: another undying name has been added to the muster-roll of the immortal; and as was said on another occasion, when this calamitous war is over, and Virginia, viatrix at vidua, leaning on her bloody spear, shall raise her mailed hand to wipe away the tear that starts as she recalls her martyred sons, no prouder memory will thrill her heart than that which is awakened by the name of JACKSON.

Very truly yours,

M. D. H., of Richmond, Virginia.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

RICHMOND, May 12.

The past fortnight has been crowded with stirring and important events. The hour of trial has come to us again, and the great heart of the Confederacy within that time has throbbled with almost every emotion save that of fear. At this moment the gloom of an immense sorrow overshadows the land. Jackson is dead!

This solemn fact arrests me at the very threshold, in the attempt to gather up the story, so full of interest, of these last eventful twelve days. I write amid the tolling of the death bells and the wail of the funeral music. The honoured remains of the mighty captain lie in state in an apartment of the Capitol near at hand, to which they were this day borne with such imposing solemnities as befitted his memory and his worth. It is impossible to pen a line concerning the recent battle until some recognition, however imperfect, has been taken of the all pervading grief over this immeasurable loss, and some effort, however feeble, has been made to characterize a genius so marked, and so extraordinary.

The reflection which the most readily occurs to every mind in contemplation of the career thus so suddenly and gloriously terminated, is the little space of time in which it was comprised. Jackson, the man, had not reached the age of forty—Jackson, the soldier, has been before the eyes of men but two brief years. He served, indeed, creditably in the war with Mexico, and for some short period thereafter was in the army of the United States. But within two journeyings of the earth round the sun were compressed all those wonderful achievements which have turned upon him the attention of the first military men of Europe. The breaking out of hostilities found him lecturing to a class of boys in the Virginian Military Institute, not upon the art of war, but upon the imponderables and the laws of physics, following Mr. Faraday, not Jomini—little known even to the people of his own State, and yet, before we see the beginning of the end, he falls lamented by millions, with the respect, may we not say the admiration of mankind. Perhaps no man ever rose more rapidly to greatness, or gave, in so short a time clearer proofs of a commanding ability that was unrecognised before, even by himself.

As a military man, your correspondent, all unlearned in such matters, might well hesitate to speak of him in comparison with the great captains of antiquity, with the masters of war of modern times, or with his contemporaries of other wars of other countries. But it is hardly too much to say that his campaigns in the valley of Virginia will compare without damage with those of Hannibal, nor shall I be accused of extravagance in declaring that he was of that small family of inspired conquerors to which belong Cæsar, the great Frederick, and Napoleon the First. He had, in an eminent degree, that wonderful celerity of movement and quickness in the formation of his plans, which were the prime elements of success in the Gallic War. He possessed that unfailing fertility of resource and unbending purpose which retrieved the fortunes of old Fritz, when nothing else remained to him. And he exerted over his fellow men that rare magnetism which enabled the "Little Corporal" to subdue and assimilate to his own temperaments of his followers. The Stone-Wall brigade was built of hard material originally, but Jackson's nature was the cement which bound it together into the unmovable mass against which the columns of the enemy, like the waves of the ocean against a headland of the Hebrides, could only dash to break themselves. If it be said that Jackson effected no results which justify the comparisons here instituted, let it be remembered that his opportunities were small, as viewed with those of the Carthaginian, the Roman, the Prussian, or the Corsican. He had only a handful of men, and those he could neither clothe nor feed; he was badly provided with arms and ammunition; he fought in a country where the modern enginery of war must of necessity be conveyed over roads absolutely Scythian; he fought always in a subordinate position, where his own plans were liable at any moment to be over-ruled, and he was led on by no vulgar ambition, following no star of destiny, in quest of no empire, grasping at no glittering prize of earthly honour, but impelled by a sense of duty alone, and acting only in obedience to the call of his country in her hour of agony. Like most successful leaders, he was the object of much unfavourable criticism. If the heavy old Austrian martinet thought Napoleon a madcap, many men of routine in the Federal, some even in the Confederate, army deemed Jackson an idiot. "That young man will come to ruin one day," they said. The great Yankee generals who had learned war out of General Halleck's text-book shook their heads as they traced his careerings up and down the Shenandoah, and went out to meet him, each in the confident belief that he would bring the idiot a prisoner to Washington. One after another—Jackson whipped them all. Banks, Shields, Fremont, Milroy, Pope—these heroes went down successively before him. He was always about to be demolished, and yet he always demolished the other party. He never was, but always to be, thrashed. Numbers, position, opportunity were frequently against him, yet he overcame all, and the destruction that might have overtaken other men in simili casu, passed Jackson by to fall upon his antagonists. Checks he knew, disasters almost, but he never knew defeat; and from the hour when he hurled back the advance of Patterson's column beyond Winchester, in the early summer of 1861, to that memorable moonlit night of the week before last, when he came like a whirlwind through the Wilderness upon the rear of Hooker's army, his onset was ever fatal to the hosts that stood in his way. Some men may see in this brilliant career only a succession of happy accidents; but the thoughtful student of life and character will discern the assured success of a master spirit bending circumstances to his will, and making difficulty but an agent in the furtherance of his purposes.

The traits of his private character were scarcely less noticeable than the qualities that individualized him as a leader of armies. A most strict conscientiousness was the rule of all his actions. He followed duty, like Wellington, wherever it led him. A taciturn man, given much to introspection, and having that rare faculty of silence in larger gift than any man since William of Orange, and modest withal well nigh unto diffidence, he passed for a dull man with many who little thought what measurement he was making meantime of their own mental and moral stature; for he read men at a glance, and if at times he was perplexed by some strange nature, a little study enabled him to comprehend it as thoroughly as by examination he comprehended the gyroscope in his specialité of Natural Philosophy. This taciturnity combined with a certain abruptness of manner, led many to think him wanting in sympathy, and yet no man ever had a kinder heart or was more devoted in his friendships. He shared the hardships of the private soldier, and was prompt to recognize and reward meritorious conduct in his followers. "Tell General Lee," he said upon his death-bed, "that my last request is that General Rhodes shall be made a Major-General." In self-discipline, Jackson was severe almost to asceticism. He took no stimulants whatever. His table, in times of abundance, was simply and frugally served. His piety was a vital principle underlying his whole nature. His belief was strong and unwavering in a special Providence, and in every event of the war he saw the hand of God, and by consequence he was a man of prayer. His servant, a faithful negro that attended him, throughout his campaigns, declared that whenever his master got up in the night and went to praying, he always packed his haversack, for he knew there was going to be "the debble to pay" the next morning. And yet Jackson did not insult the Deity by making constant supplications and neglecting the means through which the favour of Deity is alone secured. If he prayed hard, he fought hard. "Watch and pray" was his motto. He seemed, with all his deep and fervent religious feeling, to have believed with Cato the Censor—"Non votis, neque supplicio muliebribus auxilia neorum parantur: Vigilando agendo bene consulendo prospera omnia cedunt: ubi securiæ te atque ignaviæ tradideris, nequicquam Deos implores; irati infestique sunt."

On the night of Saturday the 2nd of May, after he had successfully gained the rear of the enemy, as he was riding back to his lines, from a hasty visit to his skirmishers, attended by his couriers and staff, the group of horsemen was mistaken in the darkness for a body of the enemy's cavalry, and fired upon by a regiment of his own men. Jackson fell, his left arm shattered, and his right hand pierced by Minié balls. Captain Boswell, his Chief of Engineers, was instantly killed. Colonel Crutchfield, his Chief of Staff, was wounded at his side. Two couriers fell dead at his feet. The prostrate General was as soon as possible placed upon a litter, and borne to the rear, but had been moved only a short distance when a second volley struck down one of the bearers and threw their precious burden to the ground. Jackson lived eight days after this sorrowful casualty. He bore amputation without suffering any alarming deprivation of the vital energy, and until Friday his condition was hopeful. But an attack of pneumonia, superinduced by the too abundant use of cold water, despite the earnest protestations of his medical director, began then to excite the gravest apprehensions, and he continued to sink until Sunday, the 10th May, when at fifteen minutes after three, p.m., his brave spirit passed into eternity. For some little time before death he was in a delirium, and his thoughts wandered to the field of battle, such broken sentences as he uttered having reference to the disposition of his troops. "Tell Major Hawks," were his last words. We are reminded of the "Tûte d'Armée" in the little chamber of Longwood, when the lips of Napoleon gave utterance for the last time to the workings of his busy brain. After all, it is some little poor consolation in our grief, to know that our hero wore throughout a charmed life against the bullets of the enemy; that the wounds he received at the hands of his own men were not in themselves mortal; that by the hand of God in disease he was taken from us; while it is a great consolation to feel that even this sore calamity is sent to work out the will of the Great Ruler of the universe. Jackson is gone, and perhaps has not left his peer, but the mighty cause will be carried forward—the work before us depends not on the life of one man, (else might we well tremble in view of the peril which surrounds our incomparable Lee)—and the Providence which raised up Jackson, in the hour that he was needed, will bring to us other stout-hearted and skilful captains as the work goes on.

And so we part with the glorious "Stonewall" hero. One look at his marble features through the glass of the metallic sarcophagus, and we let fall for ever the flag which enwraps him as a pall, and he slips into the past. How he will be regarded by those who shall come after us, no one shall say. But most probably, while the student of the art of war shall dwell upon his campaigns, the poet will sing of him, and the romancist weave the stirring story of his life into the warp and woof of fiction, and for generations to come the traditions of his deeds will be handed down in the cottages of the valley of Virginia, as Beranger tells us the achievements of Napoleon are recited to the children of the French peasantry.

Accounts will have reached you before this letter can possibly get to London, of the recent battles near Fredericksburg, as made up by the New York press for the transatlantic reader and the uneasy public of the United States. It would protract this letter to a wholly unreasonable length, should I undertake to collate from the many descriptions of the several days fighting, which have appeared in our papers, anything like a narrative in detail of the operations, from first to last, which should set forth the part borne in them by the divisions engaged, not to mention instances of individual heroism, or incidents of special interest. All I can hope to give you is an outline. In the postscript of my last letter I mentioned that Hooker had certainly crossed the Rappahannock in force, and that a battle was imminent between the two armies. On the 28th April a body of 20,000 men was thrown over the river at a point some four miles below Fredericksburg, as a feint to divert attention from the passage of the main body, which the next day crossed the Rappahannock at Kelly's and the United States' Fords, and the Rapidan at Bank's Ford and Germania Mills. The body of troops below the town was withdrawn simultaneously with the advance of the bulk of the army, 128,000 strong, which, after passing the Rapidan, moved to attack General Lee in flank, along the plank road leading through Chancellorsville to Fredericksburg. This movement was well conceived on the part of Hooker, and might have prevailed against less wary and skilful generals than were in command of the Confederate army. On Friday, the 1st of May, General Lee, leaving Early's division and Barksdale's brigade to hold the lines before Fredericksburg marched out to meet the Yankee commander. He came up with the opposing force near Chancellorsville that afternoon, where line of battle was formed, at the same time that the brigade of Mahone, being a portion of McLaws' Division, engaged and repulsed the enemy's advance near Banks' Ford, after a spirited skirmish. On Saturday the position in front of the enemy was maintained by the divisions of McLaws and Anderson, while Jackson, fighting his way with indomitable resolution, and carrying three lines of entrenchment, had gained the rear of the main body of Hooker's army. The circuit made by Jackson was long and difficult. At times his men were exposed to a terrible fire of grapeshot and canister, and in assailing the enemy's works were compelled to pass over heavy abatis, but they never once recoiled, and when their noble leader fell beneath their own volleys, they had the "finest army on the planet" completely within their power. One hour more of daylight, or one hour more of Stonewall's life, and Hooker had capitulated. After the dreadful accident, the command of Jackson's corps fell upon General J. E. B. Stuart, who quickly gathering in his flushed and confident regiments, and streaming like a meteor along the extended lines, his sabre gleaming in the moonbeams, led them upon the masses of the foe, but the moment of destruction had passed by. And so they awaited the dawning of the morrow for the renewal of the conflict. The morrow came clear and beautiful, and as all over England, Christian men and women were winding their way to Church on the Fourth Sunday after Easter, through roads smiling with the bloom of English May, two hundred thousand men in Virginia were engaged in murderous combat from the rising to the setting sun. During the night the enemy had repossessed themselves of a portion of their entrenchments, and the struggle for these had to be fought over again. And fought it was, with the same result as before; and when the

May-day sun went down in blood and fire, the whole body of the Yankee army had sought shelter in a bend of the Rappahannock, where, from the peculiar nature of the ground, they were for a time safe from attack. No more terrible fighting has been done, since this infamous war of Lincoln's was commenced, than on Sunday, the 3rd of May, at Chancellorsville. Our own loss was severe—that of the enemy, as they acknowledge, was immense.

Whilst these memorable scenes were enacting in the Wilderness County, near Chancellorsville, a large force had engaged General Early near Fredericksburg, and by a flank movement had overpowered Barksdale's brigade on Marye's Heights, and carried that position, taking some two hundred prisoners belonging to a Mississippi regiment, and six guns, forming a battery of the well-known Washington artillery of New Orleans. These trophies, with the prisoners, they hurried quickly across the river to avoid recapture; and not a moment too soon, for early the next day the heights were assailed and carried in an instant by the troops of Anderson and McLaws, the Yankees making scarcely a show of resistance, and flying precipitately to their pontoons. They were slaughtered in great numbers in their retreat, and paid dearly enough for the little short-lived glory of their success the previous afternoon, over which the Northern papers make such a jubilation.

The afternoon of Monday and the morning of Tuesday were spent in the removal of the wounded and the burial of the dead; but on Tuesday afternoon General Lee left Fredericksburg with the intention of attacking Hooker in his strong natural position in the bend of the Rappahannock, twelve miles distant. A drenching rain, which set in about three o'clock, and continued to fall heavily throughout the night, greatly impeded the march, and before the main body of his troops could arrive upon the spot, Hooker had escaped.

Such was the denouement of the five days' fighting on the Rapidan and the Rappahannock, a "most lame and impotent conclusion" for the Yankee General when viewed by the light of his boastful General Orders on the eve of the battle, in which he asserted that General Lee had been placed by him in the distressing alternative of inglorious flight or utter extermination! Not satisfied with this official braggadocio under the signature of his Adjutant-General, Seth Williams (who was killed upon the field), Hooker repeated it in a speech to his troops on Saturday evening, wherein he encouragingly declared that his position was absolutely impregnable, and the Rebel army was now wholly at his mercy. The cheering of the Yankees in response was distinctly heard along our lines just before the fight begun, and in four hours afterwards the army which was doomed to utter extermination was in possession of that impregnable position.

Our losses during this series of engagements were about 900 killed, 6138 wounded, and 2500 prisoners. Ten pieces of artillery fell into the enemy's hands. The enemy's loss will not fall short of 50,000, by which I mean that the "finest army on the planet" has been reduced by that figure since it crossed the Rappahannock and Rapidan to attack us. Their killed and wounded may be set down at 15,000; 10,000 prisoners have been sent to this city, and there are not less than 25,000 stragglers and deserters who have profited by the confusion and disorder to run off. 15,000 in killed and wounded is rather under than over the correct number. We took fifty-three pieces of artillery and many standards.

This record of the operations of Hooker's army would be altogether incomplete if I omitted to mention the cavalry raid of General Stoneman, who, simultaneously with the advance of the main body, dashed into the region of the country lying between Gordonsville and Richmond, at the head of a large body of horse, for the purpose of cutting off General Lee's communication with the capital. Dividing his forces into three parties at Louisa C.H., he despatched them to various points on the Central, Fredericksburg, and York River Railways, and the James River Canal, which lines of transportation they interrupted for a time, though without doing serious injury to any one of them. They pillaged all the houses in the line of their march, carrying off horses, mules, and negroes, and might have burned some important bridges, had they not feared to attack the guard stationed at them. This raid has called forth the liveliest transports of joy throughout the North, where it is thought a far more brilliant affair than any of Stuart's, Jack Morgan's or Wheeler's daring expeditions; and so it might be considered here, were it not evident that Stoneman never intended to make a fight if attacked by equal numbers. On the contrary, it was clearly undertaken upon the deliberate calculations that ten thousand horses, saddles, bridles, sabres, Enfield rifles, and Yankee troopers, would be a small price to pay for the utter destruction of the railways and canal connecting Richmond with the upper country and General Lee. And it would have been a small price, had the cavalry accomplished its work and fallen into our hands. In proof this pre-determination to surrender if pushed to extremities on the part of Stoneman, I need only refer to the capture of a similar cavalry force in Georgia by General Forest, sixteen hundred bold dragoons giving themselves up as prisoners in preference to attempting Jack Morgan's mode of cutting his way through the hosts sent to surround him. The want of serviceable horses prevented an attack on Stoneman's main force, and thus it made its escape, but the detachment sent to the James River Canal was attacked and driven back by General W. H. F. Lee, and a body of 600, which appeared on the York River Railway, was met by Colonel Duke, in command of a battalion of the 46th Virginia Regiment, and repulsed, at Tunstall's Station, with a loss of six killed, seven wounded, and seventeen prisoners. Not a man of Colonel Duke's battalion sustained the slightest injury. Altogether about sixty prisoners of Stoneman's cavalry found their way to the Libby prison in this city.

At this moment there are about 12,000 Yankee prisoners here, the greater part of whom are under guard, upon an island in the James River, known as the "Belle Isle," where they have comfortable tents, fresh air, large range of locomotion, and the privilege of the bath. This morning, as the body of General Jackson was about to be conveyed from the Governor's house to the Hall of Congress in the Capital, and the funeral procession was forming, a line of 3,000 of these amiable captives, just from Guiney's Station, passed through the town. No taunts, no jeers, no indignities of any kind were offered them, but, for the honour of human nature, I regret to say that some of them indulged in ribald exultations over the death of our glorious chieftain, crying out, "Where's your Stonewall now!" It is creditable to the forbearance of the armed escort, and the people on the side-walks that they were not hayonnetted or stoned to death on the spot.

Advices from Tullahoma and Jackson, Mississippi, lead us to believe that there will be heavy fighting in the South and West, upon which the fate of Vicksburg and Memphis will depend, in a few days' time.

I regret to announce the death by violence of General Earl Van Dorn. He was shot and instantly killed at Spring Hill, Tennessee, on the 8th instant, by Dr. Peters, of St. Louis, Missouri, whose domestic happiness he had ruined. Earl Van Dorn was as gallant an officer as ever wore a sword, but his dissolute life had lost him the respect of society. The Confederacy might, perhaps, have "better spared a better man."

Congress adjourned on the 1st of the month. Among its last acts were the adoption of a Flag and Seal. The Flag is white, with the battle ensign as a Union. Its heraldic designation is as follows:—"Argent, on a canton gules, a saltier azure, fimbriated of the field; charged with thirteen etoiles of the last." It has been raised upon the capitol, and the effect is brilliant. It was used as the pall of Jackson, which may be regarded as a fit consecration of it. The Seal is Washington on horseback, after Crawford's statue; motto—Deo Vindice.

Summer has set in "with its usual severity," and before its time. The thermometer to-day marked 90 degrees of Fahrenheit in the shade.

Another letter from our correspondent, dated Richmond, 29th April, containing much interesting information, is unavoidably delayed to our next impression.

THE MAGAZINES FOR JUNE.

Blackwood opens with a "A Glance at the Italy of Cavour," which is worthy the attention of those who rejoice at the establishment of the Kingdom of Italy, as well as of those who regret that there is no longer a King of Naples, that the domains of the Church have been diminished, that Austria has been forced to give up a part of her Italian territory, and that the Duchies have been merged into the dominion of Victor Emmanuel. We need not discuss whether Italian unity is necessary to Italian freedom, or whether the liberty and strength of Italy would have flourished better under a Confederation of free States. But whether we think Italian centralization good or bad, whether we think the North and South will in due time grow into one people, or that Victor Emmanuel and his successors will live to rule over hostile peoples, we must admire the singular ability and devotion of Cavour, the founder of the Kingdom of Italy, even while we must not less earnestly protest against the means by which he accomplished his great work. We may be fascinated with the brilliant success of Cavour, but we cannot sympathize with his policy of cool, persistent deception. When we hear the reactionists denounced, we should remember that it is but natural there should be a strong feeling of pity for the dethroned and exiled princes. Grant that they were guilty of all the crimes alleged against them, and that they deserved the punishment of ruin and exile, we cannot help regretting that they were cunningly hunted down and trapped. Take the case of Tuscany. Blackwood justly observes, it was "the model State of the peninsula. Mild laws mercifully administered, peace and prosperity everywhere, were what struck the traveller as he crossed the frontier; and the most inveterate grievance-hunter would have been puzzled to find a flaw, except in certain religious intolrances, which are common to all Catholic countries, and which here were almost entirely provoked by the defiant attitude of a propaganda." But Tuscany was necessary to the plan of Cavour, and accordingly M. Buoncompagni was, under the guise of a Sardinian envoy, sent to the capital of that State to foster a revolution. He accomplished the task assigned him, and by unscrupulous craft Tuscany was annexed to Piedmont. Or take the case of Naples. Whilst the expedition of Garibaldi was known to and encouraged by Cavour, foreign Governments were assured that the attempt was discountenanced and would be repressed. "No gloss of excuse, or even of palliation, can cover the conduct of Cavour as regards the Neapolitan Government. It was one whole course of duplicity." The cause of Italy will not be promoted by concealing the truth, or by pretending that the exiled princes have not been wronged. A candid exposition, such as "A Glance at the Italy of Cavour," will do more for Italy than the partisan attempts to paint the exiled princes black, and to represent Cavour and his coadjutors as men without guile or blemish.—"A Letter from Poland," though not giving any decided opinion as to the issue of the momentous struggle, indicates the main source of the weakness of the Poles, and explains some of the revolutionary movements that have appeared so mysterious to Europe. The revolution, though unexpected by the general public, had been long preparing. Its incubation was known to leading politicians, but the question had become a bore, and the cry of revolt had been raised so incessantly since 1848, that no one believed in it, when at length the outbreak was at hand. Certainly the Russian Government was not taken by surprise. So far from that the authorities at St. Petersburg seem to have known that the summer of 1863 was fixed upon as the time for the revolt, and accordingly the conscription was ordered for the past winter, so that the young men might be removed at a season when the climate made resistance desperate, not to say impracticable. It happened, however, that last winter was peculiarly mild, and so far the calculations of the Russian Government were disappointed. It must not, however, be supposed that the revolution in embryo was a united national movement. The national Poles, that is, the Poles who were anxious for national independence, were divided into three parties. The upper classes thought that by patient waiting the cause of Polish liberty would be promoted, and they did what they could to prevent a premature outbreak; the party of action, consisting of what we may call the middle classes, was divided into two sections,—Mieroslawski being at the head of the smaller section. The Agricultural Society, which represented the party of order, was broken up before the revolution, and when the revolt took place the members of it joined the national movement. They did so, not only from patriotic motives, but as a means of self-defence, for otherwise Russia might have taken a lesson from the events that had taken place in Galicia in 1846, and have checked the movement by offering the peasantry the lands of the nobles. The parties of action seeing the necessity of union, conjointly selected Langiewicz as Dictator. No sooner was this done than the fatal spirit of intrigue sprang up, and Mieroslawski, at the head of a faction, succeeded in driving Langiewicz from power. The position of affairs was critical. Mieroslawski was discountenanced, and the contending factions were reunited. How long will the union last? Will not the first gleam of prosperity give renewed vitality to action? This always has been, and still is, the weakness and danger of Poland. If the determination arrived at when the amalgamation was made, after the fall of Langiewicz, that "henceforth there was to be no party of action, no moderate party; each and all were to combine to make Poland independent of Russia, and to allow no sectional jealousy to interfere with the one great national aim," is kept, then there is some hope for Poland. If not—if, in the future as in the past, the spirit of faction is stronger than the spirit of patriotism, Poland will not have gained, nor Russia lost by the revolution.—In a review of "The Life of Charles James Blomfield, late Bishop of London," we have a pleasant biographical sketch of a good and learned, though not a great man. In early life Bishop Blomfield was celebrated for his Greek scholarship, and his capacity for tuition. He would, perhaps, have been more useful to his day and generation, and have done more for his posthumous reputation if he had devoted himself entirely to his early pursuits. Bishops ought, no doubt, to be good Greek scholars, but Greek scholarships ought not, per se, to be a passport to the episcopal bench. Bishop Blomfield was the enemy of pluralities, yet he was at one part of his career a pluralist—that is, he was receiving pay for work that he was forced to do by deputy. We do not mean to infer that he was an inefficient priest and an inefficient bishop; on the contrary, he was at all times zealous in the discharge of his ministerial offices. As a proof of his activity, we may cite his success in increasing the number of churches in the metropolis, and that during his episcopate he consecrated two hundred churches in the diocese of London. In the Puseyite controversy—"in the rank disputes about forms and ceremonies, the putting up of crosses in churches, the ornamentation of altars with flowers, and the preaching in surplices instead of black gowns, the Bishop got inextricably involved; and he further managed by his attempt to satisfy all parties, to satisfy none." He placed himself at the head of what he considered a reform, and had not the strength or capacity to check the movement when it became a reaction towards Romanism. The close of Bishop Blomfield's life is remarkable for his retirement from the bench of bishops when he found that illness prevented him efficiently fulfilling his duties. There is no lack of clergymen willing to episcopate, but it was rather a startling novelty to find a bishop anxious and willing to give up his exalted position.

Fraser has a very strong article on the Polish question. It is assumed that the weakness of Russia will be a gain to Europe, and that, though it is not our business "to stir up the subjects of the Russian Empire to rebel," we are bound to help the rebels as far as we can. "Whether England has, or has not, a duty, a high duty to perform, evidently depends upon our ability." The writer in Fraser thinks "the very least"—the italics are not ours—"which we ought, at any rate, at present to enforce" is to send a fleet into the Black Sea by permission of the Sultan, and by the diversion of Russian arms, caused by the establishment of free-trade with Circassia, help the Poles; and, moreover, such an event might cause "a Garibaldi to presently appear among the Cossacks." The writer also thinks that this would not necessitate a war with Russia. "If we insisted on forcibly putting down the blockade in the Black Sea, while avowing that we had no war with Russia elsewhere, we have an invincible belief that the Emperor will, however reluctantly, submit without forcing a war." In support of this view the case of Holland is cited, when we informed the King of Holland that we had no war with him, but we intended to drive his troops out of the citadel of Antwerp. Whether Russia would accede to a similar arrangement is more than doubtful. But the writer in Fraser does not ask us to avoid war if war is needed to benefit the Poles. "A real neutrality in such a strife is unworthy of England, which is bound to aim openly at the freedom of Poland." If, for example, "the Finns in general still remember with regret their old connexion with Sweden, nothing could be more righteous than to help them to regain it, even at the expense of an avowed Russian war." * * * "If simultaneously we kept open the Circassian trade, Poland and Finland might, by the assistance of France and Sweden, become independent of Russia, with glorious advantage to Europe." We do not dispute the nobleness of the idea, that for the sake of aiding the Poles to win back a long-lost independence, we are to help the Finns, to open up free trade with Circassia by force of arms, to encourage a Cossack revolt, and to encounter a European war. Is it not strange that such a sentiment—and we believe it is not unpopular in this country—should be entertained? And yet for the sake of free trade with the Confederate States, which would do more for the prosperity and commerce of Europe than a hundred independent Poland and Circassias, for the sake of helping a gallant people, to preserve their independence, and for the sake of doing what we lawfully can to put an end to a deadly and wicked war between a kindred people, we hesitate even to recognise the South, lest we may offend the Republican faction in the North. We must, however, in justice to Fraser, observe that that magazine has always manifested a warm sympathy with the South.—Amongst the other papers in the current number of Fraser we may mention "Bolingbroke as a Statesman," in which all that can be said is said in favour of his political career. A contribution entitled "An American Refugee in London," gives a graphic account of the tyranny of the Federals, and concludes with expressing the conviction that if the North "will heed no warning and accept no help, she must lie a gigantic wreck in view of all the nations of the earth." This writer holds that England has been wise in not "intervening," because the proposed mediation of the Emperor of the French was rejected. It occurs to us that the rejection of mediation might possibly be a reason for intervention, but could not by any possibility be a reason for non-intervention. But nobody has asked England to intervene. Her fault is that, by refusing to recognise the independence of the South, which is not in any respect an intervention, she has and still does encourage the North to carry on a hopeless war. Non-recognition is, in fact, a moral intervention in favour of the Lincolnite and Republican faction of the United States.

The Cornhill has a well-timed and able contribution on "Spiritualism." It commences by stating, that "Three years ago an article was published in this magazine, under the title of 'Stranger than Fiction,' which contained a report of the writer's personal experience of one of Mr. Home's sittings, and which, in some quarters, has produced the remarkable inference that the Cornhill Magazine was a ghostly organ, favouring the practices of spirit-rappers, and others of the same or analogous persuasion." No doubt about it. No doubt that an article in a highly influential magazine, then under the avowed editorship of one who is in the foremost rank of living authors, helped the spirit-rappers in their pursuit of gain and victims. It was, we think, the duty of the magazine, finding how greatly the article had been misunderstood, to have taken an early opportunity of explaining that no more faith was placed in the tricks of Mr. Home than in the jargon of a fortune-telling gipsy. It is better late than never, and we are glad to have this emphatic protest against spiritualism, as we are convinced it will tend to comfort many weak-minded persons who are somewhat deluded by the pretences of the Spiritualists. The contributor to the Cornhill has read the books of the Spiritualists—Mr. Howitt's, Mr. Home's, and Mr. H. D. Owen's, and other publications of the same kind, and his conviction is, that "he does not believe a single word of them from one end to the other. The stories which they contain run off his mind like water off a duck's back, and appear to him altogether unworthy of credit." As to "the idiots who rap to those who are idle enough to listen,—Mr. Home floating about the ceiling, with the ghosts holding up his coat-tails, tables climbing on to ottomans, and arm-chairs cracking their joints at their masters," the writer says:—"I shall simply dismiss from my mind the whole subject as a mass of rubbish."—The light article in the Cornhill, entitled "Paint, Powder, and Patches," would never have been published if anonymous writing was unlawful. We dare say that ladies will read it, and they cannot help being amused by it, but they will stand upon the privileges of their sex and give no heed to the playful hints and broad insinuations.

Any one undecided as to the whereabouts for an autumn or summer tour, will probably get an idea from Bentley's Miscellany. There is, first of all, a pleasant account of Heligoland, the smallest of British possessions. It is not a lively place, but on the contrary, "is so utterly dull, that the very dullness constitutes an unexpected charm." Next there is a narrative of "A Visit to Denmark and Sweden in the Autumn of 1862," and besides its inherent charms, Scandinavia has the advantage of not being done to death like the "beautiful Rhine." "Transatlantic Sketches" may be very good, but they have rather too much Yankee slang in them to be intelligible without a closer study than we can afford to give them.

London Society is, as usual, profusely illustrated, and has an unusual number of light, amusing articles. "London Society Abroad" is a faithful sketch of the idiosyncracies of Englishmen on the Continent. "Cricketers" denounces the system of employing professional players in county matches, and is likely to do good service for the manly sport, which, since it is patronized by the Prince of Wales, is sure to become more popular than ever. If we were to mention all the good articles in the present number of London Society—good, we mean, because they are appropriate for a magazine "of light and amusing literature," we should have to transcribe the entire table of contents.

Macmillan is rather dull. We do not think that Mr. Bonamy Price's article, "The Great City Apostasy on Gold," will induce people to esteem a paper currency so highly as a metallic currency. He regards the suspension of specie payments as a mere temporary measure. "For, even if any of the issuing banks could not, for the moment, procure gold enough for the demand on them, if their business were otherwise well conducted, no public evil of any consequence would ensue. No one would be kept out of his money beyond a few days at the longest." This may be political economy; but if so we trust our financial system may never be based upon that science.

DONATION FROM CALIFORNIA.—Mr. J. H. Ashbridge, the Treasurer of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund at Liverpool, has received the following anonymous letter from San Francisco, inclosing a donation of £10 to that fund. In answer to the inquiry of Bond Fide we would suggest that no better arrangement for the collecting and remitting subscriptions from California can probably be devised than that in which he has already been so unexpectedly successful:—

San Francisco, April 23, 1863.

J. H. Ashbridge, Esq.

55, Brown's Buildings, Liverpool.

Sir,—Please find 1st of Exchange on Messrs. N. M. Rothschild and Sons, London, for £10 sterling drawn payable to your order. It is the small donations of several friends of the South in California. We saw in the LONDON INDEX the "Appeal to Southerners, on behalf of the Southern prisoners of war now in Northern prisons," and learned from that that you had permission to relieve the sick and wounded soldiers of the South now in bondage at the North. May God bless your labours!

P.S.—If you would acknowledge the receipt of this small sum from California in the INDEX, and point out some way for receiving subscriptions, I think you would get a large sum from this State. BONA FIDE.

"STONEWALL" JACKSON.

IT is Proposed to raise a Subscription in England for the Erection in the Confederate States of to this gallant man. It will not be necessary thus to perpetuate his memory; for wherever the English language is spoken, and true heroism appreciated, the name of "STONEWALL" JACKSON will ever be revered; but it will prove the deep interest which the Advertiser feels sure exists throughout Great Britain with the Confederate cause, and our sympathy with them in this their greatest loss.

Subscriptions will be received at the office of THE INDEX, 13, Bouverie-street, and acknowledged weekly in the columns of this journal. Money orders to be made payable to Mr. J. B. Hopkins.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

On the 24th of May, President Lincoln informed the Northern papers that "A despatch from Mr. Fuller, manager of the telegraph at Memphis, late in the night, says the Stars and Stripes float over Vicksburg, and the victory is complete." On the 30th, advices from General Grant to the 25th are published, in which he represents the siege "to be progressing favourably." The rejoicing of the North was, at least, premature, and the intelligence of the Federal Government, as usual, false. Our object in noticing this is to repeat the warning we gave last week of the utter unreliability of Northern accounts, and to explain the uncertain tone in which we refer to statements that are not authenticated by Southern reports.

Another week has elapsed, but until the moment we write, the news of the issue of the contest for the possession of Vicksburg has not reached Europe. We must confess, however, that what has transpired leads us to think that the situation, though critical to both sides, is favourable to the Confederates. And first, let us take the Northern position, accepting the statements of the Northern press and the Northern officials. Grant, in making his advance, relied upon a rapid success, and so gave up his communication with Grand Gulf. We learn from Admiral Porter's despatch that, on the 18th of May, he succeeded in opening a communication with Grant on the Yazoo, and that the Federal commander requested him to send up provisions. From this we may surmise that Grant would be in a difficulty if his advance was checked, at least, for any considerable period. What has been his progress? He was not stopped by General Pemberton, but forced that General to fall back to his entrenchments. He has captured Jackson, and Haines' Bluff. He has advanced on Vicksburg, and besieged it. What have been his losses? The Southern accounts say he lost 9,000 men in killed and wounded in the engagement with Pemberton; and the Northern account goes very far to confirm this estimate. The loss in three corps is thus set down,—in Hovey's, 1,600, Boomer's 500, and Surgin's 400, being 2,500 men in the three corps. Then there were losses at Jackson, and finally the losses before Vicksburg. On the 22nd, the Federals estimate their loss at from 1,000 to 5,000, and the fighting was still "continuing furiously." The Southern papers estimate the Federal loss at 10,000 before Vicksburg, up to the 22nd or 23rd. With these losses, all that General Grant could report on the 25th was, that "the siege was progressing favourably, that he was fully able to maintain the investment, and to repel any attack upon his rear." Instead of taking Vicksburg by a coup de main, Grant had to undertake a siege. Six of his assaults were repulsed, and between him and the Confederate works his dead and wounded were lying by thousands. The security of Grant's army, in the opinion of his Northern friends, depended to some extent upon General Banks effecting a junction with him. We are not venturing an opinion as to whether or not Grant could maintain himself without Banks. Let the Federal statements speak for themselves. We are only reciting the Federal position up to the 25th of May, as reported by the Federals. In New York the loss of 20,000 men is called a cheap price to pay for the capture of Vicksburg. The blood has been spilt, whether spilt in vain we know not; but on the 30th of May, when Grant's latest advices of the 25th were published, we think the Federals had more ground for anxiety than for jubilation.

And now let us glance at the Confederate position. It was, we admit, calculated to inspire a patriotic public with anxiety. The advance of Grant had not been checked by Pemberton; but that Commander, after a gallant fight and inflicting a heavy loss on a superior force, had to retire to his entrenchments. The capital of Mississippi had been temporarily occupied by the Federals, and partially burnt. Haines' Bluff had been captured by the enemy. Vicksburg was besieged. Such were the reasons for anxiety: and now for the grounds of hope and confidence. The garrison of Vicksburg, though small, was amply provisioned, and capable of making a desperate defence. Six assaults of the Federals had been repulsed with great slaughter. On the 25th of May, eleven days had elapsed since General Johnstone, one of the ablest and most active of the Southern commanders, had left Jackson. During that time he had not been idle. He had been collecting forces, and if he had gathered together a sufficient army, he would undoubtedly attack Grant in the rear.

This is, we think, a fair account of the situation; and whilst it justifies the expectation of the Confederates, that Vicksburg would be successfully defended, there is certainly nothing in it to excuse the Federal assumption of certain victory.

Vicksburg was to be taken by a combined attack of gun-boats and land forces; and we have in an official despatch from Admiral Porter, dated Haines' Bluff, May 20th, an account, in his own peculiar vernacular, of how he "pushed" and "shoved" about his gun-boats; but in justice to General Grant, we are bound to observe that the admiral did not render any important aid. When Admiral Porter ascertained that Haines' Bluff was evacuated, he sent a gun-boat—or, to be exact, let us quote his own words:—"Lieutenant Commander Walker, in the De Kalb, pushed on to Haines' Bluff, which the enemy had commenced evacuating the day before, and a party remained behind in the hopes of destroying or taking away a large amount of ammunition on hand.

"When they saw the gun-boats they ran out and left everything in good order—guns, forts, tents, and equipage of all kinds, which fell into our hands.

"As soon as the capture of Haines' Bluff and fourteen forts was reported to me, I shoved up the gun-boats from below Vicksburg to fire at the hill batteries, which fire was kept up for two or three hours. At midnight they moved up to the town and opened on it for about an hour, and continued at intervals during the night to annoy the garrison.

"On the 19th I placed six mortars in position, with orders to fire night and day as rapidly as they could."

We sincerely wish that Admiral Porter had added to his other accomplishments an elementary knowledge of English composition, as we might then possibly be able to make something out of the passage we have quoted. It is surely somewhat curious, if the Confederates had been evacuating Haines' Bluff the day before, and had left a party behind for the purpose of destroying the ammunition, that on the appearance of Walker in the De Kalb they should have run out leaving everything in good order. We were under the impression that the work of destruction was comparatively easy, and that in twenty-four hours, at least some of the guns might have been spiked, and some of the ammunition burnt. Then how are we to explain this little discrepancy? First, we are told Walker pushed on in the De Kalb, and in the next paragraph we are informed that the Confederates ran out when they saw the gun-boats. Now, we might have supposed that the De Kalb was accompanied by other vessels, but for the next paragraph; therefore, we must assume that it was a single gun-boat that so alarmed the Confederates. Admiral Porter says, as soon as he heard of the capture of Haines' Bluff and fourteen forts he shoved up his boats from below Vicksburg. The concluding sentence of that paragraph we are unable to construe. Whether the gun-boats moved up to the town, or the batteries moved up to the town is not very clear; and how on earth the fire of the boats or batteries could have annoyed a garrison that had long since evacuated the place altogether passes our comprehension. The next sentence in this remarkable despatch is equally funny and indefinite. On the 19th Admiral Porter placed six mortars in position, with the extraordinary order to fire night and day as rapidly as they could. What they were to fire at we do not know. That part of the despatch which we have not quoted is equally humorous. For example, he talks about destroying the encampments, "which were permanently constructed;" then he says he burnt the gun-carriages, for fear they might fall into the hands of the Confederates; blew up the magazine, and destroyed the works generally. But, as we have seen in this very despatch, he records triumphantly that the Confederates ran out at the sight of Walker in the De Kalb, and left everything in good order, instead of destroying the ammunition. How kind then of the Federals thus to carry out the wishes and intentions of their enemy, especially as Admiral Porter, on the 20th of May, was able to gladden the heart of his Government by an intimation that the reduction of Vicksburg was "a mere question of a few hours." It is surprising that an officer can write such a despatch, but still more surprising that any Government could publish it. In such a case editorial revision would have been kind as well as judicious.

There is no other war news that calls for comment. General Hooker is advancing towards Washington to protect that capital in case of need. General Rosecranz having announced to his troops that the hour for action had arrived, has done nothing since. There are rumours of the Confederate forces entering Kentucky, and General Lee is preparing for a campaign—some say in Maryland, others in Pennsylvania, and others that he intends to attack Washington. As usual, the Federals are profoundly ignorant of the intended movements of the enemy.

The Northern press has been in ecstasies over the supposed capture of Vicksburg. That event was to be the end of the "rebellion." Rosecranz was urged to forthwith rout the army in front of him; and Hooker was warned, under pain of being eclipsed by Grant, to take Richmond without delay. The most singular part of the business is that this exuberant confidence was based upon the tone of the Richmond press. An article from the Richmond Whig was quoted as a proof of Southern despondency. It seems to us that never did any journal, under any circumstances, publish an article that was less despondent and more courageous. The Whig assumes the worst to have happened. It says,—"Suppose Vicksburg has fallen, the army inside the fortifications captured or destroyed

Port Hudson reduced or abandoned, the Mississippi in its whole length controlled by the enemy, and the Confederacy temporarily, or even for the remainder of the war, cut in twain; suppose, further, that this really great success to the foe and cruel disaster to ourselves, is attended with consequences as certain as they were deplorable—increased enthusiasm at the North, the triumphant vindication of the tyranny at Washington, conscription enforced even in the North-west, without opposition, perhaps a revival of the spirit of volunteering, peace parties crushed for ever, men and money to an endless sum obtained, and Europe, busy with its own troubles, awed into permanent silence—suppose all this, for it becomes us now to consider the worst possible aspect of the news, what then? Our duty will then be precisely what it has always been—to maintain the cause unflinchingly, and to exhibit a spirit more indomitable and persistent than that of the enemy. Nothing is to be gained by despondency. All that has been lost may be regained by fortitude and perseverance. * * Within two years we have withstood 1,400,000 of the Vandals. What shall hinder us from withstanding as many more during the year to come? Nothing but a want of manhood, which the South has never yet failed to show. We have veterans commanded by great generals—the enemy have recruits commanded by generals inferior to our own. Let them come on; we will see whose heart is the stoutest, let the war last as long as it may.” We have quoted sufficient to show what the Federal Press means by Southern despondency. For our own part, we have more reliance on the spirit of a people not unduly elated by victory, and who prepare for defeats that may never happen, than in the spirit of a people that rejoices in and boasts of victories that never may be won. When will the North learn that Holdfast is a better dog than Brag?

The Northern accounts of the capture of the despatch steamers Arrow and Emily, and of two schooners laden with corn, at the same time, are very emphatic as to the generous manner in which the Confederates treated their prisoners. The correspondent of the New York Herald says, “A gentleman, formerly a resident of Elizabeth City, was also taken and subsequently released, it appearing from documents in his possession, that he was a subject of her Britannic Majesty. Although the baggage of the passengers was searched, no money or other valuables were taken. They inquired for whisky, and found that one of the soldiers had a couple of bottles, which he was using as medicine. They gave him $10 in North Carolina money for the liquor, uncorked the bottles, and invited all their captives to take a drink. The conduct of the rebels is represented as having been in every respect gentlemanly and courteous to their prisoners.” We can readily understand that the Federals are surprised at such conduct. It is altogether opposed to their own practices. When Jackson was in their possession, the inhabitants were robbed of their valuables, in addition to so many houses and public buildings being destroyed.

The Alabama and Florida have been hard at work. Besides the eight captures reported in New York on the 26th May, and of which the total value of the stocks and cargoes is estimated at upwards of $800,000, we learn by the last mail that the Commonwealth, of Boston, from New York for San Francisco, has also been taken. This vessel and her cargo are valued at $350,000.

It is quite natural that New York should be very angry at the doings of the Alabama and Florida. There are those who are glad enough when the Confederates capture and destroy Government property, because that necessitates war contracts, but who feel acutely the loss of their own property. The war may go on for ever, so long as it does not hurt New England and New York; and particularly as it enriches the contractors of New England and the speculators of New York. The Herald has a very bitter editorial on the subject. On the faith of its London correspondent, it announces that “two more rebel privateers, built in English yards, have escaped to sea.” The Herald says that English merchants are delighted at the prospect of driving the Northern ships from the ocean by privateering, and that Earl Russell and his subordinates are not excessively vigilant. It is even hinted that the Virginia may have “secured the connivance” of the British authorities. Therefore the Herald casts about for a remedy for the evil. “But our merchants are beginning to think it is high time to put a stop to this business. They say that if the rebels burn and destroy private property at sea our armies have a right to burn and destroy their private property on land. Though this is not according to the usages of modern warfare, there is nothing in it unjust, and it is possible the United States’ Government may yet be driven to adopt it, making a new law for itself. Some time ago our Government proposed to the Powers of Europe to abolish the capture of all private property at sea; but they refused to accept the proposition, and it may become necessary now to take the matter into our own hands, and either abolish the capture of enemy’s private property by sea and land, by agreement with the rebel Government, or insist upon capturing it indiscriminately upon either element.” To say nothing about the inconsistency of uniting about entering into an international compact with a rebel Government, we may observe that the Vandalism and robbery of the Federal troops make the threat of retaliation by land ridiculous. Already they destroy and plunder where and when they can. Look, for example, at Banks’s expedition in Louisiana. Look at the burning and plunder of Jackson. Or, as one of a thousand instances, take a paragraph from the latest telegram, which says, “The Federals have made an expedition from West Point, Virginia, into the neighbouring counties, sacking the grain warehouses and burning the mills, and capturing horses, cattle, and sheep. They took from the farmers everything that could be of use to the Federal army, and destroyed their agricultural implements.”

Mr. Lincoln is likely to have some difficulty in disposing of Mr. Vallandigham. Upon reaching the “rebel” lines, Mr. Vallandigham said:—“I am a citizen of the State of Ohio, and of the United States. I am here against my will. I therefore surrender myself to you as a prisoner of war.” Under the circumstances he of course refused to take the oath of allegiance to the Confederacy, and, therefore, will, it is said, be returned to the North. With every desire to shelter the victims of Mr. Lincoln’s tyranny, the Richmond Government will not permit the Confederacy to be made a penal colony for the North. In an article on this subject, the Richmond Sentinel of the 19th May observes:—“Lincoln has, of course, no more right to send any one here than to send him to England or France. Not so much; because we are at war, when no liberties are allowable. We should refuse to receive any one thus offered to us, who does not personally solicit it, and unless interest or humanity dictates it. We must refuse all who would make us weaker. We must require of all who are received that they join their efforts with ours against the common enemy. They must assume our allegiance and its duties, and must contribute, in some way, their skill and industry and valour to the common cause.”

The people of Ohio are clamouring for Mr. Vallandigham’s release.

Though Mr. Lincoln will not pardon Mr. Vallandigham, but threatened if he returned to the Federal lines to imprison him for the rest of the war, he is now and then moved to mercy by policy or inclination. Three Confederate soldiers who were captured by the Federals were citizens of Maryland, and being tried by a military commission under the presidency of that judicial personage, General Sickles, were sentenced to be hanged. Naturally enough, General Hooker strongly approved of the sentence, for next to taking Richmond, hanging prisoners in cold blood must be deeply gratifying to the fighting but, owing to Confederate obstinacy, unsuccessful Joe Hooker. Mr. Lincoln, however willing to please his general, would not endorse the sentence, but declared that the men who were taken as prisoners of war were to be treated as prisoners of war. If Mr. Lincoln had arrived at any other conclusion, it would have been awkward. It would, for instance, have justified the Confederates in hanging all the prisoners taken from the so-called Kentucky and Maryland regiments—regiments which Mr. Lincoln knows are not raised in Kentucky or Maryland. If Mr. Lincoln does not trouble himself about mercy or justice, he is prudent enough to temper hate and despotism with discretion.

We have also to record a more touching instance of Mr. Lincoln’s discretion. Last October Mr. Albert Horn was convicted in the United States Circuit Court of fitting out the slaver City of Norfolk, and sentenced to five years’ imprisonment. On the 21st of May Mr. Lincoln granted him a free pardon, and he was released from custody the next day. Mr. Albert Horn ought to feel very grateful that he had not to appeal to a President elected by Southern votes, for in that case he would have had no chance of pardon. If, however, the pious New Englanders suppose that by destroying as many of the negroes as they can, they will cause such a demand in the South as to give them a chance of renewing their long lost, but dearly remembered, slave trade, they are self-deceived. In that respect they will gain nothing by the misery they are bringing upon a portion of the black population in the South.

What a constant trouble the Negro is to the North! The Newbern correspondent of the New York Herald mentions that a coloured major called on an officer whom he did not know, and without ceremony “commenced overhauling some papers in a desk.” The coloured major was ejected, complained to the colonel, and the white quartermaster was put under arrest. This same major insists upon wearing shoulder straps contrary to the order issued, forbidding all negroes from wearing them or military buttons. The result of this assumption, supported as it was by the commanding officer, is, that “a large number of the nine months’ men, whose term of enlistment has just or is about expiring, have shown considerable bitterness of feeling since the advent of the coloured surgeon with his major’s shoulder straps. They do not like the idea, they say, of being obliged to ‘salute a negro;’ that they will ground arms first, and that instead of re-enlisting after a month’s stay at home, as they had intended, they will not re-enlist at all.”

The negro who goes North is to be pitied. The Free South, a Northern publication, remarks that “the transition from slavery to freedom appeared to them only a change of masters, the difference being that the new master was more easily imposed upon than the old one.” In order to counteract this notion, General Paxton has ordered the rations for negroes to be discontinued, so that “they will be taught by the pangs of hunger a lesson that will not be lost. Their former condition as slaves gives them no claim on the United States. On the contrary, they owe the Northern Government a debt of gratitude for favours conferred.” The negroes would feel particularly grateful to the Northern Government if it would confer no more of its favours, seeing that they lead to starvation and death.

There has been a negro riot at Hamburg, Pennsylvania, or rather an anti-negro riot. There was a dispute between some slaves and a negro who kept a drinking store. The negro complained, and some of the soldiers were arrested. Upon this the entire regiment turned out, completely gutted the negro’s house, and proceeding to the negro quarter of the town, damaged every building it contained.

General Milo L. Hascall is actively employed in putting down the press in the department of the Ohio. We noticed last week that he stopped one paper because the editor called him a donkey. The New York Herald says, that Hascall has suppressed another journal, “because the printer had commenced his name with an R, instead of an H, which was only a typographical error.” It was rather an unpleasant error. The Herald says, General Hascall “wrote a letter recently, in which he expressed regret that his power did not extend to this city, in order that he might be able to suppress the journals of New York.” Let him not be impatient. The last remnants of liberty are fast being swept away in the United States.

The Federal Colonel Jones made a raid from Newbern, attacked the Confederates at Gum Swamp, took some prisoners, was followed by the Confederates in his retreat, attacked in his lines, and killed behind his breastworks. How many other Federals were killed is not stated.

Amongst items of Northern news we may mention that the Federal Government is in some difficulty with regard to the exchange of prisoners, because the South has taken nearly double as many as the North. The “Halleck” captures do not count.

Summary execution is now the substitute in the North for law and justice. “A prisoner at the Old Capitol Prison, Washington, has been shot dead while looking out of window by the guard on duty. This prisoner was charged with having furnished military appliances to the Confederates at Richmond. He is said to have been a British subject.” If the victim is a British subject, this deed will be very popular. The execution of fifty British subjects without process of law will not disturb the harmony between Earl Russell and Mr. Seward. Our Foreign Secretary will liberally construe the law in favour of the North, and in case of need Mr. Seward will apologize.

It is reported that General Butler is to succeed General Burnside in the command of the department of the Ohio. He is peculiarly fitted for the office of reducing the citizens of that department to obedience. He will, no doubt, gain many victories over the women, and add to his New Orleans reputation. Besides keeping the men in order, he is to enforce the Conscription Act, and to organize negro levies.

The Suttlers of the Federal army are charged with supplying the Confederates with nearly a million dollars, worth of supplies. If they have had the opportunity, no doubt they have done so.

A good judgment of the legal effectiveness of the Federal blockade may be formed from an official statement that “the length of coast blockaded by the Federal squadrons from Alexandria, Virginia, to the Rio Grande, is 3,500 miles. There are 189 openings in this line of coast.”

A Federal schooner that ran aground at the mouth of the Neuse River was captured and burnt by the Confederates, and her crew taken prisoners.

TELEGRAPHIC NEWS.

(Per North American.)

NEW YORK, May 30, Evening.

Nothing decisive has been yet received from Vicksburg. The New York Democratic Committee has passed resolutions against any negotiations for peace by the Administration, except upon the basis of the preservation of the Union and the Constitution.

June 1.

Advices from Vicksburg are to the 27th of May. The Federals had been repulsed in three assaults. The last assault was made by General Sherman with 20,000 men, and he lost 600 killed and a large number wounded. The Federal outer lines were within 100 yards of the Confederate works.

The Confederate fortifications consist of a chain of forts 800 yards apart, connected by deep intrenchments, and extending several miles.

It is supposed that regular siege operations will be necessary to capture the city.

Apprehensions are entertained of an attack in General Grant's rear.

General Johnstone was reported to be in the neighbourhood of Jackson with 15,000 men, short of provisions.

Southern journals assert that two gunboats had been sunk at Vicksburg, and that General Banks had crossed the Mississippi at Bayou Sara, seven miles above Port Hudson.

Commodore Porter officially reports that he has destroyed the navy yards at Yazoo City, together with three powerful steamers, a formidable ram, all kinds of machinery, and property valued at $2,000,000.

Despatches from Murfreesboro' state that the Confederate General Manaduke was reported to have captured Helena, Arkansas, and many negro soldiers, all of whom, together with their officers, he had hung. The public await further advices before crediting this report.

General Burnside has informed General Bragg that he should hang ten Confederate officers if the Confederates retaliated for the two whom General Burnside asserts were spies, tried and condemned in accordance with the usages of war.

Gold advanced to-day from 45 to 48 per cent. premium.

SPECIAL DESPATCH TO SOUTHERN CLUB.

NEW YORK, May 30, 12, A.M.

All the assaults upon Vicksburg repulsed with fearful loss to the Federals. Grant is in need of reinforcements before renewing the attack.

It is rumoured that Banks is pouring in troops at Haines' Bluff and Warrenton to assist Grant. The Confederates are in fine spirits, and confident they can repulse all assaults by land or water. Gun and mortar-boats are continually bombarding, but without effect. It is rumoured that Grant had captured the outer works of Vicksburg, which is false. At the last accounts his army was entrenching itself, and building rifle pits. Federal losses thus far 15,000 men. Confederate loss small, owing to protection of their batteries. Johnston is in a strong position in Grant's rear, and rapidly receiving reinforcements. Beauregard has detached 20,000 men to aid in the assault upon Grant, which will probably be made by Johnston in a few days. A rumour has been in circulation that assaults had been made, and that a large portion of Grant's army had been captured, but not credited. Grant's supplies reach him from Yazoo.

There is nothing reliable known regarding the alleged contemplated invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania, though our papers generally credit it.

The town of Austria, on Mississippi River, has been burnt by the Federals.

Rosecrantz's army is reported moving, and a battle is anticipated in ten days. Bragg has 45,000 infantry and 16,000 cavalry to meet him.

An unknown steamer has been sunk by fire of the Federal fleet off Charleston, while running the blockade on the 20th May.

The Governor of Pennsylvania asks Government to protect his State against invasion. The Confederates refuse to receive Vallandigham unless he takes the oath of allegiance to the Confederate Government, which he declines. He will, therefore, be returned and liberated.

The Navy Department are sending vessels after the Alabama and Florida.

No change in war risks since the recent captures.

ENGLAND.

There was again, last week, according to the returns of the Poor-law Board, a diminution, though a trifling one, in the pauperism of the manufacturing districts. The reduction is under 1800, and is made up, for the most part, of very small items from fourteen out of twenty-one unions. The whole reduction in the number of paupers, since the tide began to turn, amounts to 109,000. We fear, however, that there has been no corresponding reduction, as we have before said, in the number of persons out of employment and virtually dependent on alms.

The Bill empowering Government to provide, by loans of public money, means for the employment of these people on public works in Lancashire and Cheshire has been brought in and read a first time; and we trust that before very long it will be in active operation.

Meanwhile, there is one class of sufferers by the cotton famine whose condition ought not to be forgotten. A very considerable proportion of the lower section of the middle class of Lancashire, especially in the towns, were directly or indirectly dependent on the cotton trade, and are now deprived of their subsistence, never having had any capital, or having been forced to consume all they had. There were a multitude of small manufacturers, men owning their twenty, fifty, or a hundred looms, hiring a shed and "power"—that is to say, the use of a steam-engine—to work them and providing their materials on credit or with borrowed capital. These men are ruined, and hardly know how to find bread. There were the smaller agents, who provided these manufacturers with capital, and lived on their businesses. These agents are involved. There were the dealers in cotton waste, and a multitude of similar traders, in a small way, dependent on the cotton manufacture, and serving it in one way or another. These men are deprived of their business and of their livelihood. Then there was the whole multitude of small tradesmen, who lived by supplying the wants of a class which earned high wages and spent them freely. These gave credit and took it; they had not much capital, but they drove a good trade, and they paid high rents. Their customers are gone; their credit is at an end; their capital is either consumed, or locked up in advances to insolvent debtors; they cannot meet their engagements; they cannot pay their rents; they can scarcely even meet the rates imposed upon them by the necessities of their neighbours: some of them are already beggars—all of them are on the verge of beggary. These men are almost more to be pitied than the operatives themselves. They are less fitted to contend with privation, and they have lost more, for they had more to lose. For them prosperity will return in vain if she do not return at once. And we do not see what they can do for themselves, or what the country can be asked to do for them.

Much attention has been excited by the memorandum recently issued by the Commander-in-Chief, in regard to the case of Sergeant-Major Lilley, of the 6th Dragoons, now quartered in India, under command of Colonel Crawley. Before the appointment of that officer to the command, the regiment was in a thoroughly satisfactory state of discipline. Colonel Crawley involved himself in numerous quarrels with his officers, and in particular with Paymaster Smales, whom he brought to a Court-martial. Upon that Court-martial a question was raised touching the frequent absence of the Colonel from regimental parades. Colonel Crawley learned that three Sergeant-Majors of the regiment were likely to give evidence very unfavourable to him upon this point. He sent for them, cross-examined them severely in the presence of his friends, and ordered them into arrest on a charge of conspiracy. He forwarded such a report to his superior officer, that the latter directed the prisoners to be kept under close arrest—that is, confinement to their quarters with a sentry at their door, which, in India, is a sentence of barbarous cruelty. This punishment, be it observed, was inflicted without trial or inquiry. But it was not sufficient to gratify the vindictive passions of Colonel Crawley, who gave orders that the sentry should stand not outside, but inside Lilley's door. He was reminded that Sergeant-Major Lilley was a married man, and he replied that he did not care, and repeated his order. Mrs. Lilley was in delicate health. Her husband was seized with apoplexy, and then the sentinel was removed from inside his room—but the Colonel's vengeance was satisfied, and his victim died, followed a few days afterwards by his unhappy wife. This achieved, the Colonel tried to shift the blame from himself to the officer who had received, protested against, and finally obeyed his order; and the General commanding the division appears to have taken his part, rebuking the officer, who tried to clear himself by stating the facts of the case, for insubordination. The Duke of Cambridge, as Commander-in-Chief, has issued a memorandum censuring Colonel Crawley in strong terms, but allowing him to remain in command of his regiment. The matter has been taken up in the House of Commons, but without effect. It appears that Col. Crawley, having contrived to obtain the sanction of his superior officer, cannot be punished for the death of Lilley by any military law. It does seem, however, that he has been guilty of conduct for which a Court-martial might certainly award fitting punishment, and for which he cannot plead the sanction of his superiors. As to the more heinous crime with which he stands charged, Colonel Crawley might safely be left to the civil law.

Mr. Gregory's motion for the opening of the Edinburgh Botanical Gardens on Sundays, though it was defeated, gave warning of future success in that direction. The Sabbatarians in general were silent, feeling that by speaking they would run the risk of defeat; those who spoke against the motion opposed it avowedly on no other ground than that the Scotch generally would not like it; and Lord Palmerston, who closed the debate, took care to guard against any suspicion that he himself shared the bigotry which he undertook to shelter from so rude an assault. The defeat of the motion by only sixteen in a House of two hundred and thirty foreshadows coming victory.

Poland has again engaged the attention of the House of Lords. The Earl of Ellenborough undertook the easy task of showing that Poland had been ill-treated, and deserved to be helped; Lord Russell had the harder duty of at once expressing warm sympathy for her sufferings, and pointing out the utter impracticability of all schemes suggested for her relief. His speech was sensible, if somewhat evasive; but it was by no means reassuring on the all-important point. It did not declare that he had never entertained, or that he had ceased to entertain, the absurd notion of proposing an armistice between insurrectionary bands of guerillas, without a Government and without any recognised status as belligerents, and the armies of him whom Europe treats as their sovereign.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, with his Royal bride, has made two public appearances this week; on Friday at Eton College, to the great satisfaction of the boys, who are as enthusiastic in their loyalty as becomes the ancient and aristocratic character of the school; and on Monday at the Guildhall, to the equal delectation of a vast assemblage of citizens and guests of the City.

The Hall had been decorated for the occasion with more than usual felicity and good taste, and the entertainment was a decided success. The absence of several of the chief officers of State, who had been invited, was much remarked upon, but it was due probably to the business which required their attendance in Parliament.

EUROPE.

At last we have some definite and precise information as to the position of the negotiations on the Polish question. Earl Russell explained to the House of Lords on Monday that no communication had yet been made by the allies to St. Petersburg, but that England and France had agreed upon certain propositions, which they had submitted to Austria for her assent. There the matter at present rests. The Austrian Government has not yet given its decision, but Lord Russell's language suggests that Austria will propose some modification of the scheme, and we may therefore assume that some days will yet elapse before the allied demands are despatched. The character of the proposition to which England and France have agreed is, probably, nearly identical with that which rumour has assigned. Earl Russell, by vindicating the plan of an armistice against the criticism of Lord Ellenborough, admitted that it formed part of his scheme; whilst his declaration, that the English Government takes its stand upon the treaties of 1815, and his emphatic repudiation of war on behalf of Poland point to a scheme which refers to Congress Poland only, and asks for it only the privileges accorded by the Treaty of Vienna. Those privileges will not satisfy the Poles. If Russia could be induced to grant, they will not be persuaded to accept such a settlement.—We have an indication of the minimum of concession with which Poland will be content in the letter of Archbishop Felinski to the Czar, written so far back as the 15th March. The Archbishop, who has been suspected by his countrymen of sympathies for Russian rule, tells the Czar plainly that the institutions granted by his Majesty are insufficient to assure the happiness of the country. Poland will not be content with an administrative autonomy, she has need of a political life. "Sire," he proceeds, "take with a strong hand the initiative in the Polish question; make Poland an independent nation, united to Russia only by the bond of your august dynasty. It is the only solution which can stay the effusion of blood and afford a solid basis for a definitive pacification." The Archbishop has assuredly asked here as little as he possibly could if he wished to maintain his position amongst his countrymen. They will have an independent Poland, or they will fall back again beneath Russian absolutism. It is not for us to condemn their determination, although it is one which makes it impossible that Europe can help them, and is, in fact, political suicide.

The Turkish despatch to St. Petersburg, on behalf of Poland, has been published. It is very apologetic in its tone. The Porte admits that it has no right to interfere, but the indefinite prolongation of the actual agitation in Poland exercises a pernicious influence on some of its provinces, and this consideration compels it to join in the desires expressed for the restoration of peace. It will not presume to indicate any measures by which that result can be effected. It relies upon the wisdom of the Czar.

Mr. Seward has pronounced upon the Polish question. Invited by France to give its co-operation to the appeals made on behalf of Poland, the American Government, flattered by the proposition, finds an insurmountable difficulty in its way. Mr. Seward goes back to the foundation of the Republic, and traces the development of the doctrine of non-intervention, "which has become a traditional policy, only to be abandoned on a pressing occasion of manifest necessity"—we translate a French translation—and, therefore, the Polish question, presenting no urgent character—that is the argument implied, although not expressed—the American Government cannot associate itself with the Governments of Europe. We must do Mr. Seward justice, it is partly out of regard for the feelings and rights of the South that he adheres, in this case, to the doctrine of non-intervention. "It would be," he says, "still less expedient to derogate from it, when a local rising, although, as we hope, transitory, deprives our Government of the advice of a part of the American people, for whom a so-grave derogation from its adopted policy would be far from indifferent." However, Mr. Seward is easy about Poland: he has entire faith in the Emperor, "who will receive the appeal of Europe with all the good-will compatible with the general welfare of the vast States, which he governs with so much wisdom and moderation." Prince Gortschakoff has not delayed an instant in expressing his great satisfaction with Mr. Seward. He is delighted to find the policy and intentions of the Emperor so well appreciated by the American people, and he expresses his warm hopes for the pacification of America.

We might almost leave the line stereotyped, "The war news from Poland is this week as contradictory and confusing as ever." There have been many telegraphic reports of engagements, principally in the Government of Kalisch on the frontier of Posen, and in parts of Lithuania. The general impression which they leave, however, is that the Russians are gaining the upper hand, Upon the Austrian and Prussian frontiers they have, indeed, very great difficulties, but in other parts of the kingdom, and even in Lithuania, every band which attempts anything more than its own maintenance, seems to experience defeat. It is quite true that the dispersed patriots unite again, but they nowhere seem to make any head. The grand uprising in Lithuania and the South of Russia was a failure. There are bands of insurgents scattered over these vast provinces, but they are condemned to think entirely of their own safety. So far to the East, indeed, as the provinces on the banks of the Volga, there have been, as the Russian papers state, persons arrested distributing revolutionary manifestoes, but any discontent upon which the authors of those manifestoes may have calculated, can have nothing to do with Poland. A very instructive account given in a letter, published in a German journal with strong sympathies for Poland, of the fate of the movement in the Governments of Mohilew and Witebsk, in which it will be remembered the Polish accounts have represented the insurrection as general, will show what has been its fate in other parts of Lithuania, from which we have not such candid reports.—The insurrection broke out on the 23rd of April; the measures of the movers were well taken; they had plenty of arms, their forces consisted principally of students at the University of Moscow and the higher schools, and of the nobility. At first all went well; they obliged the troops, in the first few engagements they had with them, to lay down their arms, but the Government sent instructions through the Popes—the Greek priests—to the peasants to seize the nobles and proprietors, and deliver them, chained, offering a reward of three roubles ahead. The peasants at once assembled, and set to work to execute these instructions. In a few days not a single proprietor or his manager remained in the country. Those the peasants did not take, fled. And the insurgents, after two or three encounters with the peasants, fled too. The story comes from a Polish source; we do not guarantee its correctness, but it has an air of verisimilitude.

The Russian Government has apparently convinced itself that its Polish functionaries have been playing it false. It must be remembered that at the commencement of the year there were only eight Russians employed in the administration of Poland. It has arrested the Procurator-General Wolowski, and several more of the highest functionaries.

According to some reports, great agitation prevails in Finland; the students of Helsingfors and the municipalities of that and other cities have refused to sign addresses of devotion to the Emperor. According to other accounts, Finland is perfectly satisfied, and as eager for the suppression of the insurrection as the rest of the Empire. It appears certain, however, that the Russian Government is strengthening the fortifications of the towns along the Gulf, not so much, probably, to resist a rising of the Fins as an invasion of the Swedes, prompted by France.

The new elections to the Corps Legislatif, rendered necessary by the failure of any one candidate to obtain an absolute majority, take place on Sunday and Monday next. It is supposed that in most cases they will result in the return of an Opposition candidate.

The Archbishop of Tours has replied to the circular of the Minister of Public Worship, rebuking the Bishops who published the advice to the electors, to which we referred last week, in a very trenchant letter, in which he treats the minister with very little ceremony.

To relieve the public anxiety which the prolonged resistance encountered at Puebla has occasioned, the Moniteur has published a statement to the effect that the troops were amply supplied with provisions, and has given a list of the stores with which they were equipped.

According to La France, large reinforcements are about to be despatched. The Moniteur has also announced that news had been received from Puebla to the 27th May, at which date the health of the army was excellent. There is evidently some error in the date. No news from Puebla to the 27th May could reach Paris by the 7th of June.

The new Prussian law, or rather ordinance against the press, has not been long in coming into operation. Six of the principal Berlin journals published a declaration to the effect that they deemed the decree unconstitutional, and what is more they proved it so. The answer of the Government came immediately in a first warning. The Municipalities are also to be gagged. That of Berlin had resolved upon an address to the King requesting a return to a constitutional state of things. Whereupon the Minister of the Interior issued an order to the Presidents of the Provinces, declaring all discussions by the municipalities upon political or constitutional questions in excess of their functions, and directing them to put a stop to such proceedings. Strictly speaking, this measure is perhaps legal. The only ray of hope for the peace of Prussia is to be found in the remarkable speech addressed by the Crown Prince to the Burgomaster of Dantzic, who, upon the occasion of the Prince's visit, had expressed his sorrow that circumstances would not permit any manifestation of public rejoicings. "I also," said the Prince, "regret that I have come here at a time when disagreement has taken place between the Government and the people, the news of which surprised me greatly. Being absent I was unaware of the ordinances which have brought about this position of affairs and took no part in the deliberations when they were resolved upon." The Prince could not well say more, and the confidence in the intentions of his father, by the expression of which he concluded his speech, was a remark due from him under the circumstances. Public feeling in Prussia is very excited, and if the Ministers go much further in their measures of repression, they may succeed in provoking the outburst which they are deliberately attempting, in the belief that it will give them the opportunity to make a clean sweep of the Constitution. It is more likely to make a clean sweep of them.

The Commission of the Diet charged to examine the Holstein question has made a report, in which it proposes the rejection of the proposition of Oldenberg—the restoration of the status quo ante 1848, and the repudiation of all the agreements and treaties of 1851-2—and the address, after a delay of a month, of a last invitation to Denmark to withdraw the patent of March, and to observe strictly the agreement of 1851, the invitation to be enforced by the menace of execution in case of refusal. In the present condition of Prussia and Europe these resolutions may, indeed, be adopted, but they will not be carried out.

Let us salute George the First, King of Greece. The protocol of the formal acceptance of the throne by the Prince was signed by the Ministers of France, Russia, Denmark and England, at the Foreign Office on Friday; and on Saturday the King of Denmark formally accepted the crown on behalf of the Prince from the Greek deputation. In announcing that acceptance, the King said he had stipulated for the annexation of the Ionian Islands, and it is probable, therefore, that much of the delay which has taken place in the settlement of the question has been caused by efforts to obtain the consent of the Great Powers to the transfer of the islands. The King gave the Prince some good advice. "Let it be your constant endeavour," he said, "to gain and preserve the love of your people; without boasting, I speak from experience when I say that in this consists the true happiness of a king." The deputation then had an audience of the King, when Admiral Kanaris, the veteran of the War of Independence, said, "As for me, Sire, I have lived long enough, after having seen this day, to exclaim with Simeon, 'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace.'" And the Prince promised to keep in mind the words of the King of Denmark, "The love of the people is my strength." The King of Denmark gave the deputation a great banquet. According to one account, the new King is to start for his kingdom at the end of the month. According to another story, which we do not, of course, believe, but give as a sample of the gossip which is always flying about in French newspapers, the young King will stay another year in Denmark to finish his studies, will marry the third daughter of the Queen of England at the end of next May, and start on the 1st of June, 1864, for Greece. What is to become of Greece in the meanwhile?

A few weeks since Cardinal Antonelli resigned in consequence of the arrest by the Papal police of a certain Chevalier Fausti, a member of his household. Fausti has just been found guilty, after a long trial, of complicity with the proceedings of the National Revolutionary Committee, and sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment.

The Diario of Havannah announces the arrival of the French steamer Daria with despatches from General Forey to the Emperor Napoleon, announcing the capture of Puebla on the 17th of May, and the unconditional surrender of General Ortega and the garrison.

General Forey is said to have captured the Mexican commander-in-chief, 23 generals, 900 officers, and 7,000 privates.

One division of the French army had started for Mexico.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, MAY 28.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The report of Committee of Supply was brought up. Mr. Walpole rose to move the omission of the words prohibiting the application of any part of the sums voted for the packet service to the satisfaction of the claims of Mr. Churchward, contractor for the packet service between Dover and Calais and Dover and Ostend. He objected that the form of this vote was altogether unusual. Questions of policy and grievances are discussed on the motion to go into Committee of Supply. The sole business of the Committee is to fix the sums which shall be given to the crown for the service of the year.—Mr. Gladstone said that the House ought to consider principles rather than usage; and that Mr. Walpole's strict adhesion to precedent savoured of political superstition. He remarked that Mr. Churchward's contract had been made on condition that Parliament should vote the money; and that if Parliament did not vote the money, no wrong would be done to Mr. Churchward. After an animated discussion the House divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question." Ayes 205; Noes 191. Government majority, 14. The effect of the vote is to deprive Mr. Churchward of his remedy at law.

Mr. Gladstone then moved and carried his proposal to tax all railway traffic at 3½ per cent. instead of taxing at 5 per cent., and excepting trains running at the lowest class of fares.

FRIDAY, MAY 29.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

On the order for going into Committee of Supply. Mr. Gregory reviewed at some length the present condition of Turkey and her dependencies, and the policy adopted by her Majesty's Ministers in upholding an empire that was in the last stage of decrepitude and decay. Constantly recurring insurrections on the one hand and threatened massacres on the other were but the premonitory symptoms of an impending dissolution; and in anticipation of that event speedily and inevitably taking place, he urged upon Ministers the duty of following such a course with regard to Turkey as would render the break up as innocuous as possible, so that England would not be found fighting in behalf of Mohammedan barbarism as it is against Christian civilization as it might be. The honourable gentleman concluded by moving for papers.—A long discussion followed.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the whole hope of attaining really satisfactory results with a view to European, Christian, or any other human interest in the East, must depend in a principal degree on the existence of a thoroughly good understanding between England and France; and it would be the duty of Her Majesty's Government by every endeavour in their power to uphold the civil and political privileges of the Christian, whilst not forgetting the Mussulman subjects of the Ottoman Empire, at the same time that they were loyal to their treaty engagements with the Porte. He should not be sorry if the declarations made in the course of the present debate had the effect of proving that, whatever had been said by British Ministers to the Porte upon the subject was but the faithful expression of the feelings which were entertained by the House of Commons, and the people they represented.—After some remarks from Mr. Darby Griffith, the motion was withdrawn.

MONDAY, JUNE 1.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Lords met for the first time after the Whitsuntide recess. Lord Brougham inquired whether the Government intended to legislate for the protection of life from railway accidents by reducing the maximum speed of trains?—Lord Granville replied in the negative.

In reply to a question from the Earl of Derby with reference to the late "extraordinary conduct of the British Minister to Brazil,"—Earl Russell said the papers would be laid upon the table immediately.

Lord Ebury moved an address to the Crown, praying for the appointment of a commission to consider what steps should be taken to obviate the evils complained of arising from the present compulsory and indiscriminate use of the burial service of the Church of England.—The Archbishop of Canterbury could not agree to a course, which, in his opinion, would afford an opening for a wide and extensive revision of the Liturgy. At the same time, he thought there were portions of the burial service which were open to exception. He did not see why a clergyman should be exposed to penalties for conscientiously objecting to read the burial service over the body of a person who had died in the open avowal of disbelief in the truths of Christianity. For his own part, nothing would induce him to comply in such a case, and he would prefer incurring the risk of any proceedings that might be taken against him.—After some discussion the motion was withdrawn.

MONDAY, JUNE 1.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In reply to a question from Lord J. Manners, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that an arrangement had been come to (subject to the approval of Parliament) for the purchase of the interest of the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851 in the site of the present building for £120,000, and for the purchase of the building itself (less the annexes) for £80,000.

In answer to a question from Mr. Hopwood, Sir R. Peel said there was reason to believe that a great many young men in Ireland had been induced by their friends in the Federal States, at the instance of the Federal Government, to take passage for America, with the intention of enlisting in the army. The Government of her Majesty were making inquiries, and would do all in their power to put an end to the practice.

On the order for going into Committee of Supply, Mr. John Abel Smith called the attention of the Under-Secretary for War and of the House to the report of the Patriotic Fund, and the causes of the resignation of the majority of the members of the ladies' committee of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum; also to the circumstance that one girl had been burned to death while undergoing a sentence of solitary confinement, that another of sixteen had been flogged in the establishment, and that the act had been condoned by the executive committee.—The Marquis of Hartington having, on the part of the War-office, repudiated all control over the institution in question,—Sir J. Pakington (one of the royal commissioners, and a member of the executive committee of the "Asylum") offered some explanations, in the course of which he said that the majority of the ladies' committee had resigned because the executive committee refused to dismiss the lady superintendent and the chaplain. A resolution was, however, passed by the committee to the effect that they disapproved and regretted the conduct of the lady superintendent and the chaplain. They also disapproved the whipping of the girl, and had taken steps to prevent the recurrence of such a punishment.

After the Speaker resumed the chair, a Bill for the enforcement of the Treaty in reference to the Slave Trade recently concluded with the United States was read a second time; Lord Palmerston complimenting the Federal Government on the "honourable and liberal" manner in which it had conducted the negotiation.

The House soon afterwards adjourned, at twenty minutes to two.

TUESDAY, JUNE 2.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Whalley moved that the House should go into Committee to consider the Act by which the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth receives a grant from the Consolidated Fund, with a view to its repeal. After a short discussion the motion was negatived—100 to 198.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 3.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Somes moved the second reading of his Bill for the suppression of the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sundays, by closing public-houses during the whole of that day. The Bill was supported by Mr. Pease, Mr. Baines, Mr. Horsfall, Mr. Lawson, (teetotaler), Sir Hugh Cairns, and some other gentlemen, chiefly on Sabbatarian grounds.—Sir George Grey, and a number of other gentlemen opposed it, on the ground that it would cause great irritation, and inflict great inconvenience on the working classes.—Mr. Wykeham Martin quoted from the letter of a clergyman the very sensible remark, that "public-houses are the cellars of the poor," who cannot keep beer or other liquors in a wholesome state at home. On a division the Bill was lost by an immense majority.—Ayes 103; noes 278.

THURSDAY, JUNE 4.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

No business of interest was done.

THURSDAY, JUNE 4.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Crawford asked whether any compensation had been demanded for the capture of the schooner Will-o'-the-Wisp, seized by Federal cruisers in Mexican waters, and released by the Prize Court at Key West.—Mr. Layard said that there was no proof that the vessel was seized in Mexican waters. The Government of the United States had declined to give compensation, pointing out that, from the refusal of the Court at Key West to do so, an appeal lay to the Supreme Court.—Mr. Crawford said the vessel was released as having been seized in Mexican waters.—Mr. Layard understood that she had been released because, having been charged with having on board munitions of war, the gunpowder which she carried was not under the special circumstances of the case held to come under that category.

Mr. Tollemache complained that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had declared that the Holyhead Harbour Committee was so unfairly constituted that the Government could pay no respect to any conclusions at which it might arrive. He requested the right hon. gentleman to move that he (Mr. Tollemache) be discharged from the Committee, and promised to second the motion.—Colonel Pennant followed with a similar complaint.—Mr. Gladstone said that he had meant nothing personally discourteous towards the members of the Committee, but that he did not think it fairly constituted.—Mr. H. Herbert said that in that case the Government ought to have proposed a different Committee, instead of agreeing to that proposed, and then using insulting language in regard to its constitution.—Mr. Gladstone complained of the word "insulting."—Mr. Herbert offered to quote the words, but the Speaker ruled that this could not be done.—Mr. Gladstone declared that he had no intention of giving offence or pain to any one.—Colonel French vindicated the Committee.—Mr. Disraeli said that, if Government did not approve the names proposed, they ought to have suggested others.—Mr. Hennessey said that the Committee having been appointed by the House, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was precluded by the rules from impugning the decision of the House without moving to rescind it.—Mr. Bright said that the warmth displayed seemed to indicate that the Committee was not fairly constituted. He had often heard the fairness of Committees appointed by Government called in question.—Lord John Manners said that this was done when attempts were made to obtain a differently constituted Committee; but no such attempt had been made in this case.—The Speaker here interposed, and finally succeeded in closing the discussion.

On the order for going into Committee on the Volunteers' Bill, Mr. Bagwell complained that Ireland was excluded from the provisions. He moved an amendment, permitting the formation of Volunteer Corps in Ireland.—Major Knox expressed doubts of the loyalty of the Irish Catholics, for which he was rebuked by Sir De Lacy Evans.—The Marquis of Hartington (Under-Secretary of War) said that Government did not distrust the loyalty of the Irish, but were afraid that the bitterness of their religious animosities would render them too likely to turn their arms against each other.—Colonel French declared that the Government might rely on the loyalty and discretion of the Irish.—Lord Palmerston replied that he did not doubt the loyalty of the Irish, and had only too lively a faith in their pugnacity. He thought that they might use the arms intrusted to them for purposes for which they were not intended, and therefore he should oppose the amendment. After some further debate the amendment was negatived, and the House went into Committee. After a searching examination of its clauses, the Bill passed through Committee. The House resumed, and went into Committee on the Civil Service Estimates. Several votes were passed; some further business was transacted, and the House adjourned at twenty minutes to two.

FRIDAY, JUNE 5.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

No business of interest was transacted.

FRIDAY, JUNE 5.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Several questions were asked in regard to the Ionian Islands, extracting from Lord Palmerston no important information.

A debate took place on a motion of Mr. Baillie Coclaine for the appointment of a permanent Commissioner of Public Works, which was resisted by the Government and eventually withdrawn.

Mr. Fortescue called attention to the case of Sergeant Major Lilley, confined in his quarters in India, as were two other sergeant majors of the 6th Dragoons, by order of Colonel Crawley, on a charge of conspiracy in regard to evidence to be given at a Court-martial then pending. Those three men were confined in close arrest for several weeks, although such arrest was never resorted to except in very extreme and exceptional cases, and although the Articles of War expressly provided that no man should be kept in confinement for more than eight days without the sanction of a court-martial. The result was that one of them was transferred to a hospital a raving maniac, and that another of them, namely, Sergeant Major Lilley, was taken ill after four weeks' confinement, and that he died in the course of a few hours. After a post-mortem examination, the surgeon by whom he had been attended declared that his death had been produced by apoplexy, induced by a sedentary position, and by the peculiar and painful circumstances in which he was placed. It was no wonder that the surgeon should have described these circumstances as "peculiar." The man was confined to a single room in a bomb-proof building, and which was more like an oven than a human habitation. That room was shared by him and his wife. Outside of it a sentry was at first placed; but when Colonel Crawley discovered that she had held some communication with a visitor, he ordered, with an inhumanity which could hardly be credited, that the sentry should remain inside the building; and in his presence the poor woman, who was dying at the time, had to perform all the functions of nature. He (Mr. Fortescue) understood that Colonel Crawley pleaded ignorance of the latter circumstance; but it was shown upon evidence that it had been distinctly brought under his notice, and that he then used language which he (Mr. Fortescue) would not attempt to repeat. An endeavour had been made by Colonel Crawley to show that the death of Sergeant Major Lilley had resulted from the excessive use of intoxicating drinks; and Sir Hugh Rose had been led to believe in the truth of that statement, and had given it general currency in his remarks on the subsequent court-martial. Colonel Crawley relied for the truth of that allegation on the fact that large quantities of wine and spirits had been sent to the room in which Lilley was confined. But it was clearly proved by incontestable evidence that the wine and spirits were ordered by her medical adviser for the use of Mrs. Lilley, who was dying of consumption. He trusted that, though it was too late for reparation, it was not too late for punishment.—Mr. Coningham supported Mr. Fortescue.—The Marquis of Hartington pointed out that, as Colonel Crawley had taken the pleasure and obeyed the orders of his superior officers, it was not possible to punish him for what has taken place. A pension would be given to Sergeant Major Lilley's relatives.—Mr. Alderman Sidney expressed his dissatisfaction with this explanation.—Colonel Barttelot, observing that the speech of Lord Hartington would be read in India with some regret, said Colonel Crawley was anxious and willing to meet the charges against him in every particular. There were many circumstances connected with the court-martial which were not known, and Colonel Crawley should not be condemned unheard.—Mr. Sergeant Pigott regretted that Colonel Barttelot, in alleging that Colonel Crawley was not to blame, had not told the House who was to blame for acts that were not denied. He hoped there would be an inquiry, and that whoever was to blame would not escape punishment.

After a few remarks by Captain Archdall and Mr. Headlam, the discussion terminated, and the House went into a Committee of Supply upon the remaining Civil Service Estimates. Several votes were passed. The remaining orders were disposed of, and the House was counted out at half-past two.

MONDAY, JUNE 8.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Earl of Ellenborough, in asking whether the progress of the negotiations with respect to Poland was such as to afford the prospect of a satisfactory settlement, observed that he did not think the question was in any sense premature, seeing that the revolution which the Emperor of Russia had ordered to be put down in ten days had now lasted four months, and whilst diplomacy was busy Poland was the scene of a most cruel and frightful war. This result had been brewing for the last thirty years; for the Poles had not only been deprived of their rights, but so oppressed as to be driven into rebellion. In 1815 diplomatists had a very different state of things to deal with. Russia had then just performed great services to Europe, and her influence might be said to be paramount. Now, however, that influence and the dread of Russian designs upon Western civilization had been dissipated; and further than that, it was not desirable to lower her legitimate position. It was as the friend of Russia, then, quite as much as the friend of Poland, that he hoped the present state of things would be put an end to, and that the question would be arranged by restoring to Poland a constitutional government. To effect this perfect confidence must be brought about between the Poles and their foreign despotic ruler; but hitherto there had been no attempt to do that; on the contrary, we had seen only a series of the most violent acts of despotism perpetrated. He hoped, however, that it was not utterly impossible to establish that confidence and obtain guarantees for the good government of Poland. But there was only one course by which to effect this twofold object, and he trusted that Russia would return to a wiser policy, and offer to create a kingdom of Poland under the sceptre of one of the members of the Imperial family. He understood that her Majesty's Ministers, in concert with France and Austria, were urging an armistice; but an armistice was totally incompatible with the existing state of things; and if the Poles laid down their arms, how were they to resume them, supposing they were not satisfied with the arrangements of the diplomatists? for diplomacy had little weight unless there was strength to back it. His advice to the Poles, therefore, was that they should persevere, and not abandon their arms. They had risen in despair, and if they persevered they would either effect their object or earn the respect of the civilized world.—Earl Russell said it was hardly consistent with his position to enter into the details of the question put to him by the noble earl. The Russian Government had replied to the notes of the Three Powers at great length, especially to that of Great Britain, and alleged that as the Powers had offered no suggestion Russia was placed in an unsatisfactory position. Consequent upon this the English and French Governments had decided upon offering a suggestion, which they communicated to the Austrian Government on Saturday last, and a reply was expected from Vienna on Wednesday. This being the case it was not expedient for him to enter further into the nature of the agreement which the French and English Governments had arrived at. With regard to restoring the kingdom of Poland, the difficulties in the way of accomplishing that object were such as in 1815 to completely baffle all the efforts of Lord Castlereagh. No doubt an armistice could not be easily carried out; but humanity and policy alike dictated that the ruthless and terrible war now raging in Poland should be speedily put an end to, for it would be impossible for diplomacy to do anything so long as the country was the scene of such a struggle. He believed, indeed, that an armistice must be the first step to any useful or satisfactory negotiations, and the noble earl should remember that England was a party to the Treaty of Vienna, and was bound, therefore, to propose those terms only that were in accordance with that treaty. It was not her duty by herself to propose the restoration of the kingdom of Poland, but to endeavour to obtain the concurrence of the other Powers as to the best settlement that they could mutually devise. Under these circumstances he entreated the forbearance of their lordships until the result of the step which had just been taken was known, lest a question already surrounded with difficulties might be still further complicated.—The debate was continued by the Duke of Rutland, Lord Brougham, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, and Lord Denman.—Earl Grey said that in his opinion any diplomatic interference, if it were understood that it would not be followed up by force, would only aggravate the evils that prevailed, and as intervention by arms was not contemplated, the less they interfered with advice the better. The subject then dropped.

The Duke of Somerset moved the second reading of the Prisons Ministers Bill, which was opposed by Lord Berners.—Lord Derby said his opinion of the policy and justice of the Bill was so strong, that however much he lamented to differ from many of his friends, he felt bound to give a vote in its favour. Having appealed to the life-long support he had given to the Established Church as a proof that he would not consent to any measure mischievous to its interest, he denied that the Bill was the commencement of placing the Roman Catholic Church on an equality with the national Establishment, or of endowing the Church of Rome in this country. The state of the law was unjust to Roman Catholic prisoners, and was only rendered not intolerable by the good sense of the magistrates, who proprio motu allowed prisoners to send for ministers of their own persuasion. Considering, however, the previous lives of prisoners they were not likely to avail themselves of this permission; and the natural consequence was, that Roman Catholic prisoners, unless they themselves sent for a priest, obtained no ministrations of any clergyman whatever. He could not for one moment admit a proposition of Lord Berners, that, because the teaching of Roman Catholicism was considered erroneous, therefore no Roman Catholic chaplain should be provided; because, whatever he might think of the errors of the Roman Catholic Church, there was no doubt that the ministrations of that Church were alone acceptable to those who believed in it. He exposed the injustice of advocating the course that Roman Catholic priests, if allowed to attend their co-religionists, should do so without payment, and concluded by again referring to the sacrifice it cost him to differ from so many of his friends.—After some further debate, in which the Bill was opposed by the Bishop of London, the second reading was carried—content, 65; not content, 30. Their lordships adjourned at a quarter to nine.

MONDAY, JUNE 8.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Gregory moved a resolution that the Royal Botanical Gardens of Edinburgh should be open to the public after the hours of Divine service on Sundays, as is the case of other botanical gardens supported by Parliamentary grants. Among other arguments in support of the motion, he urged the success that had attended the experiment elsewhere. He mentioned facts which showed the manner in which signatures had been obtained to a petition against the proposal.—The Lord-Advocate opposed the motion, on the ground that there was no necessity for a measure that would give offence to a large portion of the community in Scotland. He pointed out distinctions between the cases of the Dublin and Edinburgh gardens.—Mr. Stirling supported the motion. He admitted that a large majority of the clergy of Scotland opposed the proposal, but he did not believe that they represented the intelligent opinion of the laity. He stated additional facts, showing the "scandalous" mode in which petitions were got up. The resolution was supported by Mr. G. Duff, and opposed by Mr. Black and Mr. Kinnaird.—Mr. Mure likewise opposed the motion, concurring with the Lord-Advocate that the great preponderance of public opinion in Scotland was against the measure, and that there was no necessity for it.—Major Hamilton testified that the feeling of the people of Edinburgh, high and low, was against the opening of the gardens on Sundays.—After some observations by Mr. Scully, Lord Palmerston said, although he could see no harm, but good, in the measure proposed by Mr. Gregory, there was another consideration which ought to guide the House—namely, the religious, sincere, and honest feeling of the people of Scotland, to which they ought not, he thought, to do violence without very powerful reasons. Now, the feeling of the people of Scotland was said to be against the opening of the gardens on Sundays, and the Lord-Advocate had shown that there was no necessity for the measure.

Upon a division, the resolution was negatived by 123 to 107.

The House then went into Committee on the Civil Service Estimates, and was counted out at about a quarter past eight.

TUESDAY, JUNE 9.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Earl of Carnarvon moved the second reading of the Bill, sent up from the Commons, for flogging persons guilty of robbery with violence. He pointed out that whipping had proved an effectual cure for crimes of other descriptions, and expressed a strong conviction that it would prove equally salutary to the garrotter.—Lord Cranworth vehemently opposed the Bill, which he stigmatized as a return to the barbarous usages of former times. He thought that no judge would pass sentence under this law.—Lord Wodehouse defended the measure.—Lord Granville opposed it strongly; but, seeing that the opposition benches were crowded, he recommended that it should be read a second time without a division, which was done. The House soon afterwards adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 9.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Lord Clarence Paget, in reply to an inquiry from Mr. Addington, stated the circumstances under which a French vessel had been detained by her Majesty's ship Zebra, off the Congo, on the African coast, in the month of February last. It appeared that the detention was caused by the Frenchman, being in a suspicious position, refusing to display his colours when summoned to do so by the captain of the Zebra, and declining to produce his papers. The vessel was then sent under charge of an officer and crew to Sierra Leone for adjudication by the Admiralty Court, when the French consul produced her papers and apologised for the behaviour of his captain. No demand had been made for compensation for the capture and detention of the suspected slaver.

Mr. Buxton moved a resolution to the effect that, in the opinion of the House, the subscription required from the clergy to the Thirty-Nine Articles and to the Prayer-book ought to be relaxed. He argued that the subscription was unnecessary and mischievous, and that it did violence to the consciences of many scrupulous men. The question was one essentially for the laity (as represented by Parliament) to deal with, and it was their duty to relieve the clergy from what they felt to be a grievous burden, and to open the way to the Church of England for many who were now excluded.—Mr. Monckton Milnes moved an amendment to limit Mr. Buxton's resolution to the subject of subscription to the Prayer-book. In adopting this suggestion the House would not, he said, derogate from the integrity of the Church of England, or damage her power or influence, but would do a simple political right in expiation of a political wrong.—Sir George Grey saw many grave objections to adopting either the suggestion of Mr. Buxton or that of Mr. Milnes. He was not, however, prepared to say that the present law might not be amended without inflicting injury upon the interests of the Church of England. In his opinion the law was not satisfactory, because it imposed obligations upon clergymen which might be met by a simple declaration. No change ought, however, to be introduced without the most careful inquiry into the subscriptions now required, the object to be attained by a change, and the nature of the relaxation to be effected. Believing that both the motion and the amendment would only create uncertainty and unreasonable expectations with regard to the length to which Parliament might be disposed to go on this subject, he would suggest that the amendment should be withdrawn, in which case he would move "the previous question" to the original motion.—The amendment was withdrawn, and Sir George Grey moved "that that question (Mr. Buxton's) be now put." This is the means by which an inconvenient subject is shelved—the mover voting, of course, that the question be not put.—Mr. Newdegate expressed his regret that the Government had not taken a more decided course on this subject, for the motion of Mr. Buxton would, if adopted, give far greater latitude of teaching to the clergy. The subscription to which exceptions were taken were the security to the laity that when they went to church they should hear the doctrines of their Church faithfully expounded.—Mr. Walpole warned the House how it tampered with those safeguards under which the Church of England had grown up to be the most pure and tolerant establishment in the world.—Mr. Morrison supported, and Sir Stafford Northcote opposed, the motion.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer defended the retention of the subscriptions, which he said had grown up out of the real bona fide necessity of the Church from the time of the Reformation.—The debate was continued by Mr. Hadfield and Mr. Butler Johnstone, who supported the motion, and by Mr. Lefroy, who opposed it.—Mr. Henley would have been better satisfied if the Government had met the motion with a direct negative, because although the Chancellor of the Exchequer had eloquently argued against change, the public out of doors would gather from the speech of the Secretary of the Home Department that the Administration was not opposed to some alteration.—Mr. H. D. Seymour was of opinion that, in moderate times like these, it would be desirable to do away with tests which had been opposed in an epoch of great excitement. That such tests were not necessary was proved by the history of the Episcopal Church in America, where declarations were used in lieu of them.—Lord R. Cecil thought that the reason why young men were not entering the Church as heretofore was to be traced to causes far deeper than an objection to subscribe the Articles—namely, an objection to the Articles themselves. There could be no doubt but that there was an intellectual movement against the truths in which the Articles were enshrined, and that higher minds of the day were casting about for something to believe. He did not regard the subscription as an obstacle to Episcopal ordination, and therefore he would vote for its retention.—Mr. Disraeli said the Government, in moving the previous question, had consented to a course which conveyed an implied assent that there were grounds for the House to consider the desirability of making some alteration in the existing law. He disapproved of this attempt to tamper with the ancient documents of the Church. There was nothing in the constitution which could not be cancelled, at, questioned, and "improved;" but he feared that if these assaults were made upon the safeguard of the Church the result would be to sap the foundations of that edifice of public rights and liberties which had been built up with so much pains and consolidated at so much cost. If there was to be inquiry at all, the proper course would be to appoint a Royal Commission, who could submit the result of their deliberations to Convocation and ultimately to Parliament. For his own part, he preferred rather to stand upon the ancient landmarks of the Church than to lend himself to the new and dangerous philosophy indicated by the motion of Mr. Buxton.

After a few remarks from Sir G. Bowyer, the House resolved "that the question be not now put."

A short discussion subsequently took place on the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, after which the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 10.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Ward Hunt moved the second reading of a Bill to prevent the withdrawal of election petitions without cause shown; which, after some debate, was agreed to. No other business of interest was discussed.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, June 10.

Our market, during the last week, has been quite devoid of animation, and the tendency has been towards lower prices.

On Thursday the sales reached 5,000 bales, and on Friday 4,000; a very heavy import had again swelled our stock to 370,000 bales, and prices were rather easier.

On Saturday the business again reached 4,000 bales without material change.

On Monday a like amount was again sold at rather lower prices.

Yesterday business was almost at a stand-still, the sales only reaching 2,000 bales, with a very desponding tone in the market.

To-day 5,000 bales have been sold at the low prices of yesterday.

We quote Middling Orleans 22½d., Fair Egyptian 21d., Fair Dhollerah 18d., and Fair Sawginned Dharwar 19d.

The main cause of the depression at present existing in our market is the uncertainty regarding the issue of the struggle now going on in the West, and the fear that Vicksburg may fall and cotton be lost in quantity.

The last accounts, however, read more favourable to the Confederate cause; the garrison at Vicksburg had severely repulsed the attacking force, and appeared in a position to hold their ground till reinforcements should arrive.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, June 9.

The amount of business effected in this market during the past week has been on the most limited scale, owing to the suspense which has taken hold of people's minds with reference to the ability of the Confederates to hold Vicksburg against General Grant's attacking forces, and various are the surmises as to the effect on this market, in case the Federals should carry their point in that quarter, there being a general impression here that a considerable quantity of cotton would be brought to New Orleans for shipment to Europe, through the Mississippi being open to the Federals for a time, but whether there are to be 100,000 bales or 1,000,000, no one can tell, all sorts of guesses being prevalent. Besides this, there is another matter which has affected our market very materially, and that is the large imports of cotton into Liverpool from all parts during the past week, amounting to about 80,000 bales.

The latest news from Vicksburg, per the America, via Cape Race, stating that the Federals were entrenching themselves, does not look very like the Federals taking Vicksburg, and in case they are driven back, we shall have a re-action in the state of feeling here, and a better business doing, but meantime, we must await further intelligence from the other side of the Atlantic.

Grey cloths have been very quiet all the week, but prices remain very steady, there being no stocks held, and manufacturers generally being well in order, with contracts taken some four or five weeks back.

Continental shipping yarns are quiet, but prices are firm, with no disposition shown to give way at all in value.

India mules and home trade yarns are the weakest, and to-day they might have been obtained at ½d. per lb. reduction on last week's quotations.

Pending the next steamer's news our market is almost stagnant.

THE GULF DEPARTMENT.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, May 12.

We left Banks's army at Alexandria in quiet occupation, i.e., the occupation of collecting cotton. The arrival of Farragut here led us to believe that, so far as operations were concerned at and near Alexandria, all was finished for the present, and that there would be no effort made to extend the Federal lines north or west of that point. We naturally look next to Port Hudson. We have not heard from Banks for four days, but I shall be much mistaken if he has not come down Red River with the larger part of his men on transports, and there is scarcely a doubt but that he will land at Bayou Sara to-night or to-morrow. It is but a short distance above Port Hudson. Dudley, with 4,000 or 5,000 men, is ready to advance up from Baton Rouge, and there are the two gunboat fleets—Porter's above and Farragut's below. Moreover, a portion of Grant's army, which, since the Grand Gulf affair, is supposed to be marching towards Vicksburg, can be brought down to the scene in transports, and can assist in the reduction of Port Hudson.

Meanwhile stirring events have happened in the vicinity of Vicksburg, and at Fredericksburg; but these things reach you from New York. Indeed, we are as far from Virginia, when we get the news by mail from New York, as you are; but now and then a stray copy of the Jackson (Mississippi) Appeal gets through the lines, with a telegraphic summary of news from the North. One of these Appeals readily commands from fifty to 100 dollars at either of the newspaper offices. But it must be terribly emasculated, if it contains bad news for the Federals, before an "extra" can be issued, and sometimes the paper must be submitted to the Federal authorities; for we have neither freedom of the press nor freedom of speech, now that the city is in the hands of United States' officers, and under martial law.

The Provost Marshal has to-day issued an order compelling the places of public resort and St. Charles and the city hotels to display the United States' flag; and all places of public amusement, where there is an orchestra, will be compelled to play the United States' national airs at the opening and close of each performance. This will have the effect of closing the places of amusement; or else "orchestras" will be difficult matters to find in New Orleans.

The "registered enemies" who are to go through the lines into the Confederacy on the 15th instant, have received permission to form themselves into parties of sixty and more, and to charter vessels to go across the Lake, or up the river, to any of the points designated in the order of the Provost Marshal. Small favours are, proverbially, thankfully received, and 'tis of them. I shall be much surprised if there is not a demonstration on the day of their departure—an immense gathering of sympathizers and friends, for, as yet, there has been no order issued against leavetakings, or gatherings on the Levee and at the Lake for friendly farewells to those who are going into "Dixie."

It is reported that an order will be issued soon to prevent physicians from leaving the city, on account of the apprehended approach of the yellow fever. As yet the city is comparatively healthy, but there is much sickness among the unacclimated soldiers.

Soon after Butler's arrival in New Orleans, to make up in some degree for the deficiency in his forces, he commenced the organization of negro regiments. These regiments were to do guard duty, and occupy posts, thus enabling Butler to bring all his white regiments into the field. After weeks of work in the way of recruiting and gathering in idle free blacks and runaway slaves, two regiments were raised, and the nucleus of a third, which is "recruiting"—as it is facetiously called—to this day. The blacks were clothed in the United States' uniform, armed, drilled mainly by half-drilled coloured sergeants and line officers—the blind leading the blind, blacks drilling and driving blacks, and they were stationed along the line of the Opelousas railroad, from Algiers, opposite the city, to Berwick's Bay.

Just before Christmas time, I went over the road, and saw these "regiments." Their excellent drill and discipline, good order, subordination, and so on, had been profusely praised in Northern Abolition journals, published a thousand or fifteen hundred miles from the nearest negro camp. It was desirable to see these model soldiers through the medium of one's own eyesight, rather than through such very farsighted spectacles. The train left Algiers at 10 A.M., and after running half a dozen miles we came to the first squad of negroes, who were cooking breakfast at a fire beside the track. They drew up awkwardly and presented arms to the train. Soon another squad—also cooking breakfast; and, in brief, as we dragged along in the slow train, reaching Lafourche crossing, near Thibodeaux, at 3 P.M., wherever there was a company or half company of blacks they were cooking and eating something—their rations, a trapped coon, or a stolen chicken or turkey.

That was their idea of military life—wearing good clothes and shoes, "guarding" and cooking something, presenting arms to passing trains, setting coon traps, robbing all the hen-roosts within five miles, debauching the negro girls on the plantations, demoralizing and making discontented the negro labourers by loafing about the estates, and "putting on airs," and by generally making themselves more of a nuisance than the wildest fanatic could possibly desire. At this time the whole district was in Federal hands. There was a camp of some 4,000 men under Weitzel at Lafourche Crossing, and all the plantations along the line of the road had been abandoned or confiscated. The few places which were making sugar were doing so under Government, that is, Butler's agents, or had been let for the season to Northern adventurers. The labour consisted of the few negroes who had not run away and joined the camp-kettle brigade, and who were willing to stay for their food and a small monthly pay. The agents and adventurers complained bitterly of the "nigger regiments," and said that it would be impossible to make a crop while these vagabonds in uniform were in the vicinity of the plantations.

Northern men, of all other Americans, are the most bitter in their intense prejudices against negroes. An out-and-out Abolitionist feels a positive disgust whenever he sees a negro, always excepting that beautiful ideal black of coloured literature. As Weitzel's men were nearly all from New England, they were particularly "worked up" about the close proximity of the "Native Guards," and the officers were by no means nice in expressing their opinions of that branch of the Federal service. This combined pressure of plantation-workers and white regiments, induced General Banks to remove the negroes from the Lafourche district.

He did this soon after his arrival to supersede Butler in the command of the Department, sending one regiment of them to Baton Rouge, and the other to Ship Island to relieve a white regiment in guarding the political prisoners. We were in hopes that we were rid of them. They are worthless to the Federal Government, except as they add to the gains of the Government's friends, the contractors, by eating rations and wearing out shoes and "shoddy." The third regiment, so long raising, was looked upon as a mere resort for straggling runaways, and we supposed here that the nigger regiment business was suspended.

But no. Within a few days, General Banks has issued an order proposing "the organization of Corps d'Armée of coloured troops, to be designated as the Corps d'Afrique." "It will consist ultimately," says the order, "of eighteen regiments, representing all arms,—infantry, cavalry, artillery—making nine brigades of two regiments each, and three divisions of three brigades each, with appropriate corps of engineers, and flying hospitals for each division. Appropriate uniforms, and the graduation of pay to correspond with the value of services, will be hereafter awarded."

This, then, is the scheme—These regiments, if they are ever raised, must be composed of the plantation slaves, which now know the use of nothing but the hoe, and who are to be drilled, armed, and instructed in the art of war. There are objections and obstacles, besides the stupidity of the black to overcome. Thus, with regard to the coloured regiments already raised, Banks, in his order says of the officers—"their discipline has been lax, and in some cases the conduct of their regiments unsatisfactory and discreditable. Controversies unnecessary and injurious to the service have arisen between them and other troops." Nor do I know how General Banks can conscript slaves in the "occupied" districts of the State, which are exempted in Lincoln's proclamation of emancipation, while in the unoccupied districts neither Banks nor the Proclamation can have any effect whatever.

We will assume, however, that there is no difficulty in collecting the proposed number of negroes from the free coloured and the runaways. A second-rate New York lawyer, called by courtesy and a commission from Washington a General, is already here with a large number of able officers, to organize and take charge of this corps d'Afrique. The Government organ in this city says, editorially, that "from the commencement of the rebellion the best strategic minds of Europe have constantly suggested the arming of slaves as the most effective movement towards its suppression." Moreover, many articles in the leading Abolition journals of the North have been for months preparing the public mind there for a renewal of the horrors of St. Domingo at the South, under the sanction of Federal authority.

This proposition of Banks to raise the corps d'Afrique tears away the last shred of the flimsy veil which covers the purposes so piously presented to the world by the President of the United States. It is a farce to suppose that there is any desire to "restore to the Union" a people whose slaves are first stolen and then armed to murder their masters. It means that the South is not to be "conciliated," but exterminated. It is, moreover, a frightful, but, to the Federal Government, a most humiliating confession, that the white North, with its immense preponderance of population and means, after two years' hard fighting, has been unable to conquer the South; and now "restoration" is to give place to revenge—legitimate warfare is to be thrown aside as unavailable, and, under the farcical programme of a corps d'Afrique, the black slaves are to be marshalled on to the murder of the whites, with all the nameless horrors attending such a march, and the South is to be wiped out of existence in fire and blood.

This may be "the suggestion of the best strategic minds of Europe;" but it is hardly probable, scarcely possible, that the civilized nations of the world will calmly look on and witness a warfare which disgraces humanity.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, June 9.

The effervescence of the elections has not yet passed off, and the Paris press still devotes the greater part of its space to their discussion or that of subjects connected with them. In a few electoral districts, the majority not having been decisive, the candidate at the head of the poll having less than one half of the votes given, a new election takes place on Sunday and Monday next. In one circumscription, when a fresh ballot takes place, the editor of the Opinion Nationale will be the liberal candidate. His success is generally considered certain, but the wordy battle rages round his name with as great activity as it did when there were nine such Richmonds in the field. French journalism is, however, a less dangerous calling than it used to be; there have been no duels, no bloodshed in consequence of the effusion of ink, and the only passage of arms to be recorded is the action brought by the France against the ministerial papers, the Constitutionnel and Pays, for defamation.

At the end of the week there were busy rumours of a meditated coup d'état to upset the Paris elections, and strange to say there were people silly enough to believe them. The Paris papers were of course silent on such reports, but in more than one it was said that the Council to be held on Saturday, for which the Emperor came from Fontainebleau, would be of more than usual importance. Any such measure was not for a moment contemplated, and the Emperor, whose claim to the confidence of France and Europe is the re-establishment and maintenance of legal order, would be the last man to listen to such a proposal. After all, the whole number of opposition members is only some twenty, and of these several owe their election to the indiscreet if not unconstitutional manifestoes of the Minister himself. It may be galling to M. de Persigny to find that he has created a Thiers instead of the cipher he intended, but there is nothing in this to give the Emperor the slightest uneasiness. Even the unanimity of the liberal elections in Paris has not the meaning which some of the English papers ascribe to it. The opposition was admirably served and thoroughly organised. The Government seemed to think that covering the walls with placards, distributing 100,000 copies a day of the Constitutionnel or the Nation, and other such devices, would ensure success. One elector received no fewer than sixty-three voting papers, all bearing the name of the same candidate; but of electioneering machinery there was none. Of the whole body of electors, one-third abstained from voting, and these are certainly not inimical to the dynasty. Thus, in the two first circumscriptions, 45,517 votes were given, of which 17,149 for the Government candidates, while there were nearly 22,000 abstentions, and the same proportions are true in all the districts. In some the abstentions would have been still more numerous, but for a letter of the Prefect of the Seine, which had the effect of sending crowds of voters to the poll on the afternoon of the second day. It was remarked to me that the Parisian may be coaxed or thrashed, but he will not be brow-beaten.

The statistics of the bills posted show more than one for each vote. The Compagnie Générale des Chiffons put up 99,600 placards; one candidate, who had 168 votes, put up 20,000, another 30,000, and a large number of the other candidates also employed their own posters. This superabundance of paper is said to have suggested a new company, which has just been formed with brilliant prospects of success. It is called the Compagnie générale des Chiffons, or Universal Rag Company. Its capital is to be £125,000, and its promoters promise a dividend of 30 per cent. on the shares. Few of your readers who have been in Paris can have failed to remark the chiffonnier about midnight plying his humble craft. With a basket slung behind his back, a lantern in his left hand, and a stick armed with a hook in his right, he may be seen bending over the heaps of rubbish thrown out for the morning dust carts. Every scrap of rag or paper which these contain is hooked out, and with a dexterous jerk deposited in his basket. He is the object of the present speculation. The company proposes not to take his place, but to purchase his gatherings, and its profits are to be found in judicious sorting and cleansing.

Few traits of modern French character are more remarkable than the avidity with which joint stock companies are received, although they are of very recent introduction in France. The general success which attends them is also in singular contrast with the fate of most of those which have been brought out in England, although they often, as in this instance, seem formed on the most trivial bases. The ultimate success is due, of course, to good management; but their popularity is owing to the passion which has seized all classes for investments in industrial pursuits. It is not the English that should be called a nation of shopkeepers.

The elections were no sooner over here than the Minister of Education and Worship published a severe admonition to seven of the bishops, who had signed a sort of opinion on the duty of all citizens to take a part in the elections. One of these prelates, the Archbishop of Tours, has sent him an animated reply ending with the following sentence:—"Your letter, M. le Ministre, will be registered by the Ecclesiastical Historian of our country, but I trust that this already too celebrated document will be preserved as the evidence of a solitary incident in the relations of the State with the Church."

In the scantiness of American news the Paris papers are generally silent on the subject. The Moniteur publishes, without comment, the series of General Banks's orders concerning registered enemies and runaway negroes. There have been reports of renewed negotiations between England and France for a joint action at Washington and Richmond, but such rumours are devoid of all foundation. The Nord publishes the text of Mr. Seward's answer on the Polish question, with an analysis of Prince Gortschakoff's reply. Nothing could be more embarrassing for the so-called liberal press than these despatches, and it will demand all the mastery in special pleading, of which its writers have often given proof, to reconcile their declamations in favour of the Union, with Mr. Seward's indifference to the sacred cause of liberty in Poland, so affectionately endorsed by Prince Gortschakoff. After urging, as they do, three empires to go to war in favour of Poland, they can hardly coincide with the American statesman in thinking that this is not one of the extreme cases to which he refers as alone justifying the expression of an opinion. The chances of an European war seem this week less threatening. The French public is little inclined to embark in such an adventure; and I heard, a few days ago, a man who knows it well, say, that if the Emperor wished to punish the electors of Paris, he had only to go to war with Russia, in compliance with the wishes of the members, they have returned. The second note, of which the terms were settled at Saturday's council, is said to be of a conciliatory character, in accordance with the draft of that which will be forwarded by Austria. The Marquis Pepoli, one of the most considerable of the Italian Liberals, and a relative of the Bonapartes, has just arrived here from St. Petersburg, where he is Minister of Italy. He may be considered a representative man of Italian liberalism, and he is said to be strongly impressed in favour of Russia, and especially of the Emperor Alexander.

The last news from America has had the effect of strengthening the prices of cotton in the Havre market.

FREEDOM UNDER THE ABOLITIONISTS.

The arrest of Mr. Vallandigham, and the other acts of violence with which it has been accompanied, have revealed the existence of another and still more surprising ingredient in this strangely compounded character. To the recklessness of Irishmen and the doggedness of purpose peculiar to Scotchmen, it now seems that they add the servility of Russians. Perhaps it is doing injustice to Russians to name them as examples of the intense disregard and contempt for liberty which is now prevalent in the North-Western States. The condition of mind which seizes in a despotism that has existed for centuries is a far milder form of servility than that which is now to be seen in the North-Western States. The most daring patriot may shrink from overthrowing an ancient form of government unless he sees some security for the character of the new institutions that are to fill the void. But a community that submits, without striking a blow, to see the most essential liberties which it had long enjoyed wrenched from it by a military officer, can have very little love of liberty left. The measure is one that strikes at personal liberty and at political liberty with the same blow. To prevent a representative from giving an account of the views he has maintained to those who selected him for the purpose of giving effect to their political opinions, is to cut off the channels through which the wishes of a people are brought to bear upon the machine of a government. To imprison a man for condemning the measures of an Administration is to destroy the one crucial distinction that marks the difference between a despotic State and a free State. And to do all this in the face of a written Constitution, by the authority of a military officer in a State that was loyal and at peace, and to do it through the agency of soldiers acting partly as policemen and partly as spies, is an aggravation of the offence which even the despotic Sovereigns of the European Continent generally contrive to avoid. The suppression of the newspapers without even the ceremony of an arrestement, and the disarming of the people, executed in plain defiance of the Constitution, are only less heinous instances of the same tyranny.—The Saturday Review.

MOLLE PATTI IN CHANCERY.—Seldom has a more curious and romantic case been brought before the Court of Chancery, than that of Patti v. Patti. Some time since a bill was filed for Mdlle. Adeline Patti, by her next friend, Mr. J. W. Macdonald, praying that the Court would appoint a guardian to protect Mdlle. Patti, and to administer her estates during her infancy. The bill averred that she was cruelly treated by her father, Salvatore Patti, and her brother-in-law, Maurice Strakosch; that she was kept from communication with her friends; that she had no control over her earnings and her jewellery; that her letters were opened; and that her marriage with Baron de Ville was opposed, &c., &c. Mr. J. W. Macdonald did not know Mdlle. Patti, but any one may act as next friend to a minor. The Bill was founded on letters written by Mdlle. Patti, and it was supported by an affidavit of Baron de Ville, Hester Day, and Sarah Eliza Elliott. To the surprise of the next friend, the reply to the Bill was an affidavit by Mdlle. Patti, in which she declares that she is in loving terms with her father and brother-in-law; that she has always been kindly treated by them; that her liberty was never controlled, that her father takes care of the bulk of her savings, and that she is satisfied with every arrangement he makes. To add to the complication, the Baron de Ville writes to a contemporary to state that the engagement has been broken off. He says, "Every one who knows me will pity Miss Patti, when she could be induced to swear that she did not believe that I entertained honourable intentions to her. Whether she was so prevailed upon, or whether she did this of her own free will, I was once determined to give up all thoughts of a person who would break off an engagement in this libellous manner. The affection at one time was sincere; but Strakosch and S. Patti, who had a monetary interest at stake, were determined it should not last." The Court of Chancery dismissed the bill, upon the application of the plaintiff.

The Appeal to Christians.

CHRISTIANS throughout the world cannot read without deep emotion the appeal addressed to them by their brethren of the Confederate States. Nearly a hundred ministers of the Gospel, bishops, heads of theological seminaries and other institutions of learning, representing all Protestant denominations of believers in Christ, and comprising in their number some of the most honoured and distinguished names in the land of the South, unite in a solemn appeal, in the name of humanity and of a common faith, against the folly and wickedness of the war waged by the Northern States. In the sight of Heaven they protest against the monstrous wrong, to master and servantalike, which is attempted by Mr. Lincoln's Proclamation, and in doing so they speak not only on behalf of fifteen hundred thousand white communicants in the Divine Sacrament, but on behalf of half a million of coloured Christians whose spiritual interests are intrusted to their keeping.

The calm dignity of tone, the moderation of language, the absence of any reference to purely political topics, the sincere resignation to the will of God, which characterize this document, cannot but be contrasted with the blasphemous utterances of the Northern pulpits, whence the murder of women and children is preached in the name of the Almighty, and His Omnipotence pledged to the work of extermination of a whole nation. To which of the two will the Christian world rather lend its ear? For upwards of thirty years the South has been the victim of such relentless and malignant calumnies, that Europe, neither caring for nor listening to any other testimony, had come to regard her as a disgrace to mankind. The Scripture assures us that "the tree is known by his fruit." By this test let us judge the South and her accusers. As individuals, the most vehement of the latter, with comparatively few exceptions, belong to that class of restless and mischievous spirits, of which the hotbed of our nineteenth century civilization has produced a rank growth, who proclaim a more or less open warfare for the subversion of social order, religious subordination, and even the relation of the sexes. Let it not be forgotten that the most frantic of the South's enemies are the woman's rights lecturers, the spirit-wrappers, those who in the garb of priests deny the divinity of Christ, those who from their pulpits cry for "an anti-slavery bible, and an anti-slavery god" as loudly as for an "anti-slavery union," and all those professors and apostles of "isms," whose alarming prevalence and authoritative voice in the national councils mark the moral degeneracy of Northern America. Even in Europe, the bitterest enemies of the South are the declared enemies of public tranquillity—those self-conceited reformers, who believe all means justified by their ends, and to whom God's Providence is too slow and His wisdom too shallow. Against such accusers the South might well appeal for a hearing. But the contrast is not less marked, when, instead of individuals, we compare the warring nations. This people, which was depicted as sunk in the lowest depth of sloth and vice, has shown virtues of courage, of self-devotion, of patient endurance, of intelligent enterprise, of daring execution, of perfect self-command, which have extorted the reluctant admiration of civilized mankind. And here, again, be it remarked, that while all other nations have written their own histories, the brief history of the Confederates, already so full of imperishable glory, has been written for them by their enemies, or at best by lukewarm neutrals. Above all, has the Confederate nation distinguished itself from its adversaries by modesty and truth, those noblest ornaments of human nature. A heartfelt, unostentatious piety has been the source whence their army and people have drawn their inspirations of duty, of honour, and of consolation. The North has produced no such man as Stonewall Jackson; and to Davis, Lee, and Longstreet, it can oppose only an Abe Lincoln, a Hooker, and a Pope. While on one side of the Potomac internal peace has never been disturbed, freedom of speech and of the press has never been impaired, and the rights of the citizens have remained sacred, though the body politic was straining in an agony of desperate self-defence; on the other side of that stream, though no enemy's foot has yet trod the soil, a military despotism taints itself by a reign of terror. Surely these are palpable facts which might weigh against unsupported slanders, whether clothed in the meretricious charms of fiction, or uttered by blasphemers of the Beecher and Cheever school.

One shudders at the fiendish chuckle with which certain presses—fortunately for the honour of British civilization they are very few in number—compute the chances of Southern extermination; how they gloat in the certainty that, despite admitted superiority in valour and in generalship, the South must at last bleed to death; how they count the thinning ranks of noble youth, whose life-blood must yet be shed before the last man sinks in defence of national independence, and the galaxy of heroic leaders who cannot be replaced as one by one they fall by the casualties of war. Is there not something indescribably revolting in these heartless calculations, which estimate human lives as though they were grains of sand by the sea-shore, and contemplate the extinction of a gallant people as though it were a swarm of noxious insects? The mere avowal of such sentiments in this age and country should convince Christian men that they have a duty to discharge, lest by their silence they become accomplices of those who entertain them. The termination of the American struggle has long since passed beyond the reach of either of the combatants. The arbitrament in the last resort must devolve upon the tribunal of civilized nations; and in a question of such magnitude, wherein all mankind have so great a stake, no one nation, least of all a nation styling itself a Great Power, can escape the responsibility by Cain's plea, that it is not its brother's keeper. A point has been reached in this contest when it ceases to be the concern only of those actually involved, and in proportion as a Government or an individual has the power to end it, is the responsibility of the consequences of the exercise or non-exercise of that power.

The statesmanship and the material interests of Great Britain have been appealed to; the faith of solemn treaties has been invoked; but heretofore, in the face of indisputable and undisputed facts, in vain. It remains to be seen whether an appeal to the consciences of Christians will have a better result, and we cannot but hope that it must, when we read over the earnest words of the Church Communities of the South. Nor is this last appeal, any more than its predecessors, an unmanly supplication for favours. Neither the statesmen, nor the clergy, nor the press, nor the people of the Confederate States have ever been, or will ever be, suppliants to men's mercy. Upon God's justice and their own efforts they have from the first relied. When they have addressed their fellow-men of other countries, they have done so in simple and modest vindication of themselves, with no intent to gain assistance, but claiming merely justice. Let that justice be done, and they may safely promise, without vain-glory, that under Divine blessing they will do the rest. As independent States, whose independence was solemnly recognised by treaties when first achieved, recognised in all their subsequent dealings with foreign States, and never forfeited by word or act, they rightly claim to be recognised now; and they have just grounds to complain that, contrary to reason and law, they should be treated as the rebellious vassals of a people whom they never acknowledged as their superiors, and who are waging against them a war of extirpation; that they, the equal half of a broken federation of States, should by a capricious fiction be regarded as a province of the other half; that they, vindicating only those rights which are held to be inherent to all great communities, should be deemed disturbers of the public peace; that they, possessing a Government more firmly established in law and in fact than any country could boast of on its admission into the family of nations for two hundred years back, and waging a successful war of self-defence, which in magnitude would tax the utmost strength of some of the oldest Empires, should be assumed unworthy or incapable of maintaining a place among independent Powers; that in brief, new laws and new rules of evidence are devised to their especial prejudice, and that the same measure is not meted out to them that has been meted out to all others ever before. To the gratitude of the Confederate States, Europe has already lost the opportunity of earning many titles; it must soon be decided whether or no it will forfeit also their respect.

The Siege of Vicksburg.

"THE Stars and Stripes float over Vicksburg; the victory is complete." Such was the announcement of the New York Herald on the 25th ult. Two days later a general assault had been delivered along the lines of the fortress, and everywhere the Federals had been repulsed with terrible slaughter. Southern papers tell us that the Federal dead strewn the ground in front of the defences, and estimate the loss of the assailants at 10,000 men. There our authentic information ceases; all the rest is conjecture, and prediction, and misgiving, on the part of the Northern as well as the Southern press; but we can glean enough from the meagre intelligence we possess to justify more than the hope—the confident belief—that the wave of triumph which had carried Grant's army to the walls of Vicksburg had there been stemmed, and that the tide had turned. The complete success of General Grant's enterprise depended on its rapidity of execution. Both sides appear to have felt this, and the generals of either army adapted their tactics to the urgency of the position. Grant, confident in his great numerical superiority, moved on at all hazards, crushing the enemy wherever he found him, giving him no time to rally, driving him day after day, until he closed round him behind the lines of Vicksburg. On the other hand, the Confederates fought for time against any odds; at the battle of Thompson's Hill the odds were five to one, yet two Confederate brigades, admirably handled, contested the position from sunrise until sunset, and then withdrew without pursuit. There was plainly no hope of beating back the Federal advance, but two days' detention of the invader was of immense importance to the defenders of Vicksburg, and the sacrifice was made. General Grant, aware of the smallness of Bowen's force, wasted no time in following it, but marched straight for Jackson. Once there he had Vicksburg cut off; no supplies, no reinforcements could reach it, save through his army. Again the Confederates crossed his path at Raymond, a few miles east of the capital. With 4,000 men General Gregg fought him for three hours. Another day was gained. By this time General Johnstone, now appointed to supreme command, had come up with a few regiments hastily collected, and fought outside Jackson and in its streets, not so much to save Jackson as to gain a few hours for the transport of stores to Vicksburg, and give General Pemberton time to mature his preparations for defence. After a hard fight the Confederates were driven out northward, and Grant immediately pushed on towards Vicksburg. On that very day a portion of his forces pushed forward as far as Clinton, on the Jackson and Vicksburg railroad. Two days afterwards with his whole force he fought the Confederates at Baker's creek, a desperate battle in which both sides suffered great loss, but in which General Pemberton was finally compelled to give way. Following up his victory he forced the Confederate entrenchments at Big Black River Bridge on the following day, and on the 18th he had outflanked the strong position at Haines' Bluff, and was preparing to invest Vicksburg. The works at Haines' Bluff thus rendered useless were abandoned almost without a struggle. Admiral Porter's gun-boat flotilla was at once placed in a position to communicate with the land forces; and on the 20th Vicksburg was practically invested. Thus, in ten days Grant's army had traversed nearly a hundred miles of Confederate territory, and had fought four or five serious engagements. The marching and the fighting must have reduced his effective force by some 15,000 men. It is easy to see that unless Vicksburg could be carried by a coup de main, the chances of its capture would be materially reduced by every day's delay; and one can understand the apparent rashness which prompted a general assault upon the 27th, at a time when the Confederate fire had not to any perceptible degree, been reduced. The failure of that assault changed the whole aspect of affairs. It cost the Federal army its prestige of victory, as well as some 5,000 men. It taught General Grant that his opportunity was gone. It nullified the good effects of all his previous vigour and rapidity, and reduced him to the extremity of intrenching himself in front of a formidable fortress, fully garrisoned by an active and enterprising enemy, gathering his forces for an attack in his rear. It is possible that another assault may have retrieved his first failure, that reinforcements have reached him, and that his troops in irresistible numbers have swarmed over the Confederate defences, and swept the town. Possible, but not probable. It is an army—a small and outnumbered one, it is true—which defends Vicksburg. The Confederate commanders have, we know, for months anticipated an attack from the direction of Jackson, and neglected no means of defence. The Federal gun-boats cannot stand the fire of the Vicksburg batteries. To mount land batteries and arm them with heavy guns is a work of time. Men will not march up twice to positions where they can be shot down en masse by a foe they cannot see and who is sheltered from their fire. And if men can be found to face this certain destruction, if the breach is made and the line is stormed, we cannot, with the memory of Saragossa in our minds, with the present defence of Puebla before our eyes, believe that the Confederate soldiers will surrender Vicksburg in a fortnight or three weeks. They cannot be starved into submission. It would be unpardonable if their ammunition "gave out." From street to street, from terrace to terrace, Vicksburg must and will be defended to the last. When Grant has fulfilled the threat of Gortschakoff to the Poles, made Vicksburg a heap of ashes and of corpses, he may take it. But long before that the army under Johnstone will, we trust, have swept down to the relief of the beleagured garrison, and the shattered remains of Grant's command will have returned to recruit at Cairo.

For the fate of Vicksburg does not rest alone upon the gallantry of its garrison. General Johnstone holds, with reference to Grant's army, a position somewhat analogous to that held by Prince Gortschakoff in the Crimea in respect to the allies. After the battle of Alma, instead of retreating into Sebastopol, he marched northward, thereby securing his communications with the interior, and affording a rallying point to the army of defence. From Simferopol and not from Sebastopol, came the attacks which so long imperilled the allied position. From Jackson we expect to hear of the resumption of the initiative by General Johnstone, and the relief of Vicksburg. What the forces at the disposal of the Confederate commander are, we know not. He retired from Jackson with some 5,000 men, he might collect 2,000 or 3,000 from the neighbourhood of the Yazoo; but from Charleston and Mobile he ought to be able to draw 20,000 more. Tennessee might surely furnish a division. But even 20,000 men would probably suffice to drive Grant to his gun-boats. The exact force under the Federal general it is difficult to arrive at. But it comprises three corps d'armée, McClelland's, Sherman's, and McPherson's. We do not believe that Grant would have ventured on his bold march inland with less than 60,000 men. He could not after his assault on Vicksburg have had 30,000 effective men in line to conduct a siege of a first-rate fortress, and fight an army of 25,000 men in the field. Grant must take Vicksburg by assault or fall back to the banks of the Yazoo. He dare not in his present position give battle to anything like equal numbers. If by the next mail we do not hear that Vicksburg has fallen, we may look for the early abandonment of the siege. Everything depends upon the celerity with which reinforcements can be forwarded to the respective armies. General Johnstone's name is a guarantee that every possible effort will be made on the Confederate side to bring forward troops, and that, once on the field, they will be ably handled. It is to be regretted, perhaps, that that General was not in command when Grant commenced his forward movement; it is still more to be regretted that the strain upon the resources of the Confederates, left the state of Mississippi so weakly armed. But the blood of the brave men who died at Thompson's Hill, at Baker's Creek, and at Vicksburg will not have been shed in vain if the fortress of Vicksburg still defies the Federal armies, and the broad stream of the Mississippi remains the connecting link, not the dis severing channel, between the Western and South-Western States of the Confederacy.

Mr. Roebuck's Notice of Motion.

THE cheering with which the House of Commons received Mr. Roebuck's announcement—that on an early day he should move an address to the Queen, praying Her Majesty to concert measures with the Great Powers of Europe for the recognition of the Confederate States of America—implied something more than the mere expression of that sentiment of sympathy with Southern heroism and impatience of Northern insolence, which bursts forth irrepressibly whenever the representatives of the English people have an opportunity of showing in what light they regard the American quarrel. It expressed this feeling; but it also expressed the satisfaction with which the House learned that this question had been at last taken up by one who might be trusted to persevere in his undertaking; by a man whom no Ministerial blandishments would turn from his purpose, and whom no mysterious hints of inconvenience and danger likely to arise from his persistence would frighten out of his self-possession; want of civil courage is lamentably characteristic of the leading statesmen of the present day. Lord Palmerston cannot be accused of moral cowardice; but he has none of that political enthusiasm which leads men into positions in which courage is necessary, and his acute instincts and profound indifference keep him as clear of difficulties and perils as other men are kept by their want of nerve to face them. Lord Derby, who has shown before now an almost exaggerated indifference to popular opinion, seems almost to shrink from political responsibility. Lord Russell's perverse audacity always deserts him as soon as it has got him fairly into a scrape. Mr. Disraeli's position, as the leader of a party which does not cordially trust or thoroughly support him, compels him to a caution foreign to his natural temper. Mr. Gladstone has no personal following strong enough to render him capable of really independent action, and is held in check, on most subjects, by the cautious timidity of his colleagues. Smaller men, on both sides, are easily silenced by the fears or policy of their chiefs; and both the great political parties are extremely careful, in the present evenly balanced condition of party politics, not to commit themselves to any course till they are sure that it would be popular and successful. Of members who are independent by title there are many; of members who really think for themselves, and having done so are strong enough to act for themselves, there are not more than might be counted on the fingers of one hand. Of these, the two most distinguished, Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, are devoted to the cause of the Federalists. Lord R. Cecil, though ten years hence he will probably be a party leader, is too young and inexperienced to take the lead at present on any great question, and has too much at stake to run the risk of seriously compromising himself. Mr. Roebuck is not only the most independent man in the House, but he is also the most courageous. He is combative to a fault; utterly careless, not merely of the clamour he may provoke out of doors, but of the personal dislike he may incur from his colleagues, and profoundly indifferent as to the consequences of any course which he thinks it is his duty to pursue. Like Lord Grey—who resembles him in character and courage, while enjoying the advantage of a first-rate political education, which has been denied to him, Mr. Roebuck has taken a part in public affairs which precludes him from receiving office at the hands of any political party; while, by universal admission, there are few men who are better qualified by ability, good sense, and practical moderation, for the highest Ministerial functions. He says what he thinks without the slightest regard to the wishes of either party, and with an indifference to conventional rules which sometimes allows him to go further than is wise or convenient; he speaks the truth to reluctant colleagues and angry constituents with a manly frankness, of which even Mr. Bright is incapable; and he possesses in consequence not only the ear of the House of Commons, but the confidence of a constituency with which, now and then, he finds himself in absolute and not quite friendly antagonism. When such a man gives notice that he will move a vote which, if carried, would compel the recognition of the Confederate States, we know at least that the House of Commons will have an opportunity, hitherto denied to it, of expressing its opinion on that question; and finding, as we do, that his constituency, the most democratic in England, supports him with more cordiality than lately subsisted between them, we think it probable that the House may at last take courage to express its real feelings.

In taking this course, Mr. Roebuck places himself in direct conflict with the friends of his political youth, who, like himself, sympathized warmly in former days with the democratic polity of America, and who, unlike him, in these later days, n'ont rien oublié ni rien appris. It is a significant fact that this motion is to be made by the ablest and best educated of the old Radical party—a man whose prejudices and prepossessions must have been all in favour of the Northern Democracy, and hostile to the slave-owning and—in tendencies though not in laws—aristocratic States of the South. It is also, perhaps, a fact worth attention that the person who has given notice of his purpose to move the previous question—i.e., to preclude a decision—is Mr. Coningham, one of the most insignificant members of the ultra-Radical faction.

The right, duty, and wisdom of recognising the Confederate States have been so often urged upon our readers, and the arguments on either side so fully considered, that we do not now think it necessary to go over the whole ground again. It is desirable, however, that we should call attention to a piece of perverse reasoning succinctly stated the other day in the "City Article" of the Times, viz., that England has no right to recognise the independence of the Confederacy, because, as yet, that independence does not exist. Never, perhaps, was so much misrepresentation embodied in so short a phrase. We must once more ask, what is meant by recognition? Not that her Majesty should issue a formal proclamation or enter into a formal treaty, declaring the thirteen States of Missouri, Kentucky, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Arkansas, Tennessee, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, and Texas, to be free, sovereign, and independent communities. This formal declaration will one day be extorted from the President of the United States, if on that day there shall be a President to make it; but it is not customary, and would not be courteous to ask anything of this kind from a neutral Power. It is asked simply that England shall accredit an ambassador to the Government of the Confederate States of America, and shall receive an ambassador accredited by them. By so doing, we simply recognise the existence of an independent Government, not the frontiers of an independent territory. And we conceive that no one will pretend to deny that the Government at Richmond is as complete in its independent existence, organisation, and authority as any in the world. It rules with undisputed jurisdiction, albeit over an empire liable to be temporarily curtailed by the encroachments of an invader, or extended by the successes of its own troops. It has an administration as regular and orderly as our own; it enforces its laws by regular process; it exists in virtue of a well-established constitution: it has a navy which terrifies and exasperates its foes; it has an army which is the admiration of the world, and which for the fifth time has hurled back, bleeding, disgraced, and demoralised, the hordes directed by the enemy against its capital. To deny the independence of such a Government is simply puerile; to refuse recognition to such a Government after recognising the Spanish Republics of South America, the Provisional Government of Greece, and the wretched anarchy of Mexico, is neither dignified, honest, nor consistent.

But, it is said, we have no right to recognise the Confederate States until they have achieved their independence by the sword; they are not independent in the face of the world until they have proved their independence in the field. Why, they did that some seventy years ago. We recognised their independence then, not as constituent fractions of a Federal Union, but as free, sovereign, independent commonwealths; and that recognition has never been withdrawn. When, we should like to learn, was that independence renounced by the Confederate States? When did Virginia or South Carolina cease to be a free, sovereign, and independent commonwealth? Since when has Alabama or Arkansas renounced the equal position with these Commonwealths—the free, sovereign, and independent character—in full possession of which she became a member of the Union? Since when has Texas forfeited the independence which, according to the award of England and France, she had extorted from Mexico at the point of the sword before ever she entered the Union? It is absurd to say that we cannot judge the question of constitutional law involved in secession, and that therefore we must accept the view of that question suddenly and for the first time adopted and proclaimed by the North. This might be true if the dispute were between an ousted Sovereign and revolted subjects. But here the dispute lies between a Federal Government which we have tacitly recognised, and four States whose Sovereign character we have explicitly acknowledged, joined by nine others, whose rights, as admitted by their enemies, stand on precisely the same footing. By continuing our recognition to both parties we avoid any expression of opinion on the right of secession, which is not involved in the fact of Sovereignty; but by withdrawing our explicit recognition from the one party, and continuing our implicit recognition of the other, we are undertaking not merely to decide against the right of secession—a question open to dispute—but against the fact of State Sovereignty, which by our own act we are precluded from disputing. We are deciding on a quarrel in which we are not judges; we are deciding on a question of American law in contradiction to the known declaration of the framers of that law, in contradiction to the opinion which, in 1860, would have been pronounced by every American lawyer and statesman of the slightest authority, against liberty, against justice, against truth, against our own act and our own honour. We are abetting a flagrant aggression, we are doing a heinous and unprovoked wrong to a friendly Power. Independence is the status quo of each and all the Confederate States; we assume to deny them this independence because an enemy, declaring their withdrawal from a Federal compact to be a breach of allegiance, has invaded their territory, and is endeavouring to reduce them to subjection. This is an act of hostility to them, of passive alliance with their enemy.

There is one other consideration which should not be forgotten. The strongest argument against recognition—the one which is understood to have weight with the Ministry, and to be at the bottom of the policy which is defended by so many ingenious pleas derived from antiquated or irrelevant doctrines of international law,—is that it will cost us a quarrel with the Northern States of America. We need hardly point out that, if France and England act in concert, it is impossible that this quarrel should go the length of war. But, war or no war, the policy of England has too much and too long been guided by a deference to the temper and the menaces of the North, which is mistaken abroad for fear, and which looks even to Englishmen painfully like servility. We may afford to be generous towards a nation in difficulties, and to despise what is said of us by those who can ill understand that it is exactly because the Northern States are not formidable that they have been allowed to be insolent. But we cannot afford to be generous without limit at the expense of our honour and our dignity; and we have no right to be generous to one party at the expense of justice to another. That love of peace which leads men to submit to insult, which induces them to comply with the demands of those who may quarrel with them at the expense of those who cannot—is too closely like cowardice to recommend itself even to the most pacific of trueborn Englishmen.

We are inclined to regret that Mr. Roebuck, by the terms of his motion, confines his appeal in favour of recognition to the "Great Powers of Europe." In the present state of international relations, two of these Powers will probably refuse to join us; and a third, though friendly to us, may be indisposed to do so both by her lack of interest in the quarrel and her traditional policy. But if Russia and Prussia be certain, and Austria likely, to hold aloof, there are other Powers whose moral and material influence, in the present case, would be almost equal to theirs, which might well be asked to unite their action with ours. Spain and Holland might not unfittingly be requested to join with England and France in an act of so much importance to all commercial and maritime countries; and their union with us would tend to deprive the action of the two Western Powers of that appearance of menace and dictation, which it might be thought to bear if they should act alone. In a case of this kind, it is rather the neutrality and good-will than the material strength of foreign Powers that should lead us to court their alliance and assistance.

Royalty at Eton College.

It is impossible to suppose that the advisers or holders of the Royal Power in England, in the present day, ever resort to those means of commanding and inculcating loyalty, which have been familiar at other times and under widely different circumstances. That power now calls for universal respect and admiration, in virtue of its enlarged views of its own responsibilities, and its undeviating course in the path of duty. Yet there are methods by which, even now, a spirit of chivalry may be added to the steadfast fidelity resulting from prudent calculation, and by which the ardour of youth may be enlisted on the side of monarchical authority. One of such agencies, pure and uncorrupt as it may be in its essence, exists in the periodical visits of Royalty to Eton College. It is said that George III., not only on various State occasions, but frequently in the tranquil routine of ordinary life, appeared within the precincts of the college, and displayed a familiar and flattering interest in its members and its fortunes; and the Queen has more than once, in company with the late Prince Consort, honoured the festive days of Eton with her presence. It was but natural, then, that the Prince and Princess of Wales, who appear to be quite indefatigable in their attempts to pay due honour to all the great institutions of the country, should be careful not to omit the mark of respect which even Royal personages might deem to be due to the greatest of English schools. Moreover, it must not be forgotten that nearly all the companions of the Prince without the pale of Royalty have been chosen from among the Eton Boys, and that no opportunity has been lost, so far as was possible, of bringing him into contact with the feelings and associations of the school. But apart from all this, it is clear that Eton bears a very distinctive character in the political and social world; as concerns the former it is beyond doubt, that by the mutual influence of Masters of that line of thought and parents bound to that party either by lineage or conviction, the vast majority of Eton Boys are trained to swell the ranks of the Conservative interest. It may well be that the authorities being but limited in their ideas, and always tending to make their pupils but a reproduction of themselves display an unfortunate determination to unanimity in the main features of their opinions. But it is a fact that leaders of the two great parties in the State are respectively recruited with equal success from the rival schools of Eton and Harrow. It is absurd to suppose that either party excels the other in devotion to the Throne, but perhaps it may be conceded that the Conservative section prides itself on more profound loyalty—at any rate it is not difficult to conceive that the presence of Royalty on auspicious occasions has a very considerable effect on the exaggerated enthusiasm of a youth, the mind of which is already prepared for a due appreciation of such exalted patronage. But, however that may be, it is clear that Eton, whether as represented by old or young, derived intense delight from the visit of the Prince and his Bride on the 5th day of June, and did their best to welcome them with proper dignity. According to custom the grandest efforts of ancient and modern writers were rendered with classical accuracy to fashionable audiences; vast entertainments, indicative of unbounded hospitality, were honoured with the presence of Royalty and aristocracy; and a pageant of eight-oared boats, manned by boys in elegant nautical costumes, formed a part of an evening fête, which was further diversified by a supper on the banks of the Thames and a grand display of fireworks. A visit to Eton College is at all times instructive and agreeable; but never is the grand old place, with its noble chapel, hall, and buildings, spacious residences, beautiful fields and river, seen to better advantage than when authorities and boys combine in their efforts to entertain their fashionable visitors and relatives in this magnificent style. Without conceit it may be said that such a spectacle as then meets the eye of the stranger is as singular as it is at variance with the preconceived notions of what a school is, and as it is suggestive of what a school may be.

Eton College, founded by Henry VI., after no long lapse of time assumed its present constitution, though not its present development. The foundation supports a Provost, for such is the title of the supreme head of the institution, six fellows, and seventy scholars. These form a nucleus round which the vast system of Eton has gradually been organized. At the present time there are upwards of 800 boys at the school, with a proportionate staff of masters. The seventy boys already mentioned live in the College buildings, and have the privilege of an education at a comparatively inexpensive rate, but are mixed indiscriminately with the residue of the school in all matters of learning and competition. Certainly that foundation, so far as the fellows are concerned, is a conspicuous anomaly; they form a body of men usually selected from the masters, when worn out in the toil of tuition; and in addition to the ecclesiastical preferment which they invariably hold, are in the enjoyment of large incomes from the College estates. It may be that the vast revenue of the College, which probably exceeds £16,000 a-year, requires administrators; but beyond such a want, it is difficult to conceive what purpose is served by the preservation of the Order of Fellows. The existing statutes do not contemplate the existing organization; and the present rights, privileges, and powers of the august body are the result rather of the accidents of years and circumstances than of legislative sanction. The time is probably not far distant when the income of the College estates will be applied to the laudable and equitable purpose of furthering the interests of the school, and when all such anomalies will be adjusted under the sweeping powers of an Act of Parliament and a Board of Commissioners. Eton College fell within the scope of the University Reform Act of 1856; but the grand results of modern legislation must be looked for in the report and recommendations of the existing Public Schools Commission.

The anomaly existing in the case of the fellows of the College is not more striking than the peculiar position of the seventy scholars on the foundation. They seem to be a kind of "imperium in imperio," and differ in many respects from the residue of the School. Living in one set of buildings, dining in one hall, all moved by the same associations and sympathies, and following strange rules and fashions, handed down from remote periods, they have a unanimity of sentiment unknown to the multitude, which is scattered in numberless houses, each containing about twenty inhabitants, shifting in ownership and destitute of traditions. Moreover the seventy have from time immemorial contended in games and learning with vigorous emulation against their numerous competitors, and have always, either in sport or knowledge, though rarely in both at the same time, been perfectly able to hold their own. In addition to the advantage of an education at about one-fourth of the cost of that of the remainder of the School, the seventy scholars monopolise—or rather until the late University Act did monopolise—the whole benefit of the connexion between Eton and King's College in the University of Cambridge. The select spirits of the one were drafted into the other, and passed with rapidity to the emoluments of comfortable fellowships. Of late years the vacancies in the foundation at Eton have been filled by the process of an examination, conducted on sound principles and in an impartial manner. Sixty candidates on the average put in their claims for sixteen vacancies, and the result of the welding of the choice talents into one body has been displayed, not merely in the marked superiority of the seventy scholars in point of learning to the remainder of the School, but in their conspicuous success in more mature years at the two Universities. In regard to the composition of the great bulk of the School, or those boys who usually are denominated Oppidians, it may be well to remark that the vast proportion of them are drawn from the highest ranks of the English nobility, that in after-life they are principally to be found with men from Harrow, Westminster, and Winchester, in the two Houses of Parliament, the Royal household, and the “crack” regiments of the army. It is but natural that, descending from families of great wealth, they should enjoy a method of life which, to an ordinary observer, might seem too luxurious to be consistent with the bare idea of school. On the average, the expense which the parents incur is not short of £200 a-year, and if this be thought large, it must be remembered that as a rule the amount can be readily afforded, and that at least, so far as material things are concerned, an ample return is obtained for the money. Of course the masters are exceedingly well paid, so well indeed as to excite the ire of many a struggling professional man, who finds time to vent his wrath in print; but on the other hand, the authorities are determined to obtain the first scholars which the Universities can produce, and we have no hesitation in saying that they will not get them at a lower rate of pay than that now awarded.

The whole educational efforts of Eton have, from time immemorial, been concentrated on the study of the classical authors. We imagine that it would be a crime bordering on sacrilege, even to hint that this department of knowledge has not been cultivated there with matchless success. It is true that much that has been taught at school as scholarship of the most orthodox description, is pronounced by the Universities to be rank heresy, and that the sins of omission are there also found to exceed those of commission; yet imagination may, at so early an age, be entitled to take precedence of critical acumen and poetry of philosophy. Our complaint is that the vast field of learning of which classical erudition is but an important section, remains almost entirely unexplored. Mathematics have only been introduced as part of the ordinary routine within the last twelve years. At a time more recent even than that date modern history was thought worthy of a passing recognition; and while we write, a few of the most energetic of the masters are at length endeavouring to obtain a hearing for the just but disregarded claims of modern languages. Science is still absolutely out of court. The opponents of these various elements of wisdom are ready to argue that there is no leisure for the cultivation of them. Supposing the argument to be true, it is surely high time that leisure should be manufactured under the influence of a pressing demand, but fortunately it is not true. It is scarcely credible that about ten of the most valuable hours of the week are devoted to the composition of original Latin verse and prose. We could, without the smallest difficulty, find persons who have, during their sojourn at Eton, fabricated at least eight thousand Latin verses, and scribbled Latin prose essays exceeding in bulk even that quantity. Such a system has little support but that of antiquated custom. Where the object is to elicit the thoughts of the writer, the utmost liberty of expression is necessary; but that is unattainable when the difficulties attending the use of a language, imperfectly understood and certainly the reverse of plastic, cause the ideas to be moulded to the language and not the language to the ideas. The theory that composition is indispensable to sound scholarship is true enough, but that theory is realised with infinitely less toil and more success by the conversion of English verse and prose than by original efforts. In the face, then, of these facts it is a matter of congratulation to find that the wants of the future orators and statesmen of England, extended as they well may be beyond the confined sphere of original Latin verse, are gradually being understood; and hopes may, perhaps, be indulged that the introduction of new subjects will eventually lead to the rejection or modification of what are little better than fancies. We wish to do justice to the great efforts of those who are fighting an uphill battle for necessary innovations; but probably it is still a fact, and if a fact then a most lamentable one, that a boy may leave Eton distinguished for his attainments and qualified by his talents to obtain a very high degree in either University, and yet be utterly ignorant of the most ordinary facts in the history of his own country, incapable of reading a line of any modern language, unacquainted with the elements of modern geography, and unaware of the very existence of one single science. His whole sphere of learning begins with the Trojan war and ends with the reign of Domitian, and after the lapse of a few years he wakes up and marvels in abhorrence at the nightmare of his own ridiculous ignorance. It is no answer to affirm that this man of talent will repair all these defects; doubtless he may; but did they not exist to impede his progress, how much greater would be, by the same industry, that approximation to wisdom which his entire life will be spent in compassing?

But if we put aside for a moment the mere acquirement of the various branches of knowledge, and concentrate our attention on the residue of that aggregate of culture which constitutes education, we shall find very much to admire in the methods pursued at Eton. Much that has been stated in these columns on a former occasion with regard to the systems adopted for the development of the physical energies at the English Universities might be repeated with equal justice here. No expense, no effort, and no ingenuity is spared on the part of the authorities to impart to the boys that earnest zeal for distinction in manly exercises, which is so valuable an ingredient in the character of the higher classes of England. The summer months pass joyously enough in endless contests in the cricket field and on the river. The most distinguished clubs in England are only too eager to obtain the necessary permission to try the mettle and skill of their youthful opponents, and a whole day, uninterrupted by even the thought of an impending accumulation of mental labour, is unhesitatingly devoted by the common consent of masters and boys to the pleasures and toils of the game. The annual struggles between Eton and the great rival Schools of Harrow and Winchester are anticipated with the utmost interest, even in the Metropolis; and that between Harrow and Eton proves its unbounded popularity, by the vast crowds of the aristocracy which throng with carriages and on foot the lawn of the Marylebone Club, display their partiality by wearing the respective colours of the Schools and cheering the successful competitors, and deem it a matter of substantive pride, if a son or a nephew acquires himself nobly in the game. On the Thames, during the months of June and July, each week is signalled by boat races, the conquerors in which acquire rewards more substantial than the Olympic palm and revel in the possession of cups and medals. Their most glorious triumph, however, consists in the defeat of the boys of Westminster in the annual eight oared race, and their magnificence is displayed in such pageants as have been already depicted. In the winter months, games suitable to the season are pursued with ardour. Foot-ball and fives, hurdle-races, steeplechases over three miles of what is facetiously described as a “fair hunting country,” and races on the flat, demand the most careful attention to health and exercise on the part of the numerous competitors. It is even said, and we believe with truth, that the spirit of the old English sportsman breaks out unmistakably in the boy, and that small packs of beagles trained to hunt a “drag,” entice whole troops of unfiring peasants over many miles of country. It is not difficult to understand, in view of such facts as these, the undoubted superiority in physical qualities of the upper classes, not only to the rest of the population of England, but to the inhabitants of the Continent. The effect of the opposite system may be seen and appreciated on a very superficial inspection of the constituents of a Parisian school promenading the Champs Elysées. The contrast, too, is, we suspect, even more strongly marked in the relative happiness of the two classes. Probably no set of human beings experience so much real happiness and so little misery as boys at an English public school, and this fact has a deeper importance than the momentary or passing enjoyment of youth. A man whose early life has been one of real pleasure, is seldom morose, and never sour. Not having experienced evil, he neither suspects it nor designs it; not having suffered wrong, he is unconscious of revenge; knowing happiness, he desires to see others happy; understanding freedom, he is not jealous of the liberty of others.

In all matters of recreation, and, indeed, in matters of more serious moment, the utmost confidence is placed in the boys and their natural leaders. These last are, as the case may be, either the most skilled in games or the heads of the school. Perhaps the theory of governing through the boys themselves is carried to an extravagant length; but it has two incalculable advantages,—it creates a mutual trust between masters and boys, and it ensures a considerable degree of liberty. Officious and unnecessary restraint is scrupulously avoided. Etiquette and points of form are curiously suggestive of the aristocratic feeling; but though somewhat too elaborate, they tend to the promotion of polished manners. Whatever may have been, or may be, the shortcomings of the Eton authorities, they at least have succeeded in producing a youth ingenuous and frank, bold and self-reliant, sensible and generous; and they may, with much truth, claim a large share of that praise which must be awarded to those who have from time to time educated for England that aristocracy which is probably the best the world has ever seen, and certainly the only one the existence of which is compatible with the progress of modern ideas and modern civilization.

THE WORK OR WAR.—An American paper states that the Pension-office at Washington has lately recorded the nineteenth-thousandth application of wives made widows by this war between the Northern and Southern States.

A BRIEF NOTICE OF SOME NEW BOOKS.

THERE is just now an unusual supply of, and therefore we presume a demand for, historical works, especially those which deal with constitutional history. The last volume of “A History of England during the Reign of George III,” by Mr. Massey, M.P., has just been published. Very likely Mr. Massey's book is not in great request at Mudie's. It is not in the least degree sensational; facts are not made to look like fiction; there is not an attempt at giving original views, and we do not find any important incidents with which we were not previously acquainted. Yet Mr. Massey's book is valuable. It is an intelligent and thoroughly readable compilation. It gives a plain and unvarnished narrative of the most critical era in our past history. It is well we should be reminded of the part we formerly played in the affairs of the world. What we thought right—no doubt we were often mistaken—we did not hesitate to assert and to defend with all our might. We made great sacrifices, and we came out winners. We are now taught, by the so-called Manchester School, that prudence is the better part of valour; but if we act upon this advice, we may find that, by refusing to accept the responsibilities incident to the position of a first-class Power, we shall cease to occupy that position.

The book of the month is, undoubtedly, Mrs. Norton's new novel, “Lost and Saved.” It is superfluous to make any comment upon the style of this last work of a lady who always writes leisurely and gracefully. As a mere literary composition, it can hardly be too highly commended. But we cannot bestow equal praise upon the structure of the story. At the commencement, the plot is well developed, and all the dramatis personæ are properly introduced; but towards the end some characters are violently dragged in, and others unexpectedly got rid of, for no better reason than the necessity of finishing the novel in a certain number of pages, and in a way that the authoress had determined on in spite of the exigencies of the story. We shall, perhaps, best illustrate our meaning by comparing the plot to a game of chess. Mrs. Norton opens her game admirably, and plays it naturally, until she finds that it is likely to be a drawn battle, or even that black may win instead of white, as she intended. Upon this, in violation of the rules of the game, she introduces some white pieces, and removes some black pieces. The main incidents are these. A girl is betrayed into a sham marriage, is told of her position before the birth of her child, and for the sake of her offspring, agrees to live with her seducer until he chooses to marry her. In due course, the roué is tired of his toy, and discards her. After much suffering the unhappy heroine is saved, that is to say, she meets with an Italian Count, who has been deserted by his wife, and who marries her. As the lady had persistently regarded her sham marriage as a real union, she objected to wed the Count whilst her seducer lived, and, therefore, that individual is poisoned. When “Adam Bede” first appeared, there was considerable discussion as to the good effect of making a seduction case the basis of a novel. But in “Adam Bede” the fate of the seduced was so tragic, that there could be no question as to the moral tendency of the tale. Now, we are far from saying, that “Lost and Saved” has an immoral tendency, yet that the heroine marries happily at last, seems to us something like a reward for imprudence, or for the want of that honourable feeling which must always prevent a virtuous woman from consenting to live in a state of adultery. Besides, the conclusion is, we may say, impossible. Italian Counts who are worth marrying, are just as loth to unite themselves to a cast-off mistress, as is an English gentleman. The moral Mrs. Norton wants to impress on her readers is, that society is too unforgiving with regard to women, and too forgiving in regard to men. This complaint has been made a thousand times before. As a matter of abstract justice, we admit there ought to be no distinction between the immorality of the one sex and of the other. But we have no hope of seeing the sexes, in this respect, placed upon an equality. Yet, even on the abstract question, we think Mrs. Norton has fallen into error. Society does not do wrong by severely punishing the faults of women, but in treating too leniently men who are steeped in the same vices.

It is, perhaps, well that we should mention a book that has nothing to recommend it but its title page. We refer to “The Wanderings of a Beauty,” by Mrs. Edwin James. There is a vulgar notion that a woman who writes well is sure to make a bad wife, and if the converse is true, and if a woman who has not the slightest capacity for authorship is sure to make a good wife, Mr. Edwin James has lost a paragon of wifely perfection. Lest we may be accused of injustice we will observe that there is nothing in “The Wanderings of a Beauty” that should prevent a careful father from placing it in the hands of his daughter. So far as moral influence is concerned, it is as free from fault as a railway time table. As we do not wish to libel Bradshaw by an unfair comparison, we beg to state the difference between the Guide and the novelette—"Bradshaw" is dull and useless, and Mrs. Edwin James's book is dull and useless.

Amongst books of travel, "A Trip on Horseback in Mantchu Tartary, being a Summer's Ride beyond the Great Wall of China," is likely to find a multitude of readers both at home and abroad. Mr. Fleming, an officer, and Mr. Michie, a Shanghai merchant, determined to take advantage of the treaty of Tien-tsin, which permits British subjects to travel in China; and accordingly they set out from Tien-tsin on Tartar ponies, their baggage and provisions being carried in a cart. Beyond the curiosity of the natives, which was sometimes unpleasantly demonstrative, they met with no annoyance or hinderance until they arrived at the Great Wall, when their passports were demanded and did not satisfy the authorities. They then produced an official document which they had obtained from the Imperial Commissioners at Tien-tsin, and after some delay they were allowed to proceed. Mr. Fleming climbed a high mountain, from the summit of which he had a magnificent view of the surrounding country, and of that wonderful work of art—the Great Wall of China. The travellers finally pushed on to Moukden, the Mantchu capital.

At the time selected by Bishop Colenso to impugn the credit of the Old Testament, it happens that considerable attention is being paid, incidentally and directly, to the history of the Jews. Following on the wonderful discoveries of the present generation of explorers in the Holy Land, we have, amongst a number of valuable works on the same subject, the superb series of photographs taken by Mr. Bedford during the tour of the Prince of Wales in the East. Irrespective of the artistic merit of these pictures, they are invaluable as instructive illustrations of the past history and present condition of the Holy Land, and it is much to be regretted that the price at which they are published limits their circulation. Besides Dr. Stanley's "Lectures on the Jewish Church," we have a third edition of Dean Milman's "History of the Jews, from the Earliest Period down to Modern Times;" and here again we cannot help regretting that a work which ought to be read by many, is so expensive. Even sceptics must admit that the authenticated history of the Jews from first to last, is in itself a miracle as wonderful as any miracle recorded in the Old Testament.

Mr. A. J. B. Beresford Hope has lately delivered two able lectures on Art, which have been published. One was an inaugural address delivered at the opening of the present session of the Architectural Museum, of which institution Mr. Hope is president. The second lecture is entitled "The World's Debt to Art," and besides discussing what may be done with iron in the ornamentation of our cities and in the production of works of art, Mr. Hope points out how, in small things as well as great, we may pay our debt to art. Even dress is not unimportant. The lecturer rebukes the modern changes in female attire. He says, "Women dressed well ten years ago, but they would not let well alone. They had got rid of St. Martin's gowns; they had got rid of bonnets which expanded to the east and to the west, and which rose to the zenith; they had got variety of colour. * * * But here are the old antediluvian hoops again; and the small graceful bonnet is changed for one which pokes up like a coal-scoop. It was formerly a coal scuttle, but now you will agree with me it is more like a coal-scoop. So there our ladies are. Ten years ago you were well dressed, ladies; but you would not let well alone, and now you are dressed—a l'Imperatrice."

GUNPOWDER IN THE SOUTH.—It will be recollected how great in the beginning of the war was the anxiety which filled the breast of every patriot, in relation to the scarcity of powder in the Confederate States. And at the first battle at Manassas, many of the soldiers had not one cap to each cartridge in their cartridge boxes. The terrible route at that period was a god-send in this particular, thousands of cartridges were collected and saved, and thus we made in one glorious day, preparations for a whole campaign. But during the interim, every effort possible had been made by President Davis, and the then Secretary of War, Hon. Leroy P. Walker, to establish a mill for the manufacture of powder on an extensive scale. The ingredient most difficult to procure was saltpetre, but every inducement was offered to the people of the South to bring out this precious substance from the caves and banks where it had long lain hidden, from want of an exigency calling for its production. The call was promptly answered, and a superabundance of saltpetre was soon produced and brought to hand. The result of the whole matter is, that at the cost of about $100,000 one of the most perfect gunpowder mills in the world has been produced, which turns out five thousand pounds of powder per day, and could produce double that amount if worked day and night, and much more if worked under the exigency of a pressing demand. The Southern powder is necessarily good, from the fact that the usual adulterating ingredient—plumbago, or black lead—is very difficult to procure. —Richmond Enquirer, May 16.

ADDRESS TO CHRISTIANS THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

CHRISTIAN BROTHERN,—In the name of our Holy Christianity, we address you in this form, respecting matters of great interest to us, which we believe deeply concern the cause of our Blessed Master, and to which we invoke your serious attention.

We speak not in the spirit of controversy, not by political inspiration, but as the servants of the Most High God we speak the "truth in love," concerning things which make for peace.

In the midst of war—surrounded by scenes that pain the souls of all good men—deploring the evils which are inseparable from national contentions, we feel most deeply impressed by the conviction, that for our own sake, for the sake of our posterity, for the sake of humanity, for the sake of the truth, and above all, for the sake of our Redeemer's Kingdom, it behoves us to testify of certain things in our beloved land, which seem to be neither understood nor appreciated by our enemies, nor yet clearly appreciated by Christians of other nations.

We put forth this address after much prayer, solemnly invoking the blessing of Almighty God, and committing what we say to that Providence by which we trust we are directed, and by whose authority and power the governments of the earth stand or fall.

If we were moved to make this address by any fears of the final issue of the war in which our country is now engaged, by any inclination to meddle with political questions, by any desire to resume controversy in respect to matters which have been referred to the arbitration of the sword; if indeed anything that compromised the simplicity, dignity, and purity of Christian duty moved us to issue this address, we should deserve to have it despised by you, and could hope for no blessing of God to rest upon it. But for all that we say in the following declarations, we are willing to be judged by succeeding generations, and to answer in that day when the secrets of all hearts shall be made known.

We do not propose to discuss the causes of the war. They are matters of recent history, easily known and read of all men. To discuss them would obviously involve much more than, as Christian ministers, we feel it our province to argue.

We submit for your consideration as the first point of our testimony and ground of protest,—

That the war waged against our people, in principle and in fact, proposes to achieve that which, in the nature of the case, is impossible to accomplish by violence. The war proposes the restoration of the Union.

We can rationally suppose a war for conquest, or to expel an invader, or to compel respect for stipulations of peace and international intercourse which have been violated; but how measures of violence can reunite independent States, restore their broken fellowship, re-establish equality of representatives' rights, or coerce a people to brotherly kindness, unity, and devotion to each other, is utterly beyond our conception.

But if our enemies be disingenuous in their professions; if they fight not to recover seceded States, but to subjugate them, what promise do men find in the numbers, intelligence, courage, resources and moral energies of the millions who inhabit the Confederate States, that such a people can ever become profitable or happy, as subordinate to mere military force? If subjugation, therefore, were possible, is it desirable? Would the United States gain anything? Would Christian civilization gain anything? Said a great British statesman in 1775, when arguing in favour of adopting conciliatory measures in respect to the revolted colonies of America—colonies, not seceding States—that were in actual rebellion against their sovereign: "The use of force is but temporary. It may subdue for a moment, but it does not remove the necessity for subduing again; and a nation is not governed which is perpetually to be conquered. My next objection is its uncertainty. Terror is not always the effect of force, and an armament is not a victory. * * * A further objection to force is that you impair the object by your very endeavours to preserve it. The thing you fought for is not the thing you recover."

Christian brethren, could the hand of violence win you to desire fellowship with a people while it destroyed your peace, polluted your sanctuaries, invaded the sacred precincts of your homes, robbed you of your property, slaughtered your noble sons, clothed your daughters in grief, filled your land with sorrow, and employed its utmost strength to reduce your country to the degradation of a subjugated province? Would it not rather animate you to prefer death—honourable death—the patriot's alternative, the Christian's martyrdom?

As an excuse for violence, our enemies charge that the Confederate States have attempted to overthrow "the best Government on earth;" and call us "traitors," "rebels." We deny the charge, and as to the epithets, if they defined our position, under the circumstances, we could glory in them, as do the people of God when persecuted for truth and conscience' sake. But we regard such terms as gratuitously assuming the very point at issue. If employed sincerely, we will not complain; but we are persuaded that many have uttered these expressions under the influence of resentful feelings, who would not otherwise assert the political doctrines they imply. We are not disposed to engage in an angry retort, and only mention these things to show that we appreciate them.

It will appear singular when men reflect upon it, that so many intelligent and Christian people should desire to withdraw from "the best Government on earth." And we need not discuss the kindness of those who so generously propose to confer on us by force of arms "the best Government."

No attempt has been made to overthrow the Government of the United States, unless by the fanatical party which now administers its affairs. The South never entertained such an idea. If that Government fall for lack of Southern support, let men discriminate between the downfall of an oppression when the oppressed have escaped, and a wanton effort to break up good government. So Pharaoh fell, but not by the hand of Israel. The dismemberment of the Union by secession was not a blow at the Government. It was for our own deliverance. It was an election of the people, only hastened and rendered in some cases imperative by the violent movements of the Executive of the United States. Virginia may be referred to as an illustration. That State was not willing to secede hastily; but the demand of President Lincoln that she furnish troops to fight her sister States, ended all hesitation. At once she took position with the Confederacy, preferring to battle in defence of liberty, than in opposition to all her principles to invade or suffer the invasion of the South.

So far, therefore, from desiring to destroy the United States' Government, the great object of those States which first seceded was to secure their own rights, and their tranquillity; while the immediate object of the States which last seceded was to place themselves as barriers in the way of a fanatical administration, and, if possible, stay the bloody effort to coerce independent States to remain in the Union, when their constitutional rights would not be respected, and when the very purpose to coerce them showed a readiness to sacrifice the lives of citizens to the demands of sectional hostility. The South would never vote in favour of annexing or retaining a Northern State by force of arms. Instead, therefore, of waging war for the overthrow of the United States, the Confederate States simply defend themselves.

The war is forced upon us. We have always desired peace. After a conflict of opinions between the North and the South in Church and State, of more than thirty years, growing more bitter and painful daily, we withdraw from them to secure peace—they send troops to compel us into re-union! Our proposition was peaceable separation, saying, "We are actually divided, our nominal union is only a platform of strife." The answer is a call for seventy-five thousand troops, to force submission to a Government whose character, in the judgment of the South, had been sacrificed to sectionalism. From the speech of Mr. Burke, already referred to, the following language may be quoted as not inappropriate to our position in respect to peace:—

"THE PROPOSITION IS PEACE.—Not peace through the medium of war; not peace to be hunted through the labyrinth of intricate and endless negotiations; not peace to arise out of universal discord, fomented from principle, in all parts of the empire; not peace to depend on the judicial determination of perplexing questions, or the precise marking the shadowy boundaries of a complex government. It is simple peace, sought in the spirit of peace and laid in principles purely pacific."

Such a proposition of peace was clearly the appropriate duty of a Christian people. The South can point out on the page of history the names, and refer to the earnest and repeated efforts of her commissioners of peace. But our foes preferred war—violence—and by violence the end they aimed at was unattainable, as the purpose was unworthy of a Christian nation. Against this violence, upon principle, and in the light of all the facts of the case, we, as the servants of God and ministers of peace, testify and solemnly protest.

The second general point which we submit for your Christian consideration is:—

The separation of the Southern States is universally regarded by our people as final, and the formation of the Confederate States' Government, as a fixed fact, promising, in no respect, a restoration of the former Union.

Politically and ecclesiastically the line has been drawn between North and South. It has been done distinctly, deliberately, finally, and in most solemn form. The Confederacy claims to possess all the conditions and essential characteristics of an independent government. Our institutions, habits, tastes, pursuits, and religion suggest no wish for reconstruction of the Union. We regard the Confederacy, in the wise providence of the Almighty, as the result of causes which render its independent existence a moral and political necessity, and its final and future independence of the United States not a matter that admits of the slightest doubt.

Among all the indefensible acts, growing out of the inexcusable war waged against us, we will refer to one especially, in regard to which, for obvious reasons, we would speak, and as becometh us, plainly and earnestly:—The recent Proclamation of the President of the United States, seeking the emancipation of the slaves of the South, is, in our judgment, a suitable occasion for solemn protest on the part of the people of God throughout the world.

First, upon the hypothesis that the proclamation could be carried out in its design, we have no language to describe the bloody tragedy that would appal humanity. Christian sensibilities recoil from the vision of a struggle that would inevitably lead to the slaughter of tens of thousands of poor deluded insurrectionists! Suppose their owners suffered; in the nature of things the slaves would suffer infinitely more. Make it absolutely necessary for the public safety that the slaves be slaughtered, and he who should write the history of that event would record the darkest chapter of human woe yet written.

But secondly, suppose the Proclamation,—as indeed we esteem it in the South—a mere political document, devised to win favour among the most fanatical of the Northern people, uttering nothing that has not already been attempted, practically, but in vain, by the United States; suppose it to be worth no more than the paper upon which its bold iniquity is traced, nevertheless it is the avowal of a principle, the declaration of a wish, the deliberate attempt of the chief magistrate of a nation to do that which, as a measure of war, must be repugnant to civilization, and which we calmly denounce as worthy of universal reprobation, and against which Christians in the name of humanity and religion ought to protest.

What shall sound Christianity say to that one-idea philanthropy which, in the name of an imaginary good, in blind fury rushes upon a thousand unquestionable evils?

If it were the time for such argument, we should not fear the issue of a full discussion of this whole question of Slavery. We fear no investigation, we decline no debate; but we would not, at an hour like this, and in an address which is chiefly a protest, invoke the spirit of controversy. We content ourselves with what we regard as infinitely more solemn; we stand before the world, while war silences the voices of disputants, and men in deadly contention wrestle on fields of blood, protesting against the crimes that in the name of liberty and philanthropy are attempted! Let it go forth from our lips while we live; let it be recorded of us when we are dead, that we—ministers of our Lord Jesus Christ, and members of His holy Church, with our hands upon the Bible, at once the sacred chart of our liberties and the foundation of our faith, call heaven and earth to record, that in the name of Him whose we are, and whom we serve, we protest! No description we can give of this measure of the Executive of the United States, even though indignation alone inspired us to utter it, would exaggerate what we regard as an unholy infatuation, a ruthless persecution, a cruel and shameful device, adding severity and bitterness to a wicked and reckless war.

When it is remembered that, in the name of “a military necessity,” this new measure was adopted, we may pass by the concession of weakness implied in this fact, and content ourselves with calling attention to the immorality of a necessity created by a needless war of invasion. “Military necessity!” an excuse not for self-defence—not for self-preservation—but for violating the laws of civilized warfare, and attempting a barbarity. If “military necessity” be the inspiration to attempt emancipation, how shall men praise it as philanthropy? Are other nations uninterested in such conduct? Proclaim the right first to invade and subjugate independent States, exhaust all resources, and then avow the principle of “military necessity” as an excuse to add severity to the wrong, as a plea upon which to project a scheme violative of every manly, honourable, and Christian sentiment! Suppose an invader happens to be too weak to conquer upon any other plan, has he therefore the right to proclaim that poison and the indiscriminate slaughter of women and children shall be his legal method? The common cause of humanity, and the common hopes of Christian civilization, as they appeal to every nation, cry out against this wretched subterfuge. If the “military necessity” of weakness may righteously adopt any measure that an invader’s ingenuity can invent or his malice suggest, what laws, what principles of justice and equity shall nations at war respect?

At one time the world is told “the rebellion is weak, and will be crushed out in sixty days;” at another, “Union men abound in the South, and will welcome U.S. troops as deliverers;” and now the invader is so hopeless of his task, that it is a “military necessity” that he obtain help of slaves! May it not be pertinently asked, what, that is creditable to this invasion, ought men to believe, and to what end is this deceitful war waged? When this last resort, like all the enemy’s preceding schemes, shall signally fail, as it certainly will, to achieve the ruin of the South, what is promised? Nothing, but war! cruel, relentless, desperate war! Because the President by his scheme violates the constitution, we might condemn him; though the constitutionality of his acts be less important to us than to the people over whom he presides; because he has violated his word, his special promise, and even his solemn oath of office, we might abhor his act; though that is a matter which may chiefly concern his conscientiousness, and illustrate the character of that officer whom Southerners refused to salute as their President; because of the diabolical mischief intended, we might in the name of Heaven indignantly denounce his proclamation; though no weapon formed against us be, practically, more harmless. But these are not the considerations which move us to protest: we solemnly protest because, under the disguise of philanthropy, and the pretext of doing good, he would seek the approbation of mankind upon a war that promises to humanity only evil, and that continually.

Let philanthropists observe, even according to its own terms, this measure is in no proper sense an act of mercy to the slave, but of malice toward the master. It provides for freeing only the slaves of those who fight against the United States. The effort is not to relieve that Government of slavery, where the philanthropy has full opportunity for displaying its generosity, and the power to exercise it in respect to slavery, if it exists at all, can be indulged; but the effort is simply to invoke slavery as an agent against the South, reckless of the consequences to the slaves themselves. Shall a pretext at once so weak and so base mislead intelligent men, and make them imagine Abraham Lincoln is a philanthropist? His position ought to be offensive to every sincere abolitionist, as well as disgusting to every sincere friend of the slave of every shade of opinion on the question of slavery. How does it affect the cause of the Confederacy? If to awaken a deeper resentment than ever inflamed the people of the South before; if to quench the last sentiment of respect that lingered in their breasts for the United States’ Government; if to unite them more resolutely than ever, and to make it to the individual interest of every person in the bounds of the Confederacy to sustain and strengthen it with every dollar and every arm, and every prayer, and every energy of manly virtue and Christian encouragement, be to advance the invader’s interest, and give him hope of success, then has the proclamation furnished him opportunity of congratulating himself.

We submit further: That the war against the Confederate States has achieved no good result, and we find nothing in the present state of the struggle that gives promise of the United States accomplishing any good by its continuance. Though hundreds of thousands of lives have been lost, and many millions of treasure spent; though a vast amount of valuable property has been destroyed, and numbers of once happy homes made desolate; though cities and towns have been temporarily captured, and aged men and helpless women and children have suffered such things as it were even a shame to speak of plainly; though sanctuaries have been desecrated, and ministers of God been dragged from sacred altars to loathsome prisons; though slaves have been instigated to insurrection, and every measure has been adopted that the ingenuity of the enemy could devise, or his ample resources afford by sea and by land; yet we aver, without fear of contradiction, that the only possession which the United States hold in the Confederate States is the ground on which United States’ troops pitch their tents; and that whenever those troops withdraw from a given locality in our territory, the people resident therein testify a warmer devotion to the Confederate cause than even before their soil was invaded. Nothing is therefore conquered—no part of the country is subdued; the civil jurisdiction of the United States, the real test of their success, has not been established by any force of arms. Where such civil jurisdiction exists at all along the border, it had existed all the while, was not obtained by force, and is not the fruit of conquest. The fact is admitted by our enemies themselves.

It is worthy of special notice, that notwithstanding the gigantic exertions of the United States, they have not been able to secure the return of a single county, or section of a county, much less a single State, that has seceded. No civil order and peace spring up in the track of their armies. All in front of them is resolute resistance, and behind them, when they have entered our territory, is a deep, uncompromising opposition, over which only military force can for a moment be trusted. Thus the civilized world is called upon to observe an invasion which has lasted nearly two years, and achieved nothing but cruelty. Before it a people ready to die, but neither ready to submit, nor weak enough to be conquered; and for its gloomy prospect an interminable war, growing more bitter and unfeeling every day, because more hopeless to them than that by it have sought things impossible as well as unrighteous. In the name of the great Prince of Peace, has Christianity, has civilization, nothing to say to such an awful tragedy! Such is the war for the Union! Yet every day our foes are deepening and widening that river of blood which divides us from them for ever!

The only change of opinion among our people since the beginning of the war, that is of material importance to the final issue, has been the change from all lingering attachment to the former Union, to a more sacred and reliable devotion to the Confederate Government. The sentiments of the people are not alterable in any other respects by force of arms. If the whole country were occupied by United States’ troops, it would merely exhibit a military despotism, against which the people would struggle in perpetual revolutionary effort, while any Southerners remained alive. Extermination of the inhabitants could alone realize civil possession of their soil. Subjugation is therefore clearly impossible. Is extermination desired by Christians?

The moral and religious interests of the South ought to be appreciated by Christians of all nations.

These interests have realized certainly no benefit from the war. We are aware that in respect to the moral aspects of the question of slavery, we differ from those who conceive of emancipation as a measure of benevolence, and on that account we suffer much reproach which we are conscious of not deserving. With all the facts of the system of slavery in its practical operations before us, “as eye-witnesses and ministers of the Word, having had perfect understanding of all things” on this subject of which we speak, we may surely claim respect for our opinions and statements. Most of us have grown up from childhood among the slaves; all of us have preached to and taught them the word of life; have administered to them the ordinances of the Christian church; sincerely love them as souls for whom Christ died; we go among them freely, and know them in health and sickness, in labour and rest, from infancy to old age. We are familiar with their physical and moral condition, and alive to all their interest; and we testify in the sight of God, that the relation of master and slave among us, however we may deplore abuses in this, as in other relations of mankind, is not incompatible with our holy Christianity, and that the presence of the Africans in our land is an occasion of gratitude on their behalf, before God: seeing that thereby Divine Providence has brought them where missionaries of the Cross may freely proclaim to them the word of salvation, and the work is not interrupted by agitating fanaticism. The South has done more than any people on earth for the Christianization of the African race. The condition of slaves here is not wretched, as Northern fictions would have men believe, but prosperous and happy, and would have been yet more so but for the mistaken zeal of the Abolitionists. Can emancipation obtain for them a better portion? The practicable plan for benefiting the African race must be the Providential plan—the scriptural plan. We adopt that plan in the South, and while the State should seek by wholesome legislation to regard the interests of master and slave, we, as ministers, would preach the word to both as we are commanded of God. This war has not benefited the slaves. Those who have been encouraged or compelled to leave their masters have gone, and we aver can go to no state of society that offers them any better things than they have at home, either in respect to their temporal or eternal welfare. We regard Abolitionism as an interference with the plans of Divine Providence. It has not the signs of the Lord’s blessing. It is a fanaticism which puts forth no good fruit; instead of blessing, it has brought forth cursing; instead of love, hatred; instead of life death—bitterness and sorrow and pain and infidelity and moral degeneracy follow its labours. We remember how the apostle has taught the minister of Jesus upon this subject, saying: “Let as many servants as are under the yoke, count their own masters worthy of all honour, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed. And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them because they are brethren; but rather do them service because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit. These things teach and exhort. If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness, he is proud, knowing nothing, but doting about question and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmises, perverse disputings of men of corrupt mind, and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness; from such withdraw thyself.”

This is what we teach, and obedient to the last verse of the text, from men that “teach otherwise”—hoping for peace—we “withdraw” ourselves.

The Christians of the South, we claim, are pious, intelligent and liberal. Their pastoral and missionary works have points of peculiar interest. There are hundreds of thousands here both white and coloured, who are not strangers to the blood, that bought them. We rejoice that the great Head of the Church has not despised us. We desire as much as in us lieth, to live peaceably with all men, and though reviled, to revile not again.

Much harm has been done to the religious enterprises of the Church by the war; we will not tire you by enumerating particulars. We thank God for the patient faith and fortitude of our people during these days of trial.

Our soldiers were before the war our fellow-citizens, and many of them are of the household of faith, who have carried to the camp so much of the heaven of Christianity, that amid all the demoralising influences of army life, the good work of salvation has gone forward there.

Our President, some of our most influential statesmen, our commanding general, and an unusual proportion of the principal generals, as well as scores of other officers, are prominent, and we believe consistent members of the Church. Thousands of our soldiers are men of prayer. We regard our success in the war as due to Divine mercy, and our Government and people have recognised the hand of God in the formal and humble celebration of His goodness. We have no fear in regard to the future. If the war continue for years, we believe God’s grace sufficient for us.

In conclusion, we ask for ourselves, our churches, our country, the devout prayers of all God’s people—“the will of the Lord be done.”

Christian brethren, think of these things, and let your answer to our address be the voice of an enlightened Christian sentiment going forth from you, against war, against persecution for conscience’ sake, against the ravaging of the Church of God by fanatical invasion. But if we speak to you in vain, nevertheless we have not spoken in vain in the sight of God; for we have proclaimed the truth—we have testified in behalf of Christian civilization—we have invoked charity—we have filed our solemn protest against a cruel and useless war. And our children shall read it and honour our spirit, though in much feebleness we may have borne our testimony.

“Charity beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.” We desire to “follow after charity;” and “as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God.”

NOTES.

1. In publishing the foregoing Address it is proper to declare explicitly, that its origin was from no political source whatever, but from a conference of ministers of the gospel in the city of Richmond.

The signatures are confined to this class because it was believed that, on the points presented, the testimony of men holding this office might be received with less prejudice than that of any other. These signatures might have been indefinitely increased. Only a limited number of names—much less than at first intended—was solicited; and as they are still coming in, some will probably be received too late for insertion. Those appended represent more or less fully every accessible section of the Confederacy, and nearly every denomination of Christians. They are ample for the chief objects intended, namely, to bear witness to the Christian world that the representations here made concerning the public sentiment of the South are true, and to carry a solemn protest against the continuance of this fruitless and unrighteous war.

2. From the best sources of information, it is ascertained that the whole number of communicants in the Christian churches in the Confederate States, is about two millions and fifty thousand.

Of these, the number of white communicants is about one million five hundred and fifty thousand. Supposing the total white population to be eight millions, and one-half that number to be over eighteen years of age, a little more than one-third of the adult population are members of the Church of Christ.

The number of coloured communicants is about five hundred thousand. Assuming the coloured population to be 4,000,000, there would be, upon the same method of computation, one-fourth of the adult population in communion with the Church of Christ. Thus has God blessed us in gathering into His Church from the children of Africa, more than twice as many as are reported from all the converts in the Protestant Missions throughout the heathen world.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

(From our Confederate Correspondent.)

[Although anticipated in date by the letter from Richmond, of May 12th, which appeared in our columns last week, the subjoined correspondence will be found to contain much of interest, and will amply repay perusal.]

RICHMOND, April 29.

To the great surprise, but entire satisfaction, of the Charlestonians, the enemy's attack on their city has not been renewed. After two years' preparation to reduce the Southern Sebastopol, and the concentration of an immense naval and military force within the waters and on the coast-line of South Carolina, the Yankees moved one fine day in majestic order of battle upon the entrance to the harbour with their frowning iron-clads, fulminated for a time at Forts Sumter and Moultrie, and withdrew. The King of France, with his 40,000 men, marching up and down the hill, was nothing to it. We are not told that his Gallic Majesty lost any of his so rapidly counter-marching forces, whereas the indestructible armada was very badly used, and the assailants left one of their vessels behind them. The result was similar to that of the battle of Fredericksburg. The "reconnaissance in force" constituted the whole hostile demonstration. It turns out that our engineers, Lee, Beauregard, and Ripley, made Charleston harbour a far more formidable line of fortifications than they themselves suspected. "They builded wiser than they knew." In the attack and the repulse, we are reminded forcibly of an incident in the memorable combat which Sir Walter, with his inimitable power, describes in the "Fair Maid of Perth," as having occurred between the clans Chattan and Quhele. The Yankees, borrowing from us the iron-plated war vessel, advanced with the confidence of Norman-man-Ord, bold son of Torquil, when he struck Harry of the Wynd on the throat with his own weapon, crying out, "You taught me the stab!" The Confederates, thundering back with their Brooke gun, and sending their steel-pointed bolts of Richmond manufacture through the thickest armour of the enemy's fleet, replied as Henry did, when he clove down his Highlander,—"Fool! you were taught the thrust, but not the parry!" It is amazing, however, in whatever light we may look at it, that an undertaking upon which so much money, skill, and labour had been expended, in which the pride and the reputation of the North were so deeply involved, and to which the Northern people were so strongly impelled by the powerful motive of revenge, should have been so lightly relinquished, and we cannot but suppose that the attack will be made a second time with the earliest frost of autumn. As six months are thus given to the Confederates to make still stronger what is already considered impregnable, it may be reasonably supposed that the second attempt will hardly be more successful than the first.

The military situation is not materially changed since the date of my last letter. General Bragg's army still remains at Tullahoma, in admirable discipline, health, and efficiency. For the present, its position is defensive, and it is believed that it will be able to hold Rosecrans in check, though his army has been largely strengthened of late, and the aggressive operations of the enemy during the summer months will doubtless be chiefly in that quarter. The Yankee General Grant yet threatens Vicksburg, and the enemy has succeeded in passing our batteries at different times with eight or ten gunboats and transports. This was done in the darkness of the night, under full pressure of steam, and with the favouring current of the Mississippi to accelerate the speed of the vessels, notwithstanding all which three or four of the gunboats have been sunk by our batteries. There are now between Port Hudson and Vicksburg twenty vessels of war and transports, from which we expect to hear at any moment, as making an attempt to open the communication with Farragut at New Orleans, but it is not believed that this attempt will succeed; and the reduction of Vicksburg, like that of Charleston, may be regarded as postponed till the coming of frost.

"Fighting Joe Hooker" remains on the northern bank of the Rappahannock, where President Lincoln has been to review his army, accompanied by Mrs. Lincoln, in a carriage drawn by four horses, à l'Empératrice, and Master Lincoln, in the saddle. The visit of the President was made for the purpose of endeavouring to induce the re-enlistment of the Yankee troops, whose terms of service are about to expire; but though he addressed them with accustomed Presidential jocularities and eloquence, he failed of his object, the waning patriotism of the "finest body of soldiers in the world" refusing to burst into flame at his presence and his pleadings. Truth to say, they were in little humour to be persuaded, and heeded not the voice of the charmer, charmed he never so wisely. And large reinforcements from Hilton Head have therefore already been sent to replace the regiments which are so soon to be mustered out of service. General Lee, meanwhile, is quietly but energetically making his arrangements for a summer campaign, which, with the efficient help of "Stonewall" Jackson, will not, when commenced, be without its stirring incidents. His army is in the best possible condition, with a commissariat greatly improved, and the men eager to follow their gallant leaders to the new fields of glory.

The immediate point of interest in Virginia for two weeks past has been the little town of Suffolk, which General Longstreet, to the intense consternation of the Yankees, has been investing. This unimportant place is the county seat of Nansemond County, and lies upon the right bank of Nansemond River, a tributary of the James, 28 miles by water from Norfolk, and 102 miles south-east of Richmond. Two railroads run through it, the Seaboard and Roanoke, connecting Portsmouth with Weldon in North Carolina, and the Norfolk and Petersburg, both of which have been used only for military purposes, since the evacuation of Norfolk and Portsmouth by the Confederates, and used by both parties, as far as they held possession respectively of the country through which the lines pass. Besides the Court House, clerks' office, and county gaol, and the shops, station-houses, and sheds belonging to the railroads, Suffolk contains 400 buildings, and a population of about 1,500. It had four houses of religious worship, which the Yankees have converted into hospitals or barracks. The inhabitants are as staunch and true to the Southern cause, as those of any other town in the Confederacy. The males are mostly absent, in the Confederate armies, or refugees from the Federal tyranny. Such as remain at home have either been forced to take the oath of allegiance to the United States, or locked up in gaol. When Suffolk fell into the hands of the enemy, they rebuilt the railroad between the town and Portsmouth—distance seventeen miles, laying down a second line of rails for greater facilities of transportation, and threw up very strong fortifications on the Richmond side of the town. Having command of the water approaches, in their gunboats on the Nansemond river, they rightly apprehended no attack in that direction, and upon the South they trusted to the impracticable nature of the Dismal Swamp (so well known in the verses of Tom Moore) which borders very closely upon Suffolk, as affording a natural and safe means of defence. The Federal force in Suffolk was about 30,000 men, under General Corcoran, at the moment of General Longstreet's appearance, but it has been largely increased by reinforcements sent from Fortress Monroe, and is now not less than 50,000. General Longstreet succeeded, after slight skirmishing with small bodies of the enemy thrown out to support their pickets, in gaining the rear of the town, and cutting off Corcoran's communication by land with Portsmouth—after which he began to annoy the gunboats on the river by continuous artillery practice on the part of the light batteries on shore, and would, perhaps, have interrupted entirely the water communication with Fortress Monroe, but for an unfortunate and unaccountable surprise, in the capture, by an overwhelming force, of Stribling's Battery, a most effective artillery corps, which had just been moved to a point on the river where it might do excellent work. On the night of Sunday, the 19th of April, three Yankee regiments crossed the Nansemond in transports some distance below the battery, and coming suddenly upon it from the rear, succeeded in taking the whole corps, with five beautiful pieces, three Napoleons, and two 24-pound brass howitzers. Captain Stribling maintained his ground gallantly until all hope of assistance was gone, and then surrendered his band of fifty-five men as prisoners. They were conveyed to Fortress Monroe, but were immediately exchanged, with the exception of the officers, and sent back to General Longstreet's lines. As the captives passed through the streets of Suffolk, the undaunted women of the devoted village rushed to the windows waving their kerchiefs in a transport of enthusiasm; old men came out and blessed them, and the enraged Federal officers vainly endeavoured to repress an exhibition of loyalty so perverse and unreasonable. The press of the Northern cities lay great stress on the retention of Suffolk, as indicating the superior prowess of the Federal troops; but the capture of Suffolk, which might be accomplished in three days by General Longstreet, if he were willing to sacrifice his brave soldiers for a place of no great military importance, was not the object of his recent movement, this having been undertaken for the purpose of procuring supplies from a region into which our quarter-masters and commissaries had not been able to penetrate. That a feeling of great alarm and demoralization among the Yankees was inspired by the movement is undeniable. General Vicks issued orders of the most panic-stricken nature from his Norfolk headquarters. General Corcoran himself would seem to have been greatly disconcerted, since his lively apprehension of personal danger led him to shoot and kill Colonel Kimball, an officer of his command, when riding up to him in the dark.

From Arkansas we have the best accounts of the large increase of the army consequent upon the arrival at Little Rock of General Sterling Price, whose presence beyond the Mississippi never fails to awaken the liveliest delight among a people that love him. The Missourians are pouring across the border to his standard in numbers that encourage us to believe that the old hero of Carthage and Lexington will soon be again active upon the theatre of his former successes.

While the masses of men under arms in the field are thus for the time unengaged in actual hostilities, or holding each other in check at various points, predatory bands of the enemy have been pushed, sometimes with singular audacity, into the Confederate territory, carrying desolation in their train. One such raid was made even into Central Alabama last week. The atrocities committed by men holding Federal commissions are unexampled in modern warfare, and we must go to the Palatinate to find anything like them in history. The character of Pope comes out in rather bright colours when placed in comparison, as charcoal was said to make a white mark upon the face of Ginger's sable mistress in the Ethiopian serenaders. Milroy is the man after the Yankee heart. The week before last he turned a most respectable family of Winchester out of doors, and took personal possession of their dwelling and furniture, for the heinous offence of having observed Jefferson Davis's day of fasting and prayer. A young lady of Winchester wrote a simple account of this nefarious transaction, which was notorious in the town, in a letter to a friend in Baltimore. But Milroy has a little habit—commendable as a measure of caution—of breaking open and reading the correspondence of young ladies (what is the sanctity of private correspondence to him?), and when his eye fell upon this imprudent but truthful statement of his misdeeds, he waxed wroth as a Tetrarch of Judea of old, and ordered the immediate arrest of the fair letter-writer. His agents went into the young lady's chamber and carried her off, without giving her time to pack up, to the Confederate lines.

In a former letter I set down at some length well-authenticated conspicuous instances of Yankee villany in the South. Give me leave to record another, which is worthy of Butler himself. At the beginning of the war, Judge Thomas B. Monroe was Federal judge for the Eastern District of Kentucky, and lived in great comfort about a mile and a half out of Frankfort. He had grown old in the service of his country. He was regarded by all as one of the ablest intellects, as he was one of the most incorruptible citizens of his State and age, and virtue might have secured him immunity from the general proscription of such as would not uphold the Federal Government. But Judge Monroe resigned his office in rebuke of the measures of Lincoln;—his two sons had entered the Southern army at the first sound of bugle; and so he was driven from his home into exile, leaving behind him two maiden daughters and a daughter-in-law, née Miss Grier, the daughter of Judge Grier, of Pennsylvania, member of the Supreme Court of the United States. Months of weariness and loneliness rolled by. The aged father, having served in the Provisional Congress of the Confederate States, retired to Mississippi, to live with a married daughter, herself an exile from the city of New Orleans; the two sons had fallen in battle, one on the field of Shiloh, the other in the murderous fray of Murfreesboro'; still the desolate ladies lived in the family mansion, where they managed with difficulty to keep up the establishment. One cold night in the month of March last, there came to the dwelling a band of Federal marauders, who burst open the doors, rushed into the sleeping apartments of the ladies, and dragged them from their beds, and taking the keys of the several rooms, began an indiscriminate pillage of the mansion. With a refinement of cruelty that would have become a fiend, the officer in command broke into the escritoire of the young widow, taking from it the portrait of her slain husband, and compelled her to listen while he read aloud, with ribald comments, the letters which had been written to her by the dead during the golden, happy days of her courtship. There, Mr. Charles Reade, is a "situation" surpassing any of the dramatic incidents of your exciting romances! I need only pursue the narrative, which here reaches its climax, by stating that the three poor women were turned out into the night, and compelled to walk to Frankfort for shelter, while riot and ruin reigned unchecked in the homestead of the Old Kentucky gentleman. The wanderers were not permitted to return. The two daughters were sent down the Mississippi under a flag of truce; the daughter-in-law was constrained to seek an uncongenial home among her estranged relatives in Philadelphia.

But, perhaps, the most flagitious outrage of the war, because committed under military orders, was the murder of the brave Captain Freeman in Tennessee. This officer commanded a battery in the army of Van Dorn, and was captured with several of his pieces in the attack on Franklin in that State. As the prisoners were on the way to the rear of the Yankee force, our cavalry determined to recapture the battery at all hazards, made a brilliant dash at the enemy, and pressed them hard. The Yankees, unable to meet this charge, ordered Capt. Freeman to resume the command of his guns, and use them against his companions-in-arms. To this inhuman demand, the gallant Freeman returned an indignant and scornful refusal; whereupon the cowards levelled their muskets at him, and he fell pierced by uncounted bullets. Such is the sort of warfare carried on by the "best Government on earth!"

In refreshing contrast with these atrocities, it gives me real pleasure to record an act of true heroism and magnanimity on the part of a Federal officer, which will be had in remembrance, let us hope, long after this sorrowful strife is over. Ten days ago, Lieut. W. F. Stone, of the 1st Maine Cavalry, was brought a prisoner to this city, having been captured in a skirmish near Bealton's Station, on the Orange and Alexandria Railroad, on the 16th of April, by Lieut. J. A. Payne, of the Black Horse Cavalry. While escorting his prisoner to General Stuart's headquarters, Lieut. Payne attempted to swim his horse across a swollen stream, but was swept away by the angry current, and was just about drowning, when Lieut. Stone jumped into the water to his rescue, and brought him safely to the bank. General J. E. B. Stuart, on learning the facts, wrote a letter to the Secretary of War, asking the unconditional discharge of Lieut. Stone, which was immediately granted. Upon his return to Washington City, finding that Lieut. Payne had been taken prisoner in the meantime, and was then in the Old Capitol Gaol, Lieut. Stone exerted himself successfully to procure his release. Such acts as these need no praise—they belong to the "courtesies of war," of which the Yankees have manifested so few in this unhappy struggle, and they give to Lieut. Stone a patent of nobility above stars and ribbons, and Legions of Honour.

The resumé of Congressional items may be made in a short space. The Bill for organising the Supreme Court and Court of Claims did not pass both Houses, as was erroneously stated by me in a former letter, but was postponed by the House of Representatives till the third Monday of the ensuing session. The Tax Bill as reported by the Conference Committee has become a law. Its most striking feature is taxation in kind, whereby one-tenth part of the crops and stock of agriculturists and graziers is taken in lieu of a moneyed imposition. This provision will save the Government the expense of impressment and much delay in the transportation of supplies, as the products can be accumulated more readily in the immediate neighbourhoods where they will be needed. An interesting debate sprang up in the House of Representatives upon the very day on which my last letter was dated, in continuation of a subject that had been previously discussed, that of Martial Law as connected with the conduct of General Hindman in Arkansas. Resolutions declaratory of the non-existence of Martial Law, as an arbitrary suspension of civil jurisdiction, under the Constitution of the Confederate States, were passed by a vote of 45 to 27. Some flagrant abuses having already been committed under the Impressment Law, whereby the Government was imposed upon by the appraisers of the vicinage, Mr. Wigfall introduced an amendatory substitute for the law which has passed both Houses, wherein it is provided that, in cases where the Agent of the Government shall object to the price set upon the produce impressed by the appraisers of the vicinage, he shall endorse his reasons on their award, and refer it to his Department; and the Board of appraisers, jointly appointed by the States and the Confederate Government, shall judge what price shall be paid. From their decision there shall be no appeal, and the Department shall settle the claim accordingly.

Since the date of my last letter the House of Representatives has lost one of its members, a young man of learning and ability, the Hon. William M. Cooke, of St. Louis, Missouri, who died on the 16th April, in Petersburg. Mr. Cooke served in the first campaign in Missouri, on the staff of General Price, and was honourably mentioned by him in the official reports of the several battles fought there. His death was announced in the House by his colleague, Mr. Vest, and tributes to his memory were paid by Messrs. Bell, of Missouri; Garland, of Arkansas; Price, of Kentucky; Currin, of Tennessee; and Chambliss and Baldwin, of Virginia. In the Senate Messrs. Clark and Peyton, of Missouri, and Johnson, of Arkansas, rendered their testimony to his eminent services and his personal worth.

A tragical occurrence of the most deplorable kind has disturbed the social order of Richmond within the past week. On Friday the 24th inst., Mr. R. E. Dixon, Clerk of the House of Representatives, was shot and instantly killed, in Bank-street, at half-past 1 P.M., in full sight of the Capitol, by R. S. Forde, his assistant journalizing clerk. Forde had been summarily discharged by Dixon for alleged neglect of duty, and sought this bloody redress of his wrongs, real or conjectural. The parties met by accident; pistols were instantly drawn, and six or eight shots exchanged, with the mournful result above stated. Forde was immediately arrested, and is now in gaol awaiting his examination. Comment upon this homicide, so startling, so causeless, so shocking to the moral sense of mankind, is unnecessary. Not until juries can be convinced that the safety of human life requires the infliction of the extreme penalty of the law in cases where the malice is apparent, will this resort to the pistol—this barbarism of the street fight—disappear from our society. Mr. Dixon was a Georgian, and was much esteemed by those who knew him well. Mr. Forde is a native of Kentucky.

We have the most cheering accounts of the condition of the crops throughout the Confederacy. A very large area has been sown with grain, and the prospect gives assurance of plenty. The soil has been tickled with the hoe (was it Douglas Jerrold who first said that?), and it is smiling with a harvest.

A sad accident occurred last evening on the line of the Danville railroad, thirteen miles above this city. The train was thrown from the track by coming into collision with a cow, and the result was the killing of two passengers, and the wounding of thirty-five or forty others.

Vice-President Stephens arrived in Richmond on Friday last. He is in excellent health.

A noble "Address to Christians throughout the World" has just been printed here, which must attract the attention of all thinking men in Europe. It bears the signatures of more than a hundred prominent clergymen of all denominations of professing Christians of the Evangelical Protestant Church in the South, and its positions are as calmly as they are unanswerably maintained.

The adjournment of Congress is fixed for May 1.

29th April, 10 P.M.

P.S.—Since the foregoing was written, despatches have been received at the War Department stating that General Hooker has crossed the Rappahannock at a point immediately opposite Hamilton's Crossing, five miles below Fredericksburg, with 40,000 men, while General Stoneman has passed with a considerable force at a point thirty miles higher up, in the neighbourhood of Gordonsville. Some sharp skirmishing with the enemy's advance guard occurred this morning, and our wounded have already been brought to this city. A general engagement cannot be delayed, it is thought, beyond three or four days, and the news of it may reach you via New York, before the receipt of this letter. The shock will be heavy, but we are confident. The issue is in the hands of the God of Battles.

In the evening Session the House of Representatives has just adopted the Senate's seal with the motto of Deo Vindice. May the selection of the motto be justified by the result of the impending struggle!

PROCLAMATION OF THE GOVERNOR OF MISSISSIPPI.

It will be seen from the subjoined document that at the beginning of May the authorities were expecting a severe contest in Mississippi:—

Executive Office,
Jackson, Mississippi, May 5, 1863.

To the People of Mississippi—

Recent events, familiar to you all, impel me, as your Chief Magistrate, to appeal to your patriotism for united effort in expelling our enemies from the soil of Mississippi. It can and must be done. Let no man capable of bearing arms withhold from his State his services in repelling the invasion. Duty, interest, our common safety, demand every sacrifice necessary for the protection of our homes, our honour, liberty itself.

The exalted position won in her name upon every battlefield where Mississippi's sons have unfurled her proud banner, and hurled defiance in the face of overwhelming numbers, forbids that her honour, the chivalry of her people, the glory of her daring deeds on foreign fields should be tarnished, and her streaming battle flag dragged to the dust by barbarian hordes on her own soil.

Awake, then—arouse, Mississippians, young and old, from your fertile plains, your beautiful towns and cities, your once quiet and happy but now desecrated homes, come and join your brothers in arms, your sons and neighbours, who are now baring their bosoms to the storm of battle at your very doors and in defence of all you hold dear.

Meet in every county with your arms; organize companies of not less than twenty (under the late act of Congress) forward your musket rolls to this office, and you will be received into the service with all the protection and rights belonging to other soldiers in the field.

Ammunition will be furnished you, and every aid in my power extended to you for your security and efficiency.

Fathers, brothers, Mississippians—while your sons and kindred are bravely fighting your battles on other fields and shedding new lustre on your name, the burning disgrace of successful invasion of their homes, of insult and injury to their wives, mothers, and sisters; of rapine and ruin, with God's help and by your assistance, shall never be written while a Mississippian lives to feel in his proud heart the scorching degradation.

Every moment's inaction and delay but strengthens your enemy and weakens your brothers in arms. Let every man, then, make it his business, laying all else aside, to assist in organizing as many companies as can be raised in each county, and report immediately to this office for orders. By this course you will enable our arms in a short time to repel the invader, secure the safety of your homes, and shed imperishable honour on your cause. You will not be without assistance. Let no man forego the proud distinction of being one of his country's defenders, or hereafter wear the disgraceful badge of the dastardly traitor who refused to defend his home and his country.

JOHN J. PETTUS, Governor of Mississippi.

THE NORTHERN PRESS ON THE DEATH OF STONEWALL JACKSON.

The New York Herald, in doggerel verse, pays the memory of Stonewall Jackson the tribute of its abuse, and in "Lines on a Dead Puppy" animates all that the vulgarity, bad taste, malignity, and cowardly slander, which have so long filled its columns, could have ever produced. No American gentleman in any Northern State—no one perhaps in any State, save some sexless New England vixen in petticoats or bloomers—can read without disgust and indignation of the gambols of an obscene beast of prey like that over the grave of the dead lion. Indeed, in the terms generally used by the Northern papers in reference to the death of the great American soldier, there is little left to be desired. We were not very apt to recognise the military merits of the giant Corsican when he was raging rampant over Europe and menacing our shores. But in the notices of Stonewall Jackson's death in the Federal journals there are traces of a certain national pride, for they still think the time will come when they can claim his State as part of their common territory. As well might we hope in some future war to regain Virginia, and arrogate Washington's birthplace as the spot where a celebrated British officer first saw the light. The North cannot undo the past; they cannot restore the Union as it was, any more than they can put back time and return to 1861.—Army and Navy Gazette.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

THE burden of the Northern reports about Vicksburg is that the situation is unchanged. The local position of the belligerents may be unchanged, the Confederates may still be besieged in Vicksburg, and the Federals may still be investing the place; but the situation is altogether different from what it was when Grant made his first attack, and when Admiral Porter informed the Federal Government that the capture of Vicksburg was only a question of a few hours. Then Grant thought that with his superior forces he could forthwith take the town, but all his assaults have been repulsed, and at the latest date from the Mississippi he had been for several days inactive. When Grant sat down before Vicksburg he or his sanguine friends boasted that if the assaults should fail, the garrison would have to capitulate from lack of supplies; it is now ascertained that Vicksburg can hold out for two or three months without being relieved. It was supposed that the safety of Vicksburg depended upon General Johnstone hastily collecting his forces, and falling upon Grant's rear. The Confederate General, down to the 30th of May—sixteen days after he had left Jackson—had not done so, and yet Vicksburg had not fallen. The contest is not over, and the Confederates are, as usual, anxious and still preparing for defeat, instead of following the example of the North, and discounting a victory. But can we wonder at their growing confidence as to the issue of the struggle? Vicksburg, unaided, has been able to resist Grant: will Grant be able to resist the defenders of Vicksburg aided by Johnstone?

Again the Federals have been disappointed in getting the Confederates to fight according to the Northern programme. Grant's scheme was for Johnstone to attack him in his rear with what forces he had; so that if Vicksburg did not fall either by assault or by the blast of the trumpet, and Johnstone was victorious, the Federal troops would achieve "a great Union victory" by changing their base of operations to the gun-boats. But where is Johnstone? How many troops has he in command? Is he marching on Memphis? Is he advancing between the Yazoo and the Big Black River, for the purpose of retaking Haines' Bluff and interrupting the Federal communication by the Yazoo River?

Grant can very well dispense with the presence of Johnstone. He has enough to do with Vicksburg. Already we hear of reinforcements being needed. No doubt they are very desirable. The Federal losses have been immense, even according to the admission of the North. After the assault on the 22nd of May, Grant commenced erecting earthworks for the protection of his troops. It is ominous to the Northern public when they hear of their Generals resorting to the spade. We do not suppose that the siege of Vicksburg will last during the greater part of the summer, as the New York World suggests. It is the hot season, and Grant would be attacked by an enemy more powerful than the sword and cannon, and which cannot be kept at bay by entrenchments. Far be it from us to say that the success of Grant is impossible, for in war all things are possible, but this we do say, that what he purposes to do must be done quickly. Delay adds to his difficulties, disease threatens to thin his ranks, and General Johnstone may at any time fall upon his rear or flank. The New York telegraphic despatch to the Southern Club at Liverpool, via the China, gives a credible version of the state of affairs as known in New York. It says,—“The siege of Vicksburg is progressing slowly and unsatisfactorily to the Federals. Grant's losses in the late assaults were heavy, and Mobile despatches say they exceed any of the Virginian battles. He had sent in a flag of truce to bury his dead. It is rumoured that half his artillery has been captured. The Federals admit they have taken no batteries, and that they cannot do so by assault. The fleet has suspended its fire upon the city. Two Federal gun-boats have been sunk.”

Vicksburg does not monopolise the interest of the war. Port Hudson has been attacked; and from the meagre accounts that the Northern authorities have allowed to be published, we must conclude that the Federals have been signally and disastrously defeated. On the morning of the 27th May, General Banks, having at least 25,000 men under his command, ordered an assault upon the works of Port Hudson. His forces were divided into three bodies. General Weitzel commanded the right, General Sherman the left, and Generals Augur and Grover the centre. We are told—but the information is rather superfluous—that the assailants met with a desperate resistance. The battle lasted all day, and the Federals admit a loss of from 2,000 to 4,000. Sherman's division was driven back, and General Sherman badly wounded. A negro regiment lost 600 out of 900 men; which the Northern Abolitionists, who hate the negro almost as well as they love fat contracts, will think some compensation for the loss of the battle. Our New Orleans correspondent, whose letter of the 29th of May gives particulars of the attack on Port Hudson, explains why the mortality was so great amongst the black corps. The negroes were put and kept in the front. The Northern soldiers might as well fight behind a regiment of school-girls. If they will have black soldiers, the white troops need not force them into the post of danger; and we believe the conduct of the Federal commander will cause lively indignation amongst his forces. Never since the commencement of the war have we read a Northern account of a defeat that was so little coloured. All the advantages claimed during the fight are a capture of a 6-gun battery by General Weitzel, and of some outworks by Generals Augur and Grover. It is rare, indeed, in the history of war, that even when unsuccessful, an assaulting army does not gain greater advantages during a long battle. The contest is said to have been renewed the next day, but the Federal authorities published no information as to the issue of the second day's fight, and we may be sure it was not in favour of the Federals. There is no doubt that the details of the battles on the 27th and 28th—if the engagement was renewed on the 28th—will disclose a brilliant Confederate victory.

Admiral Farragut co-operated with the land attack, and rather thinks he dismounted five guns in Port Hudson. For all the help he was to Banks, he might as well have been a thousand miles away from the scene of action.

The Confederate “iron-clads” which Porter claims to have destroyed at Shreveport were, as will be seen in our New Orleans correspondence, two small cotton-clad steamers.

The North is still speculating upon an advance of General Lee's army, and fears are entertained of an attack on Alexandria or Washington. The Federal Colonel Kilpatrick, who has been for some time lying at Point Gloucester, Virginia, has retired with his command to Hooker's camp. On his way he collected—so it is reported—200 horses and mules, 40 waggons loaded with provisions, and 1,000 negroes. The last booty will perhaps be put in the front of the next battle, as the negroes were at Port Hudson. The Confederates have attacked Franklin, in Tennessee, and it is reported they were repulsed. There has been heavy skirmishing at Murfreesboro'.

The spirit of the North is not yet utterly crushed by the despotism of Mr. Lincoln's Government. The Peace meeting, held at New York on the 3rd inst., was attended by a crowd of people, estimated at from 20,000 to 50,000. The speeches made by Mr. Fernando Wood, Judge McCann, Mr. A. S. Sullivan, and others, advocated peace on any terms, and some of them the recognition of Southern independence. Resolutions were passed with great enthusiasm, declaring that the Government has no constitutional power to coerce States by military force; that if the power of coercion exists it is of a legal and not of a military character; that the Democracy cannot sustain a war against sovereign States, and demands that it should cease; they asserted that the war was fast consuming all the resources of the country; that by its continuance the South and the North must alike crumble into ruin, and recommended in the name of the people the suspension of hostilities, and a resort to Conventions both at the North and South, to determine upon what conditions the contending factions might be reconciled. At the time we write we have only the telegraphic summary of the proceedings. We learn from it that Mr. Vallandigham's arrest and the exercise of military law were strongly denounced, and hopes were expressed that Vallandigham would be elected Governor of Ohio. It was admitted that the North has been beaten, and cannot conquer the South, that the people are tired of the war, and want peace. Mr. Fernando Wood declared that no man equal to the crisis had shown himself in field or Cabinet, and that no man had been found to raise the banner of peace; therefore, solitary and alone he put the ball in motion. Mr. Lincoln's Administration and General Burnside were hissed, and the names of General McClellan and Mr. Vallandigham cheered. The New York Herald says that the meeting was the greatest ever held in New York, and that such unmistakable bitterness of hostility to the Administration was never before recorded in American history. All agreed that it was time to stop the war. The Herald thinks Wood's speech statesmanlike and bold. The same journal observes that there are indications of a reaction in the public mind on the subject of the war and on the question out of which it arose, and says,—“All is now confusion; but order will soon be evolved out of the political chaos, and the counter-revolution will stand triumphant and acknowledged by all. The people have lost all faith in the efficacy of the war to restore the Union, and are preparing to try what virtue there is in peace.”

Mr. Fernando Wood certainly uttered more treason than Mr. Vallandigham, but he was not arrested and tried by a court-martial. On the contrary, he has had a long interview with Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Stanton.

General Burnside is obliged to rescind some of his arbitrary acts. On the 3rd an immense meeting was held at Chicago, for the expression of the public disapprobation of the order of General Burnside in suppressing the Times newspaper of that city and prohibiting the circulation of the New York World. Speeches were made by both Democrats and Republicans, which denounced the order as arbitrary and despotic. The House of Representatives of the Illinois Legislature passed a series of resolutions on the 3rd, also denouncing the action of General Burnside, and calling the attention of the Governor of the State to the violation thereby of the rights of the people, and demanding of the general Government that the order be revoked. Upon this, President Lincoln disapproved of the order for the suppression of the Chicago Times, and General Burnside revoked it, as well as an order for stopping of the circulation of the New York World, and even telegraphed to the World that he had done so.

A mass meeting has been held at Philadelphia, to protest against the arrest of Mr. Vallandigham. Very strong resolutions were passed condemnatory of the conduct of the Administration. The preamble to the resolutions concludes by declaring, "If military necessity can invade the borders of the Ohio, and there uproot the laws of a State whose soil is pressed by the foot of no public enemy, whose people are true and faithful to the Constitution, and whose justice was quietly and unobstructedly administered till military power expelled it, this same necessity may march on, and, coming into Pennsylvania and other States of the Union, reduce us to a vassalage infinitely more intolerable than that against which we revolted when we declared our independence on the 4th of July, 1776."

General Hunter, it is rumoured, has been removed from his command. He addressed a vulgar and insolent letter to President Davis, which, it is now said, he was wise enough not to send to Richmond. It is highly spiced with blasphemy.

The editors of the New York newspapers have called a meeting of all the editors to express their opinion upon the rightful limitation of the liberty of the press to discuss the conduct of the Government in war times.

The steamer Dolphin has been condemned at Key West, rifles and sabres having been found among her cargo. News from Havannah states that the Spanish steamer Union and the British steamers Hero and Eagle have been captured. The Diario Marina says the Hero was captured within sight of the Cuban coast. The Southern steamer Cuba has been chased, and burned to avoid capture.

It is reported that Richmond was illuminated on receipt of the news of the taking of Puebla.

Gold in New York, on the 5th June, was 46½ per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

One of the most interesting of British causes célèbres was decided on Monday last in the House of Lords; sitting not as the highest Court of Appeal in the land, but as a Committee of Privileges. Such a Committee is nominally one "of the whole House;" and at its sittings, as at those of the House in its judicial capacity, every Peer is entitled to be present and to vote. Practically, however, the legal functions of the House are left to the law Lords—of whom there are now a considerable number—that is, to those members of the House who have attained their peerage through judicial services, and who are of course among the most eminent lawyers in the country. The case before the Committee arose on the petition of the eldest son of the late Earl of Dundonald, who, as Lord Cochrane, served so brilliantly in the earlier part of the Napoleonic war, in command of the frigate Imperieuse, and whose gallantry and skill afterwards contributed so largely to establish the independence of Chili, Peru, Brazil, and Greece. His eldest son—the child once held by his mother at the gangway during a hotly-contested action, clapping his hands at the noise and flash of the guns—claimed the title; and his claim was disputed by his brother, Captain Cochrane, who denied the validity of their mother's first marriage, he himself having been born after a second ceremony had taken place. The certificate of the first informal, but legal, Scotch marriage was produced; the Countess, an old lady of 82, came forward to swear to its authenticity; and the circumstances which had led to the second and more regular performance of the ceremony were satisfactorily explained. Captain Cochrane's case was that his father and mother had forged the certificate; that his mother had been for years the mistress of his father; that she had avowed herself to be so; that his brothers were therefore illegitimate, and he himself, in law, the eldest son. To prove this case he brought forward Mr. Jackson, the Secretary of the late Earl, who made a series of most revolting and improbable charges against the Countess. In plain English, Captain Cochrane tried to prove his brother a bastard and his mother a prostitute of extraordinary shamelessness. For some reason best known to himself, he at last slunk out of the suit; and the inquiry being carried to the end, resulted in the complete establishment of the validity of Lord Dundonald's marriage, and the acknowledgment of the legitimacy of the present Earl.

The House of Commons has decided, in spite of its unprecedented ugliness, and of a very general doubt whether it can ever be made substantial or weather-proof, to purchase and put in repair, as a permanent receptacle for our multifarious national collections, the building which sheltered the International Exhibition of 1862. The leading men of both parties are among the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1861, and those of the later Exhibition, who have complicated interests in the land and buildings, of which they are anxious to divest themselves; so that it was hardly likely that any effectual opposition could be offered to the proposals of the Government. Also, it is believed that the appropriation of the site of Prince Albert's last achievement for a purpose so congenial to the labours and tastes of his useful life will be eminently agreeable to the feelings of our widowed Queen. Let us hope, in mercy to the loyalty and good taste of the gentlemen who opposed the vote for its purchase, that they were unaware of this suppressed but unanswerable argument in its favour. Her Majesty paid a private visit to the building on Friday last, for the first time. The visit appeared to afford much interest to the Queen. It is the first she has paid to any place except with a direct purpose of doing honour to the memory of her husband; and of course, it was the association of that memory with the Exhibition of 1862 which induced her Majesty to visit its empty and hideous shell.

The Marquis of Clanricarde called attention on Monday night to the reckless manner in which British merchantmen have been plundered by the Federal cruisers; but he elicited from Lord Russell only the old reply, that we must trust to the justice and impartiality of the Federal Prize Courts. This is a little too good, from the Minister who so contemptuously set aside the authority of the regular tribunals of Brazil, when their decisions did not happen to accord with the views of the British Ambassador. A more important disclosure is that provoked by the Marquis's denunciation of the blockade, viz., that it has been declared by the law officers of the Crown to be perfectly valid, and in accordance with the declaration of Paris. We wonder whether it ever happens that the legal advisers of the Government—like the medical advisers of some fretful patients—are influenced in their prescriptions by other considerations than those which can strictly be called professional? Does it ever happen that they give advice with as much regard to the wishes of the Ministry, as to the clear letter of the law? Nay,—does it ever happen that they give advice unpalatable to those who ask it? If so, it is never disclosed to the public.

Mr. Bright held forth, after the manner of the man, at a meeting convened to express the sympathy of some sort of English-born persons with Mr. Lincoln and General Butler. His speech was simply a repetition of his old falsehood, that the South had begun the war, had seized forts and arsenals belonging to the North, and forced the latter to "resist." But it contained the curious and novel proposition, that the conquest of the South and the abolition of slavery would further the growth of cotton by causing a rush of free white labourers thither. In the first place, the whites cannot work on the cotton fields. In the next place, they will not work with free negroes. In the third place, no means have yet been found, where the climate is genial and land abundant, of inducing free negroes to work at all. It is clear, therefore, that the abolition of slavery must turn the Cotton States into a desert—and that Lancashire must share their fate. And this Mr. Bright knows as well as we do.

Parliament has been more than usually busy this week. Mr. Coningham—to begin with the smallest topic—has had two excellent opportunities of provoking contempt and ridicule, and has availed himself to the utmost of both occasions. On Thursday night he put to the Prime Minister a question so utterly meaningless, and so signally offensive, that the latter neither would nor could give it a serious and relevant answer. He asked whether we ought not to extend our efforts to suppress the African Slave Trade to the American Continent; and whether it was not time to enter into negotiations with the Federal Government for the suppression of that trade in the Confederate States? The House was half-amused, and more than half disgusted; and Lord Palmerston rose, and with more civility than it deserved, "put the question by."

On the following night, the hon. member brought up the subject of the Mhow court-martial, and made a furious assault not merely on Colonel Crawley, but on Sir Hugh Rose, and on the Duke of Cambridge. As the notice which he had given had reference only to the case of Sergeant-Major Lilley, and he insisted on going into the whole story of the court-martial on Paymaster Smales, out of which that case arose, he was called to order. But the Speaker decided that on the question then before the House—that going into Committee of Supply, such a discussion could be raised without notice, and Mr. Coningham proceeded. No other man could have contrived to take up so strong a case and to make it so thoroughly unpopular with a House which, on the principal facts, was quite of his mind. But Mr. Coningham's reckless imputations against absent men, made without warning, provoked the severest animadversions from all sides; the House, like every other assembly of gentlemen, being intolerant of unfairness and surprises in matters affecting the character of gentlemen. Lord Hartington explained that the Duke of Cambridge had no control whatever over the proceedings of an Indian Court-martial; and Lord Palmerston rebuked the conduct of Mr. Coningham in terms of due severity.

The marriage of the Duc de Chartres, the brother of the Prince who is heir to the pretensions and misfortunes of the House of Orleans, with his cousin, the daughter of the Prince de Joinville, was celebrated on Thursday last, at the Roman Catholic chapel of Kingston, by Bishop Grant. The Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Princess Mary of Cambridge, called at Claremont after the ceremony. The Royal Family of England have never allowed political changes to interfere with their personal friendship for the members of the exiled family of France; and the Emperor has been wise—and may we not add, generous—enough to understand that such personal intimacy involved no want of political respect or courtesy towards himself and his dynasty, and has abstained from remonstrances which would be as futile and irritating as undignified. And there can be doubt that the private virtues of the House of Orleans are such as to entitle its exiled Princes to the friendly intimacy of the English Court.

The Prince and Princess of Wales underwent on Thursday evening a ceremonious reception and splendid banquet at the hands of the Merchant Taylors' Company—one of the most distinguished of the City Guilds. Several other Royal personages, and many of the principal statesmen of all parties, were also the guests of the Company. The Prince received the freedom of the Company. Ceremonies of this kind may serve no practical purpose, and certainly must involve a good deal of weariness to his Royal Highness; but they render no small service both to him and to his future subjects in bringing them face to face, and giving him an opportunity of enhancing and keeping fresh the loyalty with which the Royal Family are regarded by all true Englishmen. With a word and a smile a Prince or Princess may make a friend for life; and the loyal friendship of even such men as may be met and won at civic banquets is not to be despised.

Their Royal Highnesses have been present this week at the Oxford "Commemoration," the great annual festival of the University. The demonstrative loyalty of the undergraduates was as noisy as only English undergraduates, under the strongest stimulus which can be applied to their enthusiasm, know how to be. Lord Derby, as Chancellor of the University, delivered a Latin speech of great length and eloquence; and some luckless undergraduates recited congratulatory poems of unusual dulness, which, as usual, had not been accurately committed to memory. Altogether, the scene was very characteristic, and, to the Princess, must have been very interesting.

The act for the conscription of foreigners, passed by the last Congress of the Confederate States, failed to receive the President's signature.

EUROPE.

The arrival of General Forey's report has dispelled all doubts as to the capture of Pae la. Ortega first attempted to obtain a capitulation, which would allow his army to march out with all the honours of war, and all its arms and stores. Failing to obtain that, he destroyed, as far as he could, all his material of war, and surrendered on the 17th at discretion. The prisoners numbered more than 13,000 officers and men, and the material was but partially destroyed. The Emperor has written to General Forey to testify his satisfaction with the army, and his appreciation of its perseverance and courage. "I deplore bitterly," he adds, "the probable loss of so many brave men; but I have the consoling thought that their death has not been useless, either to the interests of France or to civilization. Our object, you know, is not to impose upon the Mexicans a Government against their will, or make our success serve the triumph of any party. I desire that Mexico may be born again to a new life, and that soon regenerated by a Government founded upon the national will, upon the principles of order and progress, upon respect for the law of nations, it may recognise by amicable relations that it owes to France its repose and prosperity." It is stated that General Forey will be made a Marshal of France, and General Bazaine a senator.

The general satisfaction with which this success—the more welcome on account of the gloomy reports which had been prevalent—has been received, has found voice especially in the Liberal and revolutionary newspapers, which insist that France is now set free to act on behalf of Poland. This view, however, finds no encouragement in the Government organs, which declare that the resources of France have always been abundant enough to maintain the national honour, in spite of the Mexican war; and assert that the Government entertains hopes of a pacific solution of the Polish question.

The supplementary elections have been favourable to the Opposition in Paris, where M. Gueroult, the editor of the Opinion Nationale, a journal supposed to speak the sentiments of Prince Napoleon, and a vehement advocate of war for Poland, obtained 17,000 votes to 11,000 given to the Government candidate; in the department of the Charente; at Havre; in the Seine and Oise; at St. Quentin; at Lyons, where M. Favre has been returned. The Government has carried its candidates at Bourdeaux, a very close struggle, the majority not exceeding forty; in the Haut Rhin and at Cambrai. We ought to mention also that an Opposition candidate has been returned in one of the electoral districts of Corsica. The joint letter of the bishops on the elections and the reply of the Archbishop of Tours to M. Rouland have been referred to the Council of State as an abuse of the Episcopal power.

A great deal of fuss has been made in French newspapers about an alleged outrage committed by an English cruiser, the Zebra, upon a French merchant vessel, the so-called whaler Leopard. According to the statement of the French captain—Cordier—he left Havre on the 16th November, 1861, and "after several fishing cruises, in view principally of a special scientific experience," he was obliged to put in at St. Paul de Loanda to procure fresh provisions. Having expended in this port 6,625 francs, he left it on the 13th of February. On the 15th he was brought to about thirty miles from land by a cannon shot, and boarded by the boats of the Zebra. He and his men were treated, he declares, with great brutality, and as he refused to show his papers his vessel was taken in tow to Congo. It was afterwards sent with a prize crew to Sierra Leone, where it arrived on the 2nd of April. During all this time, Cordier and his men were victims of the grossest insults and brutalities,—an account of which he has furnished to the Minister of Marine. Arrived at Sierra Leone he was not allowed to communicate with the shore. He was there two days; no communication was made to him, and no one would listen to him when "Heaven sent there the French vessel L'Africain." The commander of this vessel, M. Poisson, upon whom Cordier lavishes the warmest eulogium, went on board the Leopard, took the papers, and within six hours—"a delay, which I afterwards learnt, had been fixed by the honourable and brave commandant Poisson"—the English quitted his ship, and after fifty days of martyrdom he, with his crew, were liberated—in a very bad temper, and made the best of their way back to Havre, to tell their story and claim compensation. Some of the semi-official Parisian newspapers announce that the French Government has demanded reparation. Perhaps so, but it is not probable that it will persist in the demand. On his own showing, Cordier's misfortunes are entirely his own fault. He would not show his papers to prove that his vessel was French, or engaged in legitimate trade; and the general tone of the complaint is not at all calculated to induce belief in the accuracy of his statements. The captain of the Zebra tells quite a different story, as our readers will have seen by the statement of Lord Clarence Paget in our Parliamentary notes of last week. The Zebra saw the Leopard at the mouth of the Congo river, thought her a suspicious-looking vessel, and made signals to her to show her colours. After firing a shot, the Frenchman did so, but refused to show his papers, and prove that he had the right to hoist French colours. The Leopard was taken to Sierra Leone for adjudication in the Admiralty Court. Three days after its arrival the trial took place, when the French Consul brought the papers into Court; the vessel was at once liberated, and the Consul apologised for the conduct of Captain Cordier. We hear nothing in this version of the wonderful captain, whose ultimatum frightened the English, and of whom Cordier says, that the presence of a "few courageous and thoroughly French officers like him would bring to reason the impudent pride and savage arrogance of English officers." The story of experimental whale fishing off the coast of Guinea requires a robust faith for its acceptance. We are afraid that M. Cordier will find the English Government obstinate sceptics.

The Austrian reply to the propositions of England and France has reached London and Paris. It is described as in the main favourable; but Austria refuses to have anything to do with the demand for an armistice or a suspension of hostilities, and requires some modification of the clauses relative to a national representation and administration; the paragraphs relating to these points, as framed by England, being susceptible of the interpretation that a national army and separate finances are asked. We presume an understanding will be come to upon these points, but some days, if not weeks, must elapse before the notes reach St. Petersburg. The Russian Government will claim some time to consider its reply, and even if the terms should be decisive and preclude all further negotiations, no time will be left for France, if disposed to do so, to take any active measures on behalf of Poland. When the winter comes, and the Baltic is closed, Russia, secure against interference for several months, will crush the insurrection at any cost.

The National Government at Warsaw has made a grand coup. When the Government Treasury was examined the other day, it was found that a very large sum in Russian bank notes, Polish mortgage bonds, and gold half imperials was gone, and a receipt signed by the National Government left in its place. The books in which the numbers of the missing bonds were entered and four officials had also disappeared. The National Government is said to have been driven to this step by the impossibility of procuring funds. The people would obey its requisitions, enforced as they are with the penalty of assassination, but they profess not to have the means, and the rebel leaders are afraid to have resort to a general system of execution. Their system of terrorism seems, however, very well arranged; their decrees are carried out with very little delay, and they are evidently well served by the Poles in the employment of the Russian Government.

A Capuchin priest has been hung in front of the citadel at Warsaw. Archbishop Felinski is said to have protested against the sentence, and, in consequence, to have been arrested and sent to St. Petersburg. Another account denies the arrest, and says that he has only been sent for to St. Petersburg. It is announced that the Russian tariff is to be reduced.

The result of the Belgian elections has been, on the whole, unfavourable to the Government. It has gained four seats in the Senate—three at Ghent, one at Charleroi, and, consequently, will have, for the first time, a decided majority in that body; but it has sustained a net loss of six seats, or twelve votes, in the Chamber of Representatives, and thus will henceforth hardly have a working majority where it is most needed. This check is not, however, a sign that the clerical party is gaining the upper hand. Five of the seats were lost at Antwerp, where for some time some questions raised by the proposed extension of the fortifications, have been all-engrossing; and the rejection of the ministerial candidates is a protest, not against the general ministerial policy, but against the course the Government has pursued towards Antwerp on this local question. The new members for Antwerp will, however, vote with the Opposition, and for the present the result is the same as if the election had been dictated by a reaction in favour of the clericals. The Liberals also lose a seat at Bruges, where one of their leading men, M. Devaux, who had sat for the city since Belgium became an independent state, was defeated by the clerical party. On the other hand, the Liberals gain a seat at Ghent; on the whole, as we have said, they lose six seats. The contest, generally, has been very bitter, as is usually the case when the questions in dispute are religious, and the clergy mingle in the strife, and some fine samples of virulence might be gathered from the Belgian newspapers of the last two or three weeks. It is thought that the ministry, whose leading member, M. Charles Rogier, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, was defeated at Dinant, will be unable to maintain its position.

The Municipality of Breslau adopted an address to the King of Prussia, asking him to recall the press ordinances and convoke the Diet, and sent a deputation to Berlin to present it. The King refused to receive deputation or address. Warnings are falling like a shower in all parts of Prussia. The liberal journals, which are good properties, are showing that they consider discretion the better part of valour. They won't run the risk of suppression, and therefore confine themselves to the mention of facts, the retailing gossip at home and the discussion of foreign politics; the editors would be willing enough to brave Herr Von Bismark; but the proprietors do not care to incur the loss of their property. The reactionary journals, meanwhile, enjoy the fullest licence, and attack their liberal contemporaries and the deputies, who cannot reply in the grossest manner.

It is said by correspondents who have not the slightest means of ascertaining the truth upon such a question, that the King wrote the Crown Prince a very angry letter about his speech at Dantzic, and that the Crown Prince, with his wife's assistance, wrote a model letter in reply, adhering firmly to his views, and asking permission to leave Prussia and live in retirement. The story may, of course, be true; it is quite as likely to be an invention. The Queen of Prussia, who has liberal inclinations, is coming to England on a visit to Queen Victoria.

The Austrian Reichsrath is to be opened this day. The Emperor will be represented by his brother, the Archduke Carl Ludwig.

The Greek deputation has left Copenhagen. It does not seem to be determined when the King takes his departure.

Count Sponneck, formerly Finance Minister of Denmark, is, it is said, to accompany the young Prince as his Mentor.

The Portuguese Chambers have been closed, although the budget has not been voted. A more generally interesting, if not more important piece of news is, that the prospects of the vintage are very encouraging.

In reply to an interpellation in the Chamber of Deputies, M. Visconti Venosta, Minister of Foreign Affairs, said, "The cessation of the French occupation of Rome ought to be the object of all our efforts, but it is bound up in great questions of a more general character, which we must resolve in agreement with France. We do not wish for a halt in the pursuit of a solution; we are disposed to examine every proposition having for its object the application of the principle of non-intervention to the Roman territory, but we recognise the difficulties of the situation of France at Rome, and precisely because we take account of them, we have the right to reclaim more strongly against the facts—the protection given to Francis II.—which are an obstacle to the object of conciliation which France and we have in view. The divergencies which separate us from France ought not to be a motive for rupture. She, as well as we, has an interest that odious facts do not hinder much longer all possible agreement in the exasperation of opinion." With regard to Poland, the Minister said that Italy could not take her stand on the treaties of 1815, as England did; and he defended the policy of repudiating revolutionary sympathies.

A Royal decree has closed the University of Palermo during the current year, on account of acts of insubordination committed by the students. There are many other signs that Sicily is still in a very disturbed condition.

We are glad to see that Signor Peruzzi, the Minister of the Interior, has declared on behalf of the Government against the barbarous measure for the suppression of brigandage proposed by the Brigandage Commission, which we noticed a week or two since.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THURSDAY, JUNE 11.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

In a speech of some length, and of considerable ability, Lord Carnarvon called attention to the convention between Russia and Prussia, in regard to the Polish insurrection. Each of those Powers gave a different account of the Convention; each attributed its origin to the other; each professed to be willing to furnish a copy of it, but for the objections raised by the other. Prussia had endeavoured to persuade us that the Convention was a dead letter, and Lord Russell seemed to have accepted that statement. But it was not as a dead letter that it had been attacked by the Opposition, and defended by the Government in the Prussian Chamber; and he believed it to be in active operation. He asked the Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether he could give any further information on the subject.—Lord Russell said that he could not. The important part of the Convention related to the permission given to Russian troops to pursue Polish insurgents on Prussian territory, and this had been declared by M. von Bismarck to be a dead letter. He censured severely the policy of Prussia in the matter. After some remarks from Lord Brougham, the subject dropped; and their Lordships adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 11.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Coningham asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether the efforts which have been made hitherto by the British nation for the suppression of the African slave trade might not with advantage be extended to the continent of America, and whether the time had not at length arrived when it became the duty of her Majesty's Government to enter into friendly negotiations with the Federal Government of the United States for the purpose of concerting measures for the gradual but total suppression of the slave trade in the rebellious States of the South.—Lord Palmerston:—My honourable friend is aware that the Federal Government have concluded a treaty with the Government of her Majesty, giving a mutual right of search, for the purpose of suppressing the slave trade carried on under the Federal flag. The Confederate States have passed a law which renders the slave trade highly penal, but my honourable friend must be aware that the Federal Government have no relations at present with those States—except relations of war—which would permit any intercourse with reference to a mutual arrangement, such as that to which his question points. I may add that, as her Majesty's Government have not yet acknowledged the independence of the Confederate States, and that independence not being established in a way which would justify our interference, no diplomatic communications can take place between us and those States. If, however, in the course of time, things should alter, we should hope the Confederate States, if they should succeed in establishing their independence, would enter into arrangements on the subject of the slave trade, similar to those which the Federal Government has concluded. (Hear, hear.)—Mr. Coningham:—The question I asked was whether her Majesty's Government might not enter into communication with the Federal, not the Confederate, Government, for the suppression of the slave trade on the American continent.—Lord Palmerston:—I thought I answered that question when I stated that the Federal Government have no relations at present with the Confederate States, save relations of war—a fact which, of course, would render useless any action such as that to which my honourable friend refers.

On the order for going into Committee of Supply Mr. G. Duff called the attention of the House to the abuses existing in many endowed charities, with especial reference to their bearing upon the amount of the vote for elementary education.—Mr. W. E. Forster asked the Vice-President of Council upon what conditions he intended to allow the publication of the reports of her Majesty's inspectors of schools, for the information of the House.—Mr. Lowe said that the Council of Education produced all the reports of inspectors, with the exception of those which in the opinion of the Council ought not to be published. It was clear that no department of the Government could be efficiently conducted if its subordinate members were allowed to publish, without any check, opinions hostile to the policy of its chiefs; and the Council of Education, in suppressing portions of those reports, only exercised a right which was vested in every administrative body. With respect to the subject which had been brought under their notice by Mr. G. Duff, he had to state that he would not attempt to enter upon that occasion into a general discussion of the state of our endowed charities; but he should express his opinion that the duties of the charity commissioners were at present efficiently performed, and that it would be very undesirable to intrust those duties to a department of the Government.—Mr. Walter could see very little use in publishing any of the reports of the inspectors if all those which contained opinions opposed to those maintained by the Government were suppressed.

A discussion was next raised with respect to the period when the debate upon the Irish Church should be resumed. The O'Donoghue and several other members urged upon the Government the expediency of their granting a day for that purpose, while Lord Palmerston contended that the Government, who had themselves but two days in each week at their disposal, could not reasonably be expected to come to the aid of private members in a case of that description. The result of the conversation was to leave the subject in precisely the same position in which it had previously stood.

The House then went into Committee of Supply on the civil service estimates. Among other votes, one of £600,000 was taken for national education. The Chairman "reported progress" and after some further business had been disposed of, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 12.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Lord Chancellor directed attention to the state of the statute law, and laid upon the table a bill for its revision, which he observed was simply a revival of the proposals contained in Lord Bacon's "Essays on the Amendment of the Laws of England," and which, from the inertia attending all attempts to improve the legislation of this country for a period of two hundred and fifty years, had had no practical effect. The noble and learned lord complained that as the law now stood the mere opinion of a judge had the force of a legislative enactment, and that the judges, instead of sitting to expound the law, were, in point of fact, the law makers. He proposed that steps should be taken for weeding the statute book, expurgating such decisions as were palpably erroneous, and reconciling those which were conflicting; so that hereafter there should be one sound and certain guide. The object, then, of the measure he now laid upon the table was to secure the consolidation, arrangement and abridgment of the statute law; and if he were successful in inducing their lordships to read it a second time, he should next move the appointment of a committee to inquire into the subject. A short discussion ensued, in which Lord Brougham, Lord Cranworth, and Lord Kingsdown took part. The bill was then read a first time.

Some formal business was transacted, and their lordships adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 12.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Lord Palmerston stated, in reply to an inquiry of Lord R. Cecil, that there was no plan in existence for the conversion of the International Exhibition Building. All that was intended to be done was to complete the front, as it now stood, with stucco, and alter the domes from glass to brick. (The explanation of the Premier elicited the cry of "Oh, Lord!" from an hon. member below the gangway, which provoked a general burst of laughter.)

Colonel Dunne brought under notice the present depressed condition of Ireland and the amount of taxation imposed on that country, and moved for a select committee to inquire into the causes of such depression, and the effects of the taxation she now bears.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer, whilst admitting the existence of distress, and that it demanded the attention of the Government, declined to subscribe to the mover's description of its causes. Absenteeism was, no doubt, an evil; but he did not see how it was to be prevented, except by doing all they could to improve the social and economical state of the country, and treating it on terms of perfect equality with the rest of the kingdom. The consolation was that Ireland had been suffering from one of those visitations of Providence which came within the category of vicissitudes of the season, and which bore upon the face of it a temporary character; and he trusted that an improved temperature and climate for the next two or three years would more than replace to Ireland all that she had lost by the extreme severity of the past two or three years. As to the disproportional expenditure of public money, he found that, so far as the optional expenditure was concerned, Ireland enjoyed a share that it was difficult to account for when compared with either England or Scotland, and he contended that the hon. member was not justified in stating that she was liberally treated in that respect. On the subject of the taxation borne by Ireland, equality of fiscal burdens lay at the very root of full political equality, and without the former it was in vain to claim the exercise of the latter. To the influence of good and equal laws, then, they must look as the only means by which permanent benefit could be conferred upon the country. He was ready, however, to recognise the principle of greater liberality on the part of the Treasury in assisting enterprise in Ireland by loans of public money in cases where the security was unexceptionable. The appointment of a committee of inquiry at this period of the session especially was inexpedient, and could only excite hopes that would be sure to be disappointed.—The motion was also supported by Mr. Gregory, Sir P. O'Brien, and Mr. Cogan, the last of whom made a personal attack upon Sir R. Peel for taking part in a late meeting in favour of a proselytising movement in West Connaught, and declared that the interests of Ireland would be promoted by the removal of the right hon. baronet from the Irish Secretaryship.—Sir R. Peel said he had attended the meeting referred to merely to hear what was going on, and had only taken part in the proceedings when pressed to do so by the chairman, the Earl of Harrowby. With regard to the state of Ireland, he admitted that three successive bad harvests had created undoubted depression, but there was now every prospect of abundant crops in the coming autumn. During the last ten years emigration from Ireland had been carried out on a large scale; but the diminution of crime was to the rate of emigration as 400 per cent. to 12. This he took to be conclusive evidence that the condition of the country was steadily improving.—Mr. Whiteside regarded the speeches of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Chief Secretary as amounting to no more than this, that the Irish people ought to submit to the taxation which was imposed upon them, and make no complaint about it. He did not ask them to vote public money as a boon or favour, but to enunciate some principle or policy by which the resources of the country should be opened up and its prosperity encouraged. Neither Chancellor nor Secretary, however, appeared to entertain half an idea on the subject; and he contended that neither had succeeded in establishing a case against the motion.—After a prolonged debate the motion was withdrawn.

Lord Palmerston, in appealing to Mr. Coningham to postpone the motion of which he had given notice relative to the case of the late Sergeant-Major Lilley, urged as a reason why the honourable member should comply with his request that Colonel Crawley, of the 6th Enniskillen Dragoons, whose conduct was incriminated, was to be brought to a court-martial.

Mr. Coningham observed, that it was not only Colonel Crawley who was concerned, but two general officers and the Commander-in-Chief in India and the Commander-in-Chief at the Horse Guards were also gravely compromised in the matter. He then proceeded to detail at length the whole of the circumstances which had resulted in the death of Sergeant-Major Lilley, and insisted that the widest and most searching inquiry was demanded into the case, both in this country and in India.

The Marquis of Hartington deprecated the course pursued by Mr. Coningham, of commenting in such severe terms in their absence upon the Commander-in-Chief and the other distinguished officers to whom he had alluded. He also defended the memorandum issued by the Duke of Cambridge, and said he was sure the determination of his Royal Highness to institute a rigid inquiry into the case would give satisfaction to every one who had the welfare and the discipline of the army at heart.

The behaviour of Mr. Coningham, especially in attacking the Duke of Cambridge, who had no control over Indian courts-martial, was severely censured by Lord Palmerston and other members.

The subject then dropped, and the House shortly afterwards adjourned.

MONDAY, JUNE 15.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Marquis of Normanby expressed his regret that the Italian Government had not thought fit to liberate Mr. Bishop.—Lord Russell saw no cause for interference; and the subject dropped.

The Marquis of Clanricarde moved for papers concerning the protection of certain merchant-ships from American cruisers by British men-of-war, and the effect of remonstrances addressed to the Federal Government against the illegal seizure of British ships. He said that the present state of things in the waters of the Bahamas and the West Indies was most extraordinary. An efficient blockade was assumed to exist of a large extent of the American coast, and a considerable amount of British commerce was engaged in violating that blockade. Whether the trade with a nominally blockaded country was legitimate or not, might be doubtful, but besides this trade there had sprung up a large and perfectly legitimate trade with Mexico and our colonies which was intercepted by the Federal cruisers. We had submitted long to this; but the thing had got to such a height that, although the Government refused to admit the accuracy of the statements he had made, our own officers on the station had thought it incumbent on them to interfere for the protection of the interests of our commerce in a manner which was as contrary to international rights as the outrages which had been inflicted on our commerce by some of the Federal cruisers. On the last occasion when he had brought forward the subject he was told that he had no right to assume that the American Prize-Courts would not administer international law fairly and impartially. He did not mean to say that those cases would not be properly tried in the United States. His complaint was that the seizure of those ships was wrong ab initio, and he contended that we had a right to demand their restoration and an apology for the seizure. In this view he was borne out by the dicta of Grotius and other eminent authorities. British vessels had been seized on their way to British and Mexican ports, on the ground that they had contraband of war on board, and on other equally untenable pretences. In some cases British officers had done their duty by interfering; but in so doing they had clearly broken the law. The blockade of the Southern coasts was, if not illegal, at least of extremely doubtful validity. It did not seem to comply with the definition laid down by the treaty of Paris, and it certainly did not accord with the limits assigned to blockades by Mr. Monroe, when Federal Secretary of State.—Lord Russell said that the cases in question were under the consideration of Federal Prize-Courts, with whose decisions we could not interfere. As to the blockade, the law officers of the Crown had pronounced it valid in accordance with the Paris declaration; and the law laid down by Mr. Monroe, had been entirely contrary to the principles on which England had always acted and the precedents which she had established. The reports asked for were refused, and the subject dropped.

The Prisons—Ministers Bill passed through Committee, after an amusing speech from the Earl of Derby, who quoted some of the vituperations which he had received from both Protestants and Catholics, for saying that both religions "rested on the same foundation."

The Earl of Shaftesbury asked whether it was the intention of Government to institute any further inquiry into the case of Lieutenant-Colonel Crawley and Sergeant-Major Lilley, of the 6th Enniskillen Dragoons.—The Duke of Cambridge said the conduct and discipline of the Indian army rested with the Commander-in-Chief in India, and the Commander-in-Chief in this country stood only in the position of referee in the last resort. He had, however, considered it his duty to notice the proceedings in this case when they were officially brought to his knowledge. At the time his recently published memorandum was drawn up, he was not in possession of sufficient information to justify him in doing more than express a very strong opinion on the case. He did not then know of the illegal imprisonment of Sergeant-Major Lilley and certain other circumstances, which had since led him to direct a court-martial to inquire into the conduct of Colonel Crawley. He had no desire to screen any one; but it was his earnest wish that justice should be done to all, and he denied that he had suffered any pressure to be put upon himself in the matter.—The Earl of Shaftesbury expressed a hope that the court-martial would be held in England, as the case had been entirely prejudged in India, and a full inquiry would be satisfactory.—The Earl of Malmesbury believed that Sir Hugh Rose had been actuated by just and proper motives in the part which he had taken in this matter, and that inquiry would show that the blame, if any, did not rest with him.

MONDAY, JUNE 15.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In Committee of Supply, Lord Palmerston rose to propose a vote of money for the purchase of the Exhibition building and lands at South Kensington. In doing so, he observed that the immediate objects for which the Government desired to make the purchase were an addition to the British Museum, and the extension of the Patent Office and Museum, and the Portrait Gallery; and supposing that the land were to be acquired in a more central position, eight acres—which was the smallest estimate—and buildings would cost £1,500,000; five acres, £1,107,000; and three acres—the lowest estimate—£750,000. In contrast with this, the proposal he had now to make was a very economical one, and would give a greater command of space at much less cost. He proposed, then, that the public should purchase seventeen acres of the land belonging to the Commissioners of the International Exhibition, and which was covered by the building in which the late Exhibition was held. For that land the Commissioners were willing to take £120,000, and £80,000 for the building thereon, so that for £200,000 the nation would enter into possession of the whole. To make the building substantial, however, would require £154,000; the conversion of the two glass domes into brick would cost £40,000; the stucco ornamentation of the fronts £45,000, and other improvements and alterations would bring the total to £484,000. He assumed that the whole building should be repaired, made solid, and adapted to the purposes for which it was wanted. For the present, however, not more than one-half the structure would be required to be so treated. That being the case, the £284,000 in excess of the purchase-money might be equally divided, so that £142,000 was all that need be spent for the next year; which, added to the £200,000 for land and building, would come to £342,000, as against £750,000 if the land were bought in the centre of the metropolis on the smallest scale—three acres—on which an estimate had been made. It was not intended to remove the National Gallery from Trafalgar-square, nor to send the learned bodies to Kensington. In conclusion, the noble lord moved a vote of £67,000 on account.—After a long debate the vote was carried. Ayes 267, noes 135. Several other discussions took place, and the House finally adjourned at a quarter past two.

TUESDAY, JUNE 16.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Only formal business was transacted, during a sitting of some twenty minutes.

TUESDAY, JUNE 16.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

At the morning sitting, 12 to 4 o'clock, the Irish Fisheries Bill was considered in Committee.

At the evening sitting, 6 o'clock, Mr. Berkeley brought forward his annual nuisance—a motion for leave to bring in a Bill to establish vote by ballot. He adduced all his old and well-worn arguments in support of secret voting, and combated those which had been adduced against it by Lord Palmerston and other of its opponents. With regard to the objection of the Premier, that the elector was a trustee for the non-electors to whom he was responsible, and that, therefore, open voting was a necessity, it reminded him forcibly of Stephano and Trineulo in the play, where the latter exclaims, "Stephano shall be king of this island, and I will be vicerey over him." At the present moment the ballot was bearing excellent fruit in every part of the world where it had had a fair trial. Even in America it was the great defence of respectability against a wild democracy, and through its means only could they hope to upset Abraham Lincoln and his crew. Within the last few days we had also seen in France the Government nominees defeated by its agency and operations.—The Lord Mayor condemned the arguments of Mr. Berkeley as a tissue of fallacies, and observed that if a reason were wanted against the unconstitutional and un-English practice of the ballot, no more convincing illustration could be found than the examples of America and France.—Lord Palmerston, in opposing the motion, said that if the ballot were adopted in this country, it would have the effect of nullifying public opinion by crushing it in each individual, and that would be both un-English and contrary to the spirit and essence of the constitution, of which public opinion was the very life. As to the ballot in America, elections were no more conducted by secret voting there than in England. That the cause of the ballot was not making progress in this country was rendered pretty apparent by what had lately taken place at the Reform Club. In that institution, as in others of the same kind in London, the method of electing members had up to the present time been by ballot; but very recently, after full discussion, and upon the advice of that eminent reformer the hon. member for Birmingham, they had decided that election by ballot was not a proper mode of proceeding. Indeed they had gone further than that, and converted the club into the resemblance of a nomination borough, for they had invested a select committee with the choice of members.—Mr. Cox spoke in support of the motion; and after a brief reply from Mr. Berkeley, upon a division the motion was negatived by 122 to 102.

The House was shortly afterwards counted out.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 17.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The debates were of no public interest.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, June 17.

Our last report closed on a dull market, with little disposition on the part of spinners to buy except for their immediate wants.

On Thursday a more cheerful view was taken of the position of affairs at Vicksburg, and the impression became stronger that the Confederates would there hold their own; the tone of our market accordingly improved, and with less irregularity in prices 6,000 bales were sold. This good feeling was maintained on Friday and Saturday, when a like amount changed hands.

On Monday the market opened with a good demand, and full prices were paid, the sales reaching 7,000 bales.

On Tuesday a better feeling prevailed in Manchester, and though the business there was limited, more disposition to operate was apparent, and the despondency of last week had passed away. The market here to-day has been quiet under the Etna's news; but prices are unchanged. We quote Middling Orleans 22½d., Fair Egyptian, 21½d., Fair Dholerah and Omarawuttee, 18½d., and Fair Sawginned Dharwar, 19d.

On the Mississippi the Confederates still hold their own, and the predictions of its being reopened to trade appear to be still far from fulfilment. Vicksburg had proved impregnable by assault, while Port Hudson's garrison had disastrously repulsed the Federal attacking force. Washington was again in alarm regarding the movements of General Lee, and a Northern invasion was considered not improbable.

While the Northern armies were thus either meeting with reverses or threatened on their own ground, a great meeting of the Democratic party had taken place at New York, where peace resolutions were passed and the policy of the Government condemned. It is to be feared, however, that those who composed this great assemblage held sentiments regarding the war that are still far from popular in the North.

The war fever seems to rage more and more fiercely among the people generally, and their determination still to prosecute this unhappy struggle and again place a hated yoke on their brethren, is evinced by their tacit submission to an almost military despotism at home.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, June 16.

Since our last report our market has exhibited more firmness from day to day as each successive steamer has arrived from America, bringing nothing definite as to the result of General Grant's operations before Vicksburg, and to an increasing feeling of certainty in the minds of people, of the inability of the Federals to take it; but still, until we have indisputable intelligence of the Federals being entirely routed, there will be a disinclination on the part of buyers to enter into transactions of any magnitude.

Our Indian advices, received during the week, have also a depressing influence on our market, no business of any moment going on there, and with little prospect of any for a month or so to come, as the holidays are on.

Home trade yarns have about recovered their fall of the week previous, but not much business can be reported, holders being very independent, and not caring to sell for the present.

Continental shipping yarns have been very quiet, with the exception of No 16s to 80s pincops in casks, which are in better demand, and for which extreme prices are being paid.

In cloths there is a small demand for light goods, such as mulls, jaconets, and Scotch printers, for which good prices can be obtained to make.

Some descriptions of home trade cloths are in better request, but in India shirtings, with the exception of 6lbs., we can report no business.

LATEST SOUTHERN INTELLIGENCE.

Our New Orleans Correspondent sends us the following:—

A single copy of the Mobile News of the 25th inst., reached this city on Wednesday night, via Pascagoula and the Lake. A part of the news appeared in one of the city papers, but the following despatches were suppressed. They may have reached you already from Richmond.

"JACKSON, Mississippi, May 24. "To Captain Marshall:—Lieutenant-Colonel Locklet has arrived from Vicksburg, having been sent out by General Pemberton. The following account of events is from information received from him:—

"Monday, May 18, passed off with sharp shelling.

"Tuesday, 19. The enemy attacked General Pemberton's left and centre four times. The first assault lasted 30 minutes; the second, 20 minutes; the third, 15 minutes; the fourth, 9 minutes: each time the enemy was repulsed with great slaughter.

"Wednesday, 20. The column of assault was brought up, the officers leading. The troops broke and disappeared.

"Thursday, 21, was passed by the enemy in shelling, Pemberton not replying, telling his men not to unnecessarily throw away their ammunition. The Federal dead were still unburied.

"Thursday night. Our works in the direction of Warren-ton have not been assailed. The Federal lines are not perfect. Ten 'contrabands' were bagged at Kenyon's, and were set to work upon the fortifications here.

"They made six assaults in all, and were repulsed with great slaughter. The Confederates are re-occupying Snyder's Bluff."

The annexed despatches and letters in the Mobile News of the 25th, were published in New Orleans papers:—

JACKSON, May 23.—The enemy having moved from Jackson directly to the Big Black, after the disasters of Saturday, or more particularly that of Sunday, threw his columns across the river, and commenced extending his lines around Vicksburg. Our forces evacuated Snyder's Bluff, destroying the works.

This opened up the Yazoo to the enemy, who immediately availed himself of the advantage, and entering the river, ascended it to Yazoo City and took possession, our forces destroying the navy yard and the two embryo gun-boats in course of construction there, and which would have been finished in some six or eight months. This enables Grant to supply his army without the necessity of using his wagon road from Milliken's Bend to Carthage, or of the gun-boats running the gauntlet of the Vicksburg batteries, as the transports can go up the Yazoo and safely land whatever is needed. Vicksburg being nearly or completely invested, you will see that it is with much difficulty that any information can be obtained from that point.

On the 12th General Pemberton issued the following address to his army:—

Head-quarters' Department of East Mississippi and Louisiana, Vicksburg, May 12, 1863.

Soldiers of the Army in and around Vicksburg:—The hour of trial has come! The enemy, who has so long threatened Vicksburg in front, has at last effected a landing in this Department, and his march into the interior of Mississippi has been marked by the devastation of one of the fairest portions of the State. He seeks to break communication between the members of the Confederacy, and to control the navigation of the Mississippi river. The issue involves everything endeared to a free people. The enemy fights for the privilege of plunder and oppression. You fight for your country, homes, wives, children, and the birthrights of freemen. Your commanding general, believing in the truth and sacredness of this cause, has cast his lot with you, and stands ready to peril his life and all he holds dear for the triumph of the right! God, who rules in the affairs of men and nations, loves justice and hates wickedness. He will not allow a cause so just to be trampled in the dust. In the day of conflict let each man, appealing to Him for strength, strike home for victory, and our triumph is at once assured. A grateful country will hail us as deliverers, and cherish the memory of those who may fall as martyrs in her defence.

Soldiers! be vigilant, brave and active; let there be no cowards, nor laggards, nor stragglers from the ranks, and the God of battles will certainly crown our efforts with success.

J. C. PEMBERTON, Lieut.-General Commanding.

News has been received up to Wednesday night from Vicksburg by courier, at which time the enemy had made three separate and distinct assaults on the works, and had been severely punished. That night Captain Stevens ran out six or seven hundred mules, and brought them here, which is a splendid reinforcement for Johnston, and helps the storehouse of Pemberton. Vicksburg has full rations for ninety days, or half rations for 180 days.

I learn that the garrison is sufficiently strong to resist the enemy. If so, the worst is over, and I hope soon to be able to announce to you that the grand Federal demonstration to open the Mississippi has proved a great failure.

From the measured booming of heavy guns in the direction of Vicksburg, it is evident that the enemy is shelling the city. I am in good hopes, although affairs look serious. If Vicksburg does not fall, in a few days all will go well.

I have other news, but for good reasons I will not send it forward. Troops are continually arriving, and we will soon have a fine army here. Jackson is being fortified.

JACKSON, May 23.—The latest advices from Vicksburg are to Thursday night, at which time the enemy had been foiled in all their attempts to take the city or works.

One estimate places their loss in killed and wounded at ten thousand. Our loss is slight, and the injury to the batteries trifling. Our garrison is well supplied, and all are confident of holding the place. The enemy's dead strew the ground opposite the works.

CHARLESTON, May 22.—The steamship Beauregard, from Nassau, on the 20th, arrived this morning, with a very large and valuable cargo.

CHARLESTON, May 23.—The beautiful steamship Orion, from Nassau, arrived here last night.

The steamer Atlantic, another blockade runner, has arrived at Nassau, from England.

The steamers Antonio and Calypso went to sea safely last night.

MR. MASON AND THE AGENT OF THE NORTHERN ABOLITIONISTS.

(To the Editor of The Times.)

Sir,—As part of the political history of the times, the correspondence transmitted herewith may have sufficient significance to call for its publication.

I submit it to you accordingly for a place in your columns.

I am, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
24, Upper Seymour-street, Portman-square, June 17, 1863.

"Aubrey-house, Notting-hill, London, W.,
June 10, 1863.

"Sir,—I have authority to make the following proposition on behalf of the leading Anti-slavery men of America, who have sent me to this country.

"If the States calling themselves 'The Confederate States of America' will consent to emancipate the negro-slaves in those States, such emancipation to be guaranteed by a liberal European commission, the emancipation to be inaugurated at once, and such time to be allowed for its completion as the Commission shall adjudge to be necessary and just, and such emancipation once made to be irrevocable,—then the Abolitionists and Anti-slavery leaders of the Northern States shall immediately oppose the prosecution of the war on the part of the United States' Government, and, since they hold the balance of power, will certainly cause the war to cease by the immediate withdrawal of every kind of support from it.

"I know that the ultimate decision upon so grave a proposition may require some time; but, meanwhile, I beg to be informed, at your early convenience, whether you will personally lend your influence in favour of a restoration of peace and the independence of the South, upon the simple basis of the emancipation of the slaves.

"Any guarantee of my own responsibility, and my right to make this offer shall be forthcoming.

"I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

"J. M. Mason, Esq." "MONCURE D. CONWAY.

"24, Upper Seymour-street, Portman-square,
June 11, 1863.

"Sir,—I have your note of yesterday. The proposition it contains is certainly worthy of the gravest consideration, provided it is made under a proper responsibility. Yet you must be aware that, while you know fully the representative position I occupy, I have not the like assurance as regards yourself.

"If you think proper, therefore, to communicate to me who those are on whose behalf and authority you make the proposition referred to, with the evidence of your 'right to make this offer,' I will, at once, give you my reply, the character of which, however, must depend on what I may learn of your authority in the premises.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"Moncure D. Conway, Esq." "J. M. MASON.

"Aubrey-house, Notting-hill, W., June 16, 1863.

"Sir,—Your note of the 11th has been received. "I could easily give you the evidence that I represent the views of the leading Abolitionists of America, but with regard to the special offer which I have made, I have concluded that it was best to write out to America and obtain the evidence of my right to make it in a form which will preclude any doubt as to its sufficiency.

"I shall then address you again on the subject.

"I am, &c.,

"J. M. Mason, Esq." "MONCURE D. CONWAY.

"24, Upper Seymour-street, Portman-square,
June 17, 1863.

"Sir,—I have received your note of yesterday. "You need not write to America to 'obtain the evidence' of your right to treat on the matter it imports. Our correspondence closes with this reply. It was your pleasure to commence it, it is mine to terminate it.

"I desired to know who they were who were responsible for your mission to England, as you present it; and who were to confirm the treaty you proposed to make for arresting the war in America, on the basis of a separation of the States, with or without the sanction of their Government. But such information is of the less value now, as I find from an advertisement in the journals of the day that you have brought to England letters of sufficient credit from those who sent you to invite a public meeting in London, under the sanction of a member of Parliament, who was to preside, to hear an address from you on the subject of your mission, with the promise of a like address from him.

This correspondence shall go to the public, and will find its way to the country, a class of the citizens of which you claim to represent. It will, perhaps, interest the Government and the so-disant "loyal men" there to know, under the sanction of your name, that the "leading Anti-slavery men in America" are prepared to negotiate with the authorities of the Confederate States for "a restoration of peace and the independence of the South on a pledge that the Abolitionists and Anti-slavery leaders of the Northern States shall immediately oppose the further prosecution of the war on the part of the United States' Government, and since they hold the balance of power will certainly cause the war to cease by the immediate withdrawal of every kind of support from it."

As some reward, however, for this interesting disclosure, your inquiry whether the Confederate States will consent to emancipation on the terms stated shall not go wholly unanswered. You may be assured, then, and perhaps it may be of value to your constituents to assure them, that the Northern States will never be in relations to put this question to the South, nor will the Southern States ever be in a position requiring them to give an answer.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

J. M. MASON.

Moncure D. Conway, Esq.

HOW OLD SMITH ESCAPED.—"Old Smith," an old German drummer in the 16th Mississippi regiment, was notorious for straggling on the march; whether advancing or retreating, he was always in the rear. In General Jackson's great retreat from the Valley of the Shenandoah, after whipping Banks, old Smith got some miles behind, and while sitting on the road side, solitary and alone, resting and eating his beef and biscuit, he observed a full regiment of Yankee cavalry approaching. He jumped out into the woods, and as the Yankees came near, he thundered away on his drum, beating the long roll with a terrible vim. [The long roll is the signal of an enemy at hand, and to form the line of battle.] His trick was successful; for the Yankees, supposing, of course, that there was an infantry regiment lying in the thicket, faced about and skedaddled in regular Bull Run style. Old Smith, replacing his drum on his shoulder, came out into the road again with his beef and biscuit in one hand and drumsticks in the other, and resumed his march with his usual equanimity.

THE APPEAL OF THE CONFEDERATE CLERGY.

(From the Morning Herald of June 15.)

It is not without just reason, and we trust that it will not be without good effect, that an earnest appeal has been addressed to the Christian world at large, by a number of divines of various religious denominations on behalf of their countrymen of the Confederate States. The utter ignorance of American affairs and American character which, until the outbreak of the present war, was so prevalent in England, has given to the advocates of the Northern cause facilities for falsehood of which they have made diligent use; and they have contrived, by skillful misrepresentation, to enlist on their side the sympathies of a good many persons, and to deprive the South of the good-will of many more, merely because Englishmen have failed to understand the wide distinction which exists between parties bearing the same title in England and in America. In this country the leaders of the anti-slavery movement belonged to a party which was equally earnest in its labours for the revival of religion; and though it would be very difficult to trace any relation between the peculiar form of their Christian faith and their zeal in the cause of abolition, it has become a part of the creed of their countrymen that Abolitionism and Evangelical Christianity are in some way or other, if not identical, at least intimate and inseparable articles of faith. In America this is not the case. The cause of Abolition has been chiefly espoused by the same class of persons who have espoused with equal earnestness heresies of a kind unparalleled since the decay of those extravagant mixtures of Christianity and heathenism which perplexed the earliest age of the Church. The leading preachers of emancipation have been in some few cases Socinians and Universalists, but for the most part open and avowed unbelievers; their followers have been recruited among the votaries of Shakerism, Communism, Woman's Rights, and "Free Love," who are like among the mongrel population of the Northern States; and Abolitionism was, until lately, regarded by sober Christians in America as one among the many forms of rebellion against Divine Revelation and social order which have sprung from the unbidded licence of a wild and lawless Democracy. There it has been as closely identified with unbelief as here with belief of a strict and peculiar form, and for a Wilberforce and a Buxton its champions have been a Garrison and a Theodore Parker. This is one point on which Yankee ingenuity has deceived the credulity and misled the sympathies of religious but uninformed Englishmen. Another delusion, still more prevalent, has been, that the North was, and that the South was not, a religious country; that piety and virtue were to be sought for in the camp of Butler, and Bleeker, and Joe Hooker, rather than in that of Lee and Stonewall Jackson. The truth is exactly the reverse of this. There has, perhaps, been less in the South of that narrow, pharisaic, intolerant Puritanism which distinguished the founders of Massachusetts, and is not yet extinct in New England; but the Southerners have been always an earnestly and devoutly Christian people, among whom the loathsome doctrines preached so freely and so widely accepted in the North have never found favour; by whom Mormonism and Free-Love have been scouted with indignation and disgust; and among whom no man who valued his peace and social position would dare to treat with irreverence the ordinances or the ministers of religion. Even that institution which most provokes the indignation of religious Englishmen has never been defended in the South save on Christian grounds; and it has been left for the Abolitionists to postpone the authority of Revelation to their peculiar doctrine, and to cry out for "an anti-slavery Church, an anti-slavery Bible, and an anti-slavery God." No similar blasphemy would have found toleration from any Southern audience. It is not the countrymen of Garrison and Channing, but those of Stonewall Jackson and George Washington, who have the highest claim on our feelings of Christian sympathy and Christian brotherhood.

As the Southern clergy justly remind us, their claim has been only for their own freedom; their demand has been but the legitimate and truly Christian one, that they should be allowed amicably to part from associates with whom it was no longer possible to live in amity under a common government. They have not risen in rebellion against a sovereign claiming rule over them by any title whatever; they have merely expressed their determination to sever a bond which, instead of uniting in friendship States of kindred blood and common feeling, had become to them a hateful and intolerable yoke. They asked only, as the Israelites asked of old, that they should be allowed to "depart in peace;" they strove to the last to secure this end; they offered terms to which no fair exception could be taken; and they drew the sword only when the enemy had already launched an armed force against one of their chief cities, not less in violation of law than of his own plighted faith. Three of the States now included in the Confederacy only withdrew when President Lincoln demanded their assistance for the subjugation of their brethren—when peace was no longer possible, and their only choice lay between a war of conquest and a war for independence. Not the South, but the North, in despite of every effort to avert a collision, insisted on war, and invoked on their own heads the condemnation of a religion which declares that "they who take the sword shall perish by the sword."

If the conduct of the North at the commencement of the struggle savoured rather of heathen ambition and lust of dominion than of Christian equity and forbearance, the spirit in which the war has been waged by the aggressors is yet more utterly at variance with every humanising rule and restraint, which Christian civilization has introduced to soften the ancient savagery and brutality of warfare. From the first these rules were set at naught by the passion of the populace, and denounced alike by the press and by the pulpits of the Northern States. Secret incendiarism, and the encouragement of servile insurrection—that is to say, of domestic treason, massacre, and rapine—were the weapons on which the Abolitionists chiefly relied; and it was not any sentiment of humanity or any Christian scruple, but simple fear of retaliation, which prevented the Northern Government from carrying out its expressed intention of hanging Southern seamen as pirates, in obedience to the clamour of the New York rabble. As the war has proceeded its conduct, on the part of the North, has grown more and more savage and sanguinary. Open towns have been sacked and burnt; defenceless citizens have been murdered in cold blood, sometimes on their own threshold and in sight of their wives and children; women have been outraged and homes plundered and destroyed, not in the fury of a successful assault, but in places where no resistance has been offered or has been possible. Expeditions have been sent out, not to intercept supplies, not to take fortified towns, not to meet the forces of the enemy, but simply to burn, lay waste, and destroy the homes and fields of peaceable citizens—an outrage altogether unknown in civilized war. And for many months past the avowed object and only hope of the invaders has been one so horrible that no other people would have dared to utter it in words. They have calculated the available population of the South of military age; they have estimated the Southern loss in the numerous victories which have crowned the arms of a people fighting for their country, their altars, and their homes; and they have declared that in process of time this loss must exhaust the fighting element of the South—that the flower of her people, the men between eighteen and forty-five years of age, must in time be exterminated; and that it is to this result, to be purchased by a still larger sacrifice of life, which it is affirmed that the North can afford, that they look for the final termination of the war and the restoration of the Union! Is this a hope of which any Christian people can hear without shuddering and incredulous disgust? Is a war of which this is the avowed end one which Christian Powers can allow to go on uninterrupted? Is not the mere avowal of such a purpose—such an expectation—a crime which not merely justifies, but demands, the interference of the civilized world? The deliberate extermination of a whole generation is the only means by which the North hopes to effect its object; and is it expected that we shall sit still and see this horrible work accomplished; and there are English statesmen who can declare that it is not only our policy but our duty to sit still? We do not so estimate the policy of England towards a kindred nation, or her duty as a Christian Power to the sufferers and to mankind. And if she should sit still, and permit this horrible tragedy to be played out, let it end as it may, how can we help fearing that the blood which has been and will yet be shed will be required not only at the hands of those who shed it, but also at the hands of those whose tolerance and passive encouragement renders possible this gigantic scheme for the murder of a whole people?

MR. BRIGHT AND THE AMERICAN COTTON SUPPLY.

(From the Times of June 17.)

Mr. Bright has found another reason for advocating the war which the Federal Government of America is carrying on against the Southern States. It is not now that the Southerners are a reckless and depraved people, unable to organise a community or defend it by arms; it is not that a Union party in each state is burning to be delivered from the tyranny of a Secessionist usurpation. These once familiar arguments have passed away, to be repeated no more. Mr. Bright now raises his war-whoop on economical principles. The doctrine which he developed last night at the London Tavern was that the Confederate States might be advantageously invaded, and their people held in subjection to a Government they detest, because they have failed to supply England heretofore with cotton in sufficient quantities and at a reasonably low price. After reminding his hearers that the supply afforded to the mills of Lancashire in past years was so deficient and insecure that he had felt it necessary to urge on the Government the establishment of a gigantic system of protection in India, in order that cotton might be furnished to Manchester at the expense of all other kinds of cultivation in the East, Mr. Bright opened his new indictment against the people of the Southern States. Their great fault is that they have not furnished, that they are unable to furnish, cotton to Europe. This is the charge which a man with the history of British trade before him thinks proper to make before a London audience. The Southern States, says Mr. Bright, are only partly cultivated, their population of negroes is only 4,000,000, of whom the great majority are engaged in other employment than the raising of cotton. If they had a much larger population, and their whole territory were planted with cotton, they would be far more useful to us; and if there had been no slavery this great population and this extensive cultivation would have come into existence. Now, will the most enthusiastic Abolitionist admit that this is a truthful statement of the case? Is it not the fact that the British cotton manufacture has been actually produced by the extraordinary development of the Southern States? Manchester and the other towns which are now represented as justly indignant with the Southern States, whose social condition has debarrd them from cotton, are really themselves products of that very Southern industry, for without it three-fourths of the Lancashire towns would never have come into existence at all. Whatever may be the faults of the Southern social system, there can be no doubt that it has been wonderfully adapted to that end for which Mr. Bright says it is unfit—the growth of a particular staple. If it had not been for Southern planters, it is quite certain that there would have been no cotton manufacture to speak of in England, no Stockports and Staleybridges, perhaps no Cobdens and Brights. There are vast extents of country whence cotton might be brought, and many regions where the social relations are better than in the Southern States, and yet cotton has never been obtained in large quantities from them. The immense population of India required for itself all the cotton it grew, and it will keep it for itself again if ever the price returns to its former level. Turkey and Egypt, the African coast, both north and west, are cotton-growing countries; yet they have furnished hardly anything. It was the American planter who, by his enterprise and skill in cultivation, first furnished cotton in such quantities to Europe as to make the cotton manufacture of England the colossal interest which it had become at the time when this unhappy war began.

Is it not, then, absurd, and a kind of international ingratitude, to assert that the Southern States have failed in supplying the markets of the world with cotton? If even it were true that the supply in the last few years before the war fell short—that is, that the price was higher than the manufacturers liked—such a result surely is to be ascribed, not to any deficiency in the productive power of the South, but to the continually increasing wants of Europe? With a population rapidly increasing in wealth, and with seats of manufacture not only in England and Scotland, but in France, Germany, Russia, and the Northern States of America, all bidding against each other, the world was trying to the utmost the capabilities of the Southern States. The habits of dress which the Southern planter had actually created among civilized nations were reacting to increase the demand for cotton, and led to the rise of price on which Mr. Bright relies to prove the impotence of Southern industry.

A conclusive answer to his arguments is that, if the South were prevented by slavery from producing cotton, it ought to have been exported in abundance from regions where no such curse existed. Why, then, did not Manchester obtain its supplies elsewhere? The fact is that, whether the Southern planters produced much or little, they produced all that was to be obtained in England, and that from first to last they furnished our manufactures almost exclusively. If free labour could do such wonders, why was it that, with Africa and Central America and the Levant comparatively near to us, Mr. Bright's only scheme for obtaining cotton was to force on its production by Government interference and an enormous bounty in India, thereby confessing that the Southern planters could not be met in fair competition? Indeed, the new reasoning of Mr. Bright is a contradiction of all that the Abolitionists on the other side of the ocean have been urging as long as we can remember. They lamented, not the slowness, but the rapidity of the growth of the slave interest, and the culture which fostered it. They regretted to see new regions covered with the plant which was the support of Southern domination. They regretted the rapid increase of the number of slaves—from a million and a half to nearly four millions in forty years—an increase greater, as they computed, than would have been that of the white population if there had been no immigration. These complaints were very different in their tenor from that of Mr. Bright, who justifies the most cruel and bloodthirsty war that has been waged for two centuries on the ground that the Southern States have been unable to perform their part in the economy of the world, owing to their social organization.

Of course this baseless reasoning was followed by the usual claptraps about the unenfranchised working man, the Ballot, and "the great American Republic;" but as these parts of his speech contained nothing new, we shall not remark on them. We shall only say that when Mr. Bright attacks the Government, the Press, and the "wearers of coronets"—by whom he typifies every one who will not go to meetings to cheer his own acrimonious utterances—and accuses them of ill-will to America, the charge is totally without foundation. We have in this war seen a people struggling for independence, and another, three times as numerous, bent on its subjugation. The principles of self-government to which we adhere, as well as a natural sympathy with the weaker party, have made the whole English nation desire to see the war terminated without such a catastrophe as the subjugation of a whole people to military force. We have been opposed to the war, but the calumny which Mr. Bright loses no opportunity of spreading, that the educated classes of England have a sinister desire to see America ruined, is suggested only by his own imagination. Even now, at a time when every Northern man admits that the Confederates will fight to the last, and that success will be obtained by the Federal Government only by the exhaustion, if not destruction of the Southern people, Mr. Bright does not hesitate to stand on a platform, and in the name of civilization and progress, urge the prosecution of a war which the Governments of his own country, of France, and even of Russia, desire to see brought to an end. He must have been at a loss for an argument suitable to a man of peace, when he bethought himself of saying that the invasion and desolation of the Southern States are to give us cheap cotton, and put an end to the necessity of granting a bonus to native growers out of the revenue of India.

The whole of these, with one or two exceptions, are Blockade runners, and are entitled to the protection of the Confederate Government—protection under the Cartel. It is a mystery to them why they have not been demanded by the authorities under the Cartel provisions made for such cases.

THE ILLEGAL SEIZURE OF BRITISH SHIPS.

Messrs. J. T. Beunett and Wake announce in their Circular for June, that they have been obliged to discontinue their steam line to Matamoras, "waiting the decision of H.M. Government respecting the late illegal seizure of British vessels by United States' officers." They also announce that—

The proceedings taken by the United States' Prize Courts in the cases of the Springbok and Peterhoff, render it incumbent on the British Government to take immediate steps for defining clearly and asserting distinctly the present position of belligerents and neutrals, and for exacting at least that any cases before these Courts be conducted according to the law as it at present stands. The merchants and shipowners who are suffering from the detention of these vessels are entitled to protection from what now assumes the appearance of a denial of justice, and so great a principle is raised in these cases that it will give cause for much future regret if prompt action be not taken. Let the Shipping and Mercantile interests urge this matter vigorously, and the Government will see the necessity for action.

The law as laid down both by American and British Jurists, declares that no vessel can be lawfully captured unless attempting to run the blockade; that the nature of the cargo cannot affect the destination of the vessel, and that in case of capture and adjudication the only evidence on which the vessel can be condemned is that afforded by the ship's papers and depositions of the crew. If neither of these supply proof of an intention to run the blockade, no other evidence can be legally received, and the vessel must be set at liberty. An examination of cargo, as in the case of the Peterhoff, is contrary to law. No cargo can be contraband going to a neutral port, and therefore it can afford no evidence against the ship. The further postponement of the proceedings is quite unjustifiable, as the only evidence legally admissible has already been received, and on it the vessel should be condemned or released. Any delay is an injustice to individuals, and still more a national injury, for while these cases are pending and while the law is so deliberately exceeded, merchants are compelled to stop their trading, or to pay exaggerated rates of insurance, to guard themselves against risks which it is the duty of Government to protect them from. The only question before the country is, whether the persons interested are legally right or wrong. Let justice be done to them as individuals. No question of expediency should be allowed for a moment to affect their interests; they have been referred to the strict letter of the law, let the law be executed to the letter and promptly.

Do these Southern ministers suppose that the world is so stupidly ignorant of the circumstances connected with slavery in their States as to believe that the Southern owners sanction the teaching of the Bible to their wretched chattels? Do they not know that those Englishmen at least who have never, perhaps, read any other work on the subject, read Mr. Russell's letters to the Times, and read there what that calm and candid writer tells of his personal investigations into the Scriptural education of the Southern slaves?

The above astonishing paragraph appeared in the Morning Star, a daily paper of this city of London, in this year of Grace 1863. It was intended as a reply to the following statement, made by nearly one hundred leading Clergymen of all Protestant denominations in the Confederate States, in an address to Christians throughout the world, which appeared in THE INDEX of last week:—

From the best sources of information, it is ascertained that the whole number of communicants in the Christian churches in the Confederate States, is about two millions and fifty thousand. Of these, the number of white communicants is about one million five hundred and fifty thousand. Supposing the total white population to be eight millions, and one-half that number to be over eighteen years of age, a little more than one-third of the adult population are members of the Church of Christ. The number of coloured communicants is about five hundred thousand. Assuming the coloured population to be 4,000,000, there would be, upon the same method of computation, one-fourth of the adult population in communion with the Church of Christ. Thus has God blessed us in gathering into His Church from the children of Africa, more than twice as many as are reported from all the converts in the Protestant Missions throughout the heathen world.

MURDER OF PRISONERS.

The Richmond Sentinel gives the following details of the recent murder of Confederate prisoners at Washington, brief mention of which has already been made by telegraph:—

The accounts we get from them of the treatment of our prisoners are the same as we already have had. The rations dealt out to them were not only scanty, but the meat and articles of food given them were often so bad and offensive that they had to be thrown away. They were not only badly fed, but they were subjected to the severest discipline. An instance of this is related to us which will show the harshness and even cruelty visited upon our men. One of our prisoners, Jessie Wharton, of Maryland, was standing at the window within the bars, quietly looking out. The sentinel on guard ordered Wharton to stand away from the window, but Wharton, feeling that he was not violating the rules of the prison—for his whole person was within the bars of the window—did not instantly comply with the order, when the wretch, perceiving that he did not step aside quickly, as ordered, raised his musket and fired, killing him instantly!

But this is nothing compared to one of the most horrible and cold-blooded murders committed by the guard on another of our prisoners—a murder that would even put a savage to blush. It appears that Harry Stewart, of Maryland, who was held in the Old Capitol as a prisoner, conceived the plan of bribing the guard. His proposition was apparently well received, and a price for his liberty was agreed upon. The plan was that at an appointed hour, when the prisoners were allowed the yard, he would scale the fence, and the sentinel would allow his escape. The preliminaries were arranged and the price agreed upon paid over. At the appointed hour, and according to arrangement, Stewart, having at the last moment communicated to a few of his friends his plan, attempted his escape and appeared on the fence, when the sentinel (who, it must be borne in mind, had sold himself and received his bribe) deliberately raised his musket and shot him dead, his body falling a corpse from the fence. If the human heart was ever guilty of greater treachery and depravity, then the annals of crime fail to record it.

VICE-PRESIDENT STEPHENS ON THE WAR.

The Jackson Appeal quotes from the Raymond Gazette some extracts of a private letter written by Vice-President Stephens on the 14th March last:—

In speaking of the ability of the South to maintain the stand taken Mr. Stephens speaks confidently, and says:—"We can, without doubt, sustain our armies just as long as the Federal Government shall continue to wage this crusade against us, if we properly, judiciously and wisely avail ourselves of our resources. They are abundant if prudently developed, husbanded, and applied. No equal number of people on the earth ever had more of the essential elements of war at their command than we have. Internal resources for subsistence is one of the chiefest of these. But the development of these needs looking to by those who conduct war quite as much, if not more, than the raising of armies. I gave close attention to this subject in the beginning of our struggle, and was well satisfied that we could maintain the war in our defence as long as the enemy could prosecute it for our subjection. Frederick, of Prussia, defended his kingdom in a seven years' struggle against all the combined Powers. The odds against him in fighting men were three to one—yet his defence was successful; and not only this, but at the end of the war he did not owe a dollar. This shows what can and may be done, for his kingdom was far inferior to our territory in those internal resources essential to success in war. All that is wanting with us, under a kind Providence, is the same brains to manage and mould our resources that elevated those of Prussia. * * * Every energy of the country now in the agricultural line should be vigorously applied to the production of food and clothing. For while I am satisfied we possess the means to furnish the necessary supplies, etc., I am equally satisfied that if they are not properly and efficiently used, the supplies will fail, and then failure will be attended with disaster."

After speaking of several minor matters, and dwelling somewhat upon the movements in the North-west, Mr. Stephens says:—"In the meantime we must, with patriotism, patience, and fortitude, bear all the ills, privations and sacrifices which are the price of our independence. These ills, privations, and sacrifices must be heroically borne, not only by the gallant men in the field, but by all who are at home. All have duties to perform. Every one who can turn a furrow or a spindle, use a hoe or a needle, wield an axe or a shuttle—in a word, every one who can turn a hand to anything in the way of supplying food and clothing for the man in the field, can render important and essential service to the great cause, and contribute something toward ultimate success."

In speaking of the present prospects of the country, in the fighting way, Mr. Stephens says:—"We all here have been anxiously watching the movements of the enemy in your State. Those who have suffered by the hand of the depoleer, the plunderer and the robber, have our deepest sympathies, while the noble spirits who have defended Port Hudson and Vicksburg have our liveliest gratitude and highest admiration. They have won a name that will live through all history."

SUPPOSING, then, all this that we hear of the Southern determination, valour, discipline, morale and ambition to be true—what effect ought it to have on our course? Ought we, because they are proving more formidable than we ever expected them to prove, hasten to make peace, before we have still further exhausted our strength in the endeavour to overcome them—before their metal has been still further solidified by our blows? Ought we to seek to conciliate them by concession and forbearance, and by strong testimonies to their courage and bravery and strength? We answer unhesitatingly—No! The more we hear of Southern pluck and energy and spirit and resources, the more satisfied we are, painful as we admit the conclusion to be, that we must conquer them or they conquer us. Had they proved themselves weak or divided or pusillanimous, as many of us confidently expected they would, there would have been far more to say in favour of letting them go in peace than there is now that they have shown themselves both strong in war and shrewd in council. The United States and the kind of State which the Confederacy seeks to become, cannot exist together on this continent. One or other must perish. * * * Every man in the Confederate service, from Davis down, must be made to know that his death or submission are the ends we aim at, and that the braver and more determined we know him to be, the more firmly decided are we that he and his associates shall either lay down their arms, or quit the country, or die.—New York Times, June 6.

THE EARLDOM OF BREADALBANE.—Last November the Marquis of Breadalbane died leaving no issue, and no male relatives who could succeed to his title by the usual rules of descent; but there is a clause in the patent granted by Charles II., by which, in default of legal descendants, the nearest heir male was to inherit. Sir Robert Campbell, of Glenorchy, who lived in the beginning of the seventeenth century, had three sons. The family of the eldest son acquired the Earldom, and the family of the second son, upon the failure of the family of the first, inherited the Earldom and added to it the Marquisate—the last being an English title, and is now extinct. No representative of the family remains. We therefore come to the third son. William Campbell, of Glenfalloch, who lived in the reign of George II., was a lineal descendant of the third son of the common ancestor. The second of his children, James, was the grandfather of John Alexander Goin Campbell, who, upon the death of the late Marquis, claimed the title of Earl of Breadalbane and the estates, which are worth £50,000 a-year. His title is now disputed by Lieutenant Charles William Campbell, who is the grandson of John the sixth child of William Campbell of Glenfalloch. The new claimant avers that the marriage of the grandfather and grandmother of J. A. V. Campbell was invalid, because the grandmother, whose maiden name was Blanchard, was married to a Mr. Ludlow, who was still living at the time of the celebration of the second marriage. The marriage with James Campbell took place in 1782, and the new claimant offers to produce an extract from the parish register of Chipping-Sodbury which establishes the marriage with Ludlow, and also to prove that Ludlow executed a will in 1783, and did not die until 1784. It also appears that one of the children of the marriage with James Campbell was registered in 1796 as the son of Captain James Campbell and Mrs. Eliza Maria Blanchard—that is, in the maiden name of the mother. If the invalidity of the marriage can be proved—it seems, also, that there may be some difficulty in proving any marriage ceremony to have taken place between James Campbell and Mrs. Blanchard or Ludlow—then the offspring of James Campbell are illegitimate, and the Earldom of Breadalbane and the £50,000 will go to Lieut. C. W. Campbell, the heir male of John the sixth child of William Campbell of Glenfalloch.

The St. Louis Democrat of May 6th, gives an account of the despotic arrests in St. Louis. It says:—

The military arrest of a considerable number of prominent citizens of well-known treasurable sympathies, though not officially made known to us, has become a matter of public notoriety in the street. Following is a list of some of the names of the imprisoned, gathered by us from various sources this morning:—

David H. Armstrong, late President of the St. Louis Railroad Company; Wm. N. Switzer, of the firm of Switzer, Platt and Co.; James C. Mumford, lawyer; James C. Edwards, ex-President of the North Missouri Railroad Company; Dr. Gratz Moses; Robert M. Fankhauser, late City Councilman and merchant on Second street; Nathaniel Cox, lawyer; Kelly, of the firm of Garbaid and Kelly; Lewis C. Garnier; James S. Doroughty, ex-receiver of public money for the United States; Horace D. Brady, trunk merchant at Fourth and Pine streets; Dr. Henry J. B. McKellops, well-known dentist on Olive, between Fifth and Sixth streets; William Matthews, of the firm of William Matthews and Co.; Solomon H. Robbins, late member of the School Board, belonging to the firm of S. H. Robbins and Co.—this is the gentleman whose infant son, as is alleged, was christened after General Beauregard by Dr. McPheeters; Isaac Pollard, real estate agent and broker; Henry N. Hart, lawyer; Henry B. Belt, of the firm of Belt and Priest, real estate agents; Ashton P. Johnson, Notary Public.

The above, with some twenty others whose names we did not with certainty learn, were taken in custody during yesterday and last night.

THE SUSPECTED CONFEDERATE STEAMER IN THE TEES.—The Southerner, a smart craft, that has been built on the Tees by Messrs. Pearce and Co., iron shipbuilders, has, during the whole period of her fitting out in the river, extending over several weeks, given rise to the liveliest curiosity. Last week she had her trial trip. There were eighty ladies and gentlemen on board. The run was as far as Scarborough, and back to West Hartlepool, where she is at present lying. It has since transpired that a spy was on board, in the guise of a reporter, to whom of course the greatest courtesy and attention were shown on his representing himself as connected with the press. It appears that while the ladies and gentlemen were dining on board, he was busy taking notes; so, while they were dancing; for he has since sworn to an affidavit at an attorney's office in Stockton, setting forth inter alia that Captain Butcher (the gentleman in charge of the boat) was, in his belief a regular commissioned officer under the Confederacy, because he had detected the letters C. S. C., which he made out to be "Confederate States' Cutter," on his uniform. The uniform was like that of a lieutenant in the Royal Navy. He likewise found the three fatal letters painted on the crockeryware used on board the vessel. Besides that, there was a quantity of charcoal, about 30 bushels, to prevent the sun penetrating the ice-house; he at once concluded that it was to get steam up quickly. He also learned from the crew that 11 or 12 big guns were stowed away in the hold, sealed. He had also observed that whenever Mr. Pearce, one of the builders, was in conversation with the captain, their gestures were suspicious. And what was the most damning fact of all was the palmetto tree on Captain Butcher's uniform; it was simply an ordinary anchor. This affidavit, we understand, was despatched with all possible haste to Mr. Adams, the United States' Minister, who forthwith submitted it to Earl Russell. The Foreign Secretary immediately communicated with Sir George Grey, the Home Secretary, and the result of all this bother was that a Custom-house officer went on board the vessel, in the docks at Hartlepool, on Monday, and after a most minute search, particularly for the guns, declared himself perfectly satisfied that she in her present condition was what was represented of her,—purely a merchant vessel. That the Southerner's movements are watched is evident, from the fact that a telegraphic message has been received from the Home Secretary, inquiring as to her whereabouts; and also from the fact that the spy is still hovering about West Hartlepool. He was met the other day by the captain, and the meeting, it may be imagined, was a most cordial one. The affidavit bore the signature of "Baxter Langley."—The Times.

The Struggle in Mississippi.

At the departure of the Etna from New York, the last faint hope of capturing Vicksburg seems to have deserted the Northern press. Conscious, as it were, of a coming disaster, even the New York Herald, the most rabid of the war organs of the North, avowed its despair; and great mass meetings in favour of peace have carried resolutions hostile to President Lincoln's Administration. The latest phase of public opinion in the North is only valuable, perhaps, as an index of a transient impulse. A victory on the Rappahannock, at Vicksburg, or at Port Hudson, would quickly send the thermometer up to war heat. Still these resolutions teach us something; they show that twelve days ago in New York, the most sanguine city in the Northern States, the conviction had taken root that Vicksburg was safe, that Grant's enterprise had miscarried, and that a fresh disaster to the Federal arms was imminent. It is significant that scarcely a line of the intelligence brought by the Etna is from Southern sources. From Northern advices we are able, with tolerable certainty, to estimate the chances of General Grant's success, and to predicate a failure. We hardly need the shadowy corroborative testimony of the Confederate officer on the Rappahannock, who reports that Grant's army has abandoned the siege of Vicksburg, and is, in its turn, cooped up on the banks of the Big Black River, surrounded by a victorious Confederate army.

The latest news confirms all our anticipations. The fate of Vicksburg hung upon the issue of the first week's fighting. If the rear of the fortress corresponded in strength with the fortifications along the river, it was impregnable to direct assault. The garrison could only be starved out after a protracted siege, which neither the summer heats of the Mississippi, nor the honour of the Confederate army in the south-west would allow. General Grant felt this. All his dispositions were made for a rapid advance and an immediate assault. The mine and the spade formed no part of his programme. They are introduced now, we firmly believe, merely to delude the Northern public. The Federals had evidently no idea of the strength of the place they regarded as such an easy conquest. Admiral Porter reports that "the works are stronger than they dreamed of." General Grant could say as much. Seven miles of fortification protect this stronghold of the South. Ordinary siege works, zig-zags, and covered ways are of little avail where the ground is furrowed up into precipitous ravines, where the approaches to the defensive works are up steep inclines that must be scaled by ladders, and where the various passes that lead up to the separate redoubts are so many gorges of death, in which a handful of resolute men may deal destruction upon thousands. It is Fredericksburg over again, says a New York paper, with this difference—that Burnside when his assault had failed, could lead back his men across the Rappahannock, but there is no retreat for Grant. The siege had lasted thirteen days. At the end of that time the progress was "encouraging." In the first five days nearly as many assaults had been delivered, all ending in terrible slaughter and disaster. In thirty minutes, we are told, 2,500 Federal soldiers were shot down—struck by an unseen enemy. Again and again the assault was renewed with reckless bravery by the troops, with cruel prodigality of life on the part of the commander. Each time the hope was more forlorn, and the effort fainter and briefer; each time the foremost Federal ranks melted away under the deadly fire of the garrison long before they reached the Confederate redoubts. Flesh and blood could not stand the demoralization produced by these repeated failures. No wonder that even Grant stood aghast at the terrible work, and converted the assault into a siege. But the siege is fatal to his hopes. In fourteen days Johnstone is said to have promised the beleaguered garrison succour; thirteen days had elapsed on the 31st ult., and still Vicksburg held out bravely, and Grant's army had been weakened by the loss of 6,000 or 7,000 men before its walls. It was known that General Johnstone was not fifty miles distant, and that he was collecting and organizing an army for the relief of the fortress. From Tennessee, from Eastern Louisiana, from Georgia, he would draw reinforcements. He had with him the nucleus of an army, some 6,000 or 7,000 good troops. Every day's delay in Grant's operations brought the avenging army nearer; and at the latest dates General Johnstone's plans had assumed a definite form; the initiative had been resumed, and the work of relief was begun. The Federal accounts left Johnstone at Canton, a few miles north-west of Jackson. From thence he is reported to have removed in the direction of Vicksburg, between the Yazoo and Big Black Rivers, upon Haines' Bluff. Once there he would cut Grant's communications with the flotilla of gun-boats and transports on the Yazoo; he would avoid the difficulty of crossing the Big Black River in the face of an enemy; he would compel Grant's army to return along the Big Black River towards Grand Gulf, across a most difficult country, exposed to the flank attack of the army in Vicksburg, and to the imminent risk of annihilation or capture.

If Johnstone's forces are 30,000, he has probably men enough to relieve Vicksburg. If he has 40,000 men in his command, he may end the campaign on the Mississippi. In the Confederate camp on the Rappahannock it was reported that Grant had fallen back upon the Big Black River, and was then fortifying himself against Johnstone. But we hardly believe this. Grant's hope of safety lay in his gun-boats. A retreat upon the Big Black River would show his force to be even in a worse position than we assign to it; and there is apparently no hope of aid from General Banks. This officer, after having successfully overrun Louisiana, and won repeated victories over a few detached Confederate corps, is in his turn brought to a standstill at Port Hudson. He, too, finds the defence "stronger than he dreamed of," and has sustained before its walls a repulse even bloodier than that which has befallen General Grant.

Crossing the Mississippi at Bayou Sara, a few miles above Port Hudson, he appears to have invested the latter fortress on the 26th ult., and on the 27th to have ordered a general assault, Admiral Farragut aiding by a joint attack on the river batteries. Some 25,000 men were put in motion, and on all sides the works were assaulted. The result was, even upon Federal showing, a tremendous disaster. On the right a partial reverse; on the left a serious repulse; in the centre the capture of some rifle pits at the cost of some 4,000 killed and wounded, General Sherman amongst the number. The battle lasted throughout the day. It is reported to have been renewed on the 28th, but the result was not published at New Orleans. The probability is, that the ill-success of the first day's fight prevented the renewal of the attack. Thus, at two points, the Federals have been foiled. Port Hudson and Vicksburg still remained in the hands of the Confederates, and the position of the invading armies had become one of extreme peril. If troops can be spared to strengthen the Confederate army in Mississippi, Grant's forces can hardly escape, and Banks's army will scarcely be safe until it has reached New Orleans. Everything depends upon the celerity with which reinforcements can be brought up on the respective sides, and we are inclined to think that at this juncture the North is no better able to furnish armies than the South. Lee is threatening Maryland and Washington, Bragg is closing in upon Rosecranz. Confederate troops are advancing on Kentucky. Neither Hooker nor Rosecranz can spare a regiment. The nine-months' men are leaving the ranks. Everything seems to portend that a great crisis in the war has come, and that the events which must be decided in the course of this month on the banks of the Mississippi will have a more important influence on the issue of the war than any of the sanguinary struggles which have preceded them. We look hopefully on the Confederate prospects. Two weeks ago there was, cause for anxiety. Now there is none. The tide of Federal success has risen, we believe, to its highest and the ebb has set in.

The Fall of Puebla.

THE cannon from the Hotel des Invalides has announced to Paris a great victory of the arms of France in a distant tropical land. The fall of Puebla and the capture of the only army that could dispute the road to the capital, has placed the destinies of a whole people in the hands of the Emperor of the French. We doubt not that he will use this great triumph wisely and moderately, and that the victory of arms will be followed by a still greater moral victory in the regeneration of that unhappy country, which, almost from the first year of its independent existence, has been a scandal and a disgrace to modern civilization. It is true that the obstacles to this consummation are more formidable than those which military skill and valour may overcome, and to a mind less profoundly sagacious they might prove insurmountable. The task is that of creating order where the very elements of political organization have long since perished in a hopeless chaos—of establishing a stable government among a people whose history records nearly as many revolutions as years. The greatest difficulty in accomplishing this task is the absence of anything that can properly be termed the nucleus of a nation. Of the eight millions that are loosely termed Mexicans, scarcely one and a half million are white, that is, of pure European descent. The rest are Indians, Negroes, and the infinite mongrel breeds produced by the mixture of these races. If the unrestricted possession of political privileges has degenerated into unbridled licence among some of the highest types of the Caucasian race, how much less is such Utopian freedom fitted for a population only a degree removed from simple barbarism? The first and greatest need of Mexico is "a white man's government," and this, under the present circumstances of that Republic, can only be imposed by the strong hand of a foreign conqueror. The fruits of the reform will, indeed, be commensurate with the magnitude of the task. A country, which few equal and none surpass in magnificence and variety of resources, will be reopened to commerce, and to the influences of civilization. But to work such a cure, time must come to the aid of the skilful physician; and whether or no the Emperor Napoleon contemplates the reduction of Mexico into a French colony, which we cannot persuade ourselves to believe, a prolonged occupation of that distant territory is an inevitable sequence of his plans. France must, therefore, be regarded, as a Power whose American dependencies give it, at the present moment, a strong interest and an authoritative voice in American affairs. It is from this point of view alone that we now desire to consider the consequences of the French conquest of Mexico, for this is the real significance of the fall of Puebla.

It has several times happened during the progress of the American war—which with a strange perversion of words many still persist in calling a “civil war,”—that a series of events so shaped themselves as to appear to indicate a certain and speedy conclusion. Yet at the very moment when the anxious spectators expected the curtain to fall upon the tragedy, something has always happened to delay the denouement, and from behind the scenes might be heard the sound of preparations for still another Act, more filled with horrors and carnage than the preceding. One of these periods, when all the indications seem to point to an approaching end, is the present. The North had strained every nerve upon three gigantic efforts,—the reduction of Charleston, the often-defeated advance into Virginia, and the undisputed possession of the Mississippi River. The accomplishment of either one of these objects, albeit with the failure of the others, would, it was admitted, encourage it in its desperate enterprise, and postpone peace indefinitely. Two of the attempts have already ended in failures more signal than any which have baffled Northern hopes; the third is indeed yet undecided, but enough is already known to leave the issue but little doubtful. Private letters and telegrams render it certain that the Government at Washington has suppressed information, according to which Grant is in a far more perilous situation than the garrison in Vicksburg. Add to this the surprising intelligence which reaches us from Port Hudson; an army of over twenty thousand men, supported by a powerful fleet, has just been repulsed with heavy loss from this little fort, the fate of which, when assailed by such a force, seemed so certain, that a month ago friends and foes in New Orleans believed in its evacuation. It is evident, therefore, that the Federals, as is their wont, had greatly exaggerated the value of their successes in the West; and without imitating their practice of discounting victories not yet won, we may reasonably speculate upon the consequences of the failure of the third of this year's great campaigns.

Foiled at every point of assault, it is impossible to conceive what new hope can spring up to delude the Northern people, or upon what new chance the Federal commanders now stake their honour and the lives of their men. Predatory excursions may, indeed, be made, large districts of the “rebel” country laid waste, and immense quantities of private property stolen and destroyed. But such exploits, even the North will scarcely believe conducive to any decision of the contest. New levies will then require to be ordered; but if we compute their magnitude by the figures of the past two years, not all the Federal recruiting sergeants in Ireland can supply the demand, and the Conscription, so long threatened and never enforced, must of needs be resorted to. Assuming that the Northern people will submit to this as they have submitted to everything else, and that their young men will go forth to take the place of the foreign hirelings who have heretofore been so mercilessly sacrificed at the bidding of an imbecile dictator, some time must elapse before the North can venture to send the raw recruits of this class against the veteran soldiers of the South. The war, then, will linger. Meanwhile there are symptoms of reaction at the North itself, more pronounced in their character than any we have yet had to record. A party strong enough to hold one of the largest public meetings ever held in

New York, and strong enough to defy the absolute authority of the Administration, has at length openly avowed itself in favour of peace, even though it were a peace based on separation. Those who know the astonishing versatility of the Northern mind, and know how rapidly a party recruits its numbers when once the characteristic cowardice of an American minority is quieted by demonstrations of strength, may reasonably indulge in hopes that the movement inaugurated in New York will spread throughout the length and breadth of Federal America. The reported sudden conversion of the New York Herald, which has never been known to espouse an unpopular side, and whose instinctive perception of the changes of public opinion is supposed to be unfailing, would, if confirmed, tend strongly to corroborate such hopes.

We, however, are far from seeing in these hopeful symptoms the conclusive evidence of a coming change of purpose on the part of the North as a people. We are content to treat them as the indications of a crisis the issue of which is still extremely doubtful, and depends on many uncertain contingencies. Should Europe neglect the critical moment, as it has neglected so many former opportunities, the Peace party, still in its infancy, may and probably will succumb. The chill consequent upon repeated defeats may pass, as it has passed before, being succeeded by as violent a paroxysm of fever as ever, and the conscription may be enforced, though one-third of the population had to be kept in subjection by the other two-thirds in arms. The weakness of the Peace party, as we have often pointed out, lies in the fact that so long as Europe by its injustice to the Confederates encourages the prosecution of the war, they stand branded as traitors to the cause of their country, as men who despair of success while the whole neutral world still deem success possible. It depends, therefore, on the course pursued by Europe, that is to say, by France and England, what turn the approaching crisis in the North will take, and it is for this reason that the opportune events in Mexico have so important a bearing upon the greater questions now in process of solution on the same continent. These events leave the Emperor free to act according to the conclusions at which he is reported to have long since arrived, and we will not believe that England, though she refuses to lead, would hesitate or regret to follow her ally.

Retaliation.

THE horrors of war are always intensified by the duration of war. The area of the suffering constantly extends until affliction becomes the common heritage of the community. In America, however, we are witnessing an unusually terrible development of the evil of war. We there behold hostilities waged with the weapons and skill of civilization, but with the spirit that animates the savage. It would be vain, it would be criminal to deny that the conflict is daily growing in ferocity. There are indications that the time is approaching when “no quarter” will be inscribed on black banners, and when the victor will not hesitate to slay his vanquished foe. We represent the sentiment of England and of Europe in saying that no words can express the painful impression produced by these signs of the changing character of the conflict, and in justice to the gallant South we feel called upon to show that she is not to blame, that retaliation is forced upon her, that retaliation is not a matter of discretion but of solemn duty, for by such a policy alone is it possible to curb the brutality and barbarism of the North.

And first, we must pay homage to the wonderful forbearance hitherto exhibited by the Confederates. There may be difference of opinion as to the original cause of dispute, and as to the constitutional right of secession, but no one can deny that the Confederates are the invaded, and the Federals the invading power. This alone would have justified conduct on the part of the South, for which the North could not offer any sufficient excuse. But it is the invader, and not the invaded, who has grossly violated the laws of civilized warfare. We have not the space, even if we had the inclination, to chronicle all the enormities committed by Northern soldiers, and commanded and sanctioned by Northern officers. Their pathway in the South has been marked by desolation, by rapine, by the shedding of innocent blood, and by the commission of crimes that must not be named by man to man. The Federal cavalry makes a raid, and boasts of destroying the agricultural implements of the farmers. The Federals capture a city, burn the public buildings and the citizens' houses, and steal the wearing apparel and jewellery of the women. We do not forget Butler's Reign of Terror in New Orleans, and the deeds by which he made his name execrable. We remember the bloodthirsty orders of General Pope in Virginia, the abominations of Turchin, and the hideous massacre of McNeil. The doings of that ruthless savage, General Mitchell, are too monstrous to pass into oblivion. And yet these men only did conspicuously what others have done more privily. These inhuman cruelties the South has borne without retaliation. There is, indeed, a difficulty. The Confederates cannot retaliate in kind. They cannot maltreat women and children, steal dresses and trinkets, murder innocent men in the presence of their wives, and give up school girls to a ferocious soldiery—there are no such soldiers in the armies of the South. At length, however, the Federals are engaged in a work that it would be a lasting shame to the Confederates if they did not punish. They are seeking to stir up a servile war, to arm the negro against his master, to change the docile labourer into a savage. Can we blame the Confederates for hanging—as yet they have not done so—white officers so inciting the black race to revolt? If the South, hardly pressed by the superior numbers of the invader, armed the slaves in defence of their country, the only country which affords the negro a home in America, the act would be pardonable, though we should deplore the necessity. But for an invader, boasting of his superior numbers and his superior resources, to entrap and arm the Southern negroes is conduct that no sophistry can palliate. Even for the sake of the negroes the South is called upon to sternly punish it.

Some weeks ago, a contemporary—the Army and Navy Gazette—found fault with us for saying that death was a righteous punishment for the white officers of negro regiments. Well, how ought the Confederates to act? Let us constitute ourselves the Gamaliel amongst nations. Let us bid the South take a lesson from our history. Let us take an instance with which the editor of the Army and Navy Gazette is familiar—the Sepoy revolt.

We protest earnestly that in citing this case we have no intention of denouncing the severity of the punishment inflicted upon the mutineers. We are not members of the Peace Society. We are not co-operators or dupes of Mr. John Bright. We do not sympathize with the crimes of fanaticism. We do not feel any maudlin pity for Nana Sahib. We are not inclined to treat leniently the murderers of our women at Cawnpore.

The Sepoys were a subject, not a servile race. Misled by a blinding fanaticism they were induced to believe that the English meditated an attack upon their religion—to degrade them in this world and to consign them to perdition. In this state of mind they were the ready tools of designing fiends, who incited them to commit the most atrocious crimes. The heroism of such men as General Havelock—the Stonewall Jackson of our Indian service—saved our Indian Empire and put an end to the mutiny. What did we to the mutineers? Did we suffer them to go at large? No. Did we spare their lives? No. Did we hang them? No. This is what we did:—We tied them to the mouths of cannon, and in the presence of our soldiers we blew them in pieces. And shall we pretend that hanging is too severe a penalty for men who seek to stir up a servile war, and who do so not from fanaticism, but for the purpose of vengeance and from the lust of territory? The cases as they stand are not quite apposite. It is as though we had Sepoys in England, in all our towns and villages, and an invader sought to make them enact the crimes that were instigated by Nana Sahib. If ever the punishment of death is lawful, it is undoubtedly so when Federal officers are found in command of negroes. But we repeat, as yet the Confederates have not so punished any Federal officers.

Another circumstance loudly calls for a change in the Confederate policy. The war is now, avowedly, on the part of the North a war of extermination. It is gloatingly admitted by the clergy of New England that the South can never be conquered and held except by the extermination of the Southerners. We need not travel so far as New England to penetrate the intention of the Northern Republicans. They will, if they can, keep on the war until having killed they may take possession. A daily London paper, the Daily News, has lately reduced the chance of success to a question of arithmetic, and contended that as the Federals and Confederates are as three to one, if the Southerners only kill two for one the Federals in the end must be successful. Although the Daily News has before published the ravings of a morbid imagination as authenticated facts—for example, the story about negro roasting—still we confess we were a little surprised to find that journal suggesting a war of extermination. This being the policy of the North, or at least of the dominant section of the North, and as Europe looks on and does not feel it a duty even to protest against such a scheme, we must admit that the South is not engaged in an ordinary war, and is by all the rules of war privileged to resort to extraordinary measures. We are assured that President Davis will, so long as he can do so righteously, abstain from retaliation. We fear, however, that forbearance is no longer a virtue, since it encourages the Federals to commit crimes alike repugnant to the laws of God and man.

Mr. Coningham and the Slave Trade.

DESPITE the control exercised over it by the Speaker, and the check put upon all sorts of extravagance by the good sense and discretion which almost invariably characterise the House of Commons, the license of asking questions is, beyond all other Parliamentary privileges, liable to be abused by the wilfulness or folly of individual members; who, under cover of a question, can insinuate an insult to a Minister, an affront to a friendly Power, or an accusation against an absent man; which cannot be answered effectually, inasmuch as only he to whom the question is put is allowed to speak to it, and which the member who puts the question cannot be called on either to withdraw or to substantiate. The good feeling which is usual among gentlemen, and the knowledge that a serious offence against equity and good breeding would compromise the position of the offender with the House generally, however, keep this abuse within bounds; and it is very seldom that anything exceedingly insolent towards absent parties, or exceedingly silly in itself, is said under the guise of a question. The rarity of such an occurrence will excuse us in calling attention to the conduct of a person who, as a general rule, is considered beneath the notice of the press, and who never emerges from his insignificance save by some egregious effort of vanity and perversity which for a moment compels the public to recognise his existence by an expression of ridicule or of disgust. Probably no question was ever put to a Prime Minister so utterly childish in itself, and in its purpose and terms so wantonly insulting to a foreign Government, as that addressed to Lord Palmerston, last Thursday night, by one of the members for Brighton. Both those gentlemen are vehement Radicals, and resemble each other in other particulars. But Mr. White does understand one or two questions, with which the experience of a lifetime has made him familiar; he seldom troubles the House on any other topics; and he speaks with sufficient sense and good humour to prevent the kindly indifference with which he is regarded from becoming angry or contemptuous. His colleague is a man of a very different sort; as may be conceived from the nature and form of the question to which we refer. Mr. Coningham asked the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government, whether it were not expedient to extend to the American continent the efforts which this country has made for the suppression of the African Slave trade; and whether the time had not arrived when it became the duty of Government to concert measures with the Federal Administration for the total suppression of that trade in "the rebellious Southern States."

It is difficult to imagine any rational motive which could induce even a Mr. Coningham to put a question so utterly babyish as this. Every one knows that any measures now concerted with the Federal Government must either have regard only to that territory which is actually and de facto subject to Mr. Lincoln's authority, or must involve us, as his allies and co-partners, in a direct collision with the Confederate States. We cannot "concert measures" to put down or to raise up, by the agency of the Federal Government, any thing, practice, or institution in the South, without concerting measures to put the Federal Government in possession of that authority in the South which is necessary to the execution of any such scheme; and to propose any treaty, arrangement, or joint action whatever with one party to a war within the territory of the other, is simply to propose an offensive and defensive alliance with the former against the latter. Mr. Coningham's question, therefore, amounted in substance to this: "Is it not time that England, in alliance with the North, should make war upon the Confederate States, in order to put down"—what, we cannot clearly understand, but we presume that Mr. Coningham intends to say—"the sale of negro slaves." Even Mr. Forster and Mr. Taylor, of "hell-hound" notoriety, do not venture to answer this question in the affirmative; and we conceive that no sane Englishman dreams of giving any kind of encouragement to the North, beyond that which may be afforded by furious platform harangues and vain-glorious resolutions, passed by meetings limited alike in numbers, sense, and character.

Again, every rational politician knows that the African Slave Trade, and the transfer of slaves from one owner to another, are two utterly distinct and different things. The African slave trade was a trade in barbarian men and women, who were made captives in wars kindled for that purpose, and transferred to slave-ships, wherein one-half of them usually died, to be carried to distant countries, and sold to hard labour under masters of a race with which they had no communion, and whose very language, religion, and ideas were utterly and hopelessly strange to them. It destroyed the little prospect that ever existed of establishing commerce, civilization, peace and order on the coast of Africa. It did much to aggravate the evils of West Indian slavery—first, by rendering slaves cheap, and secondly, by furnishing constant supplies of slaves, in whom their masters felt no personal interest, and whose barbarous instincts could only be controlled by the severest discipline. It involved horrors on the high seas which, in the narratives of English Abolitionists, awakened the remorse and disgust of Christendom. Therefore, the slave-trade with Africa was abolished; and the voice of the South has declared, as loudly as that of Europe, that it was rightly abolished. The sale of slaves is an essential incident of slavery. It is the way by which labour is transferred from places where it is redundant, to places where it is wanted. It is the way by which a master discharges a troublesome servant. It is the way by which a planter, parting with his estate, places the labourers who have cultivated it under the protection of its new owner. It is the way by which a discontented slave is, at his own request, removed from the service of a master whom he dislikes. It is as necessary for the slave as for the slaveholder; and slavery could not exist where this power of sale was wanting. This is plain enough to all rational men; it is clear to all intelligent politicians—from Lord Macaulay's fourth form schoolboy and the pot-house oracle, up to Mr. Gladstone and Lord Palmerston—that there is no sort of connexion or comparison between the African slave-trade, and the transfer of American slaves from one owner to another; but Mr. Coningham, with a sincerity which we do not doubt, confuses the two things in inextricable perplexity.

We may also remind our readers of two important facts. It is not in the power of the Federal Government, nor of the Confederate Government, within their respective jurisdictions, to interfere either with slavery or with what is called by Abolitionists the internal slave-trade. If the Union were restored to-morrow, and if Mr. Wendell Phillips were President, and Mr. Beecher Secretary of State—events about equally probable—it would be beyond their powers to prevent the sale of slaves in Maryland, or their transfer thence to Texas. And the same is true of the Confederacy. The Government at Richmond has no more power to forbid the sale of negroes in Virginia than to forbid the sale of horses or of estates; no more power than to pass laws limiting testamentary bequests or altering the law of succession to land. The matter is one of municipal regulation, solely within the powers of the Sovereign States. Again, the Confederate Government has, and can have, no more power to interfere with the involuntary migration of slaves than with the voluntary migration of freemen. But the external commerce of the Confederacy, like that of the Union, is regulated by the Central Power; and as our readers well know, a special clause in the Confederate Constitution utterly and for ever precludes the possibility of a resumption of the slave trade by citizens of the Confederate States. And this law was included in the fundamental laws of the country, not to please or conciliate Europe, but at the almost unanimous demand of the Southern people, who believe that the resumption of that trade would so alter the character of slavery in those States, as to render it an abomination not to be maintained or endured by a Christian people.

The only motives that we can assign for such a question as Mr. Coningham's are, a puerile wish to vent his ill-nature by speaking spitefully of the Confederate States, and a desire to connect his name with a subject of some importance, in order to assure his constituents at Brighton that he is still alive, and as willing as ever to talk nonsense for that gratification, when he can get an opportunity. The small malice displayed in the epithet bestowed on the South, and the attempt to suggest in its most offensive form the one imputation which checks the growth of sympathy with the Confederate cause, sufficiently evince the existence in the speaker's mind of just that kind of impotent ill-will which would find gratification in insulting a great people in the midst of a desperate struggle by an affront so petty as an impertinent Parliamentary question from the most insignificant man in the British Parliament.

Lord Palmerston showed much good nature in his reply; for the opportunity was tempting. Mr. Coningham has been impertinent to Lord Palmerston, as to others; and nothing would have been easier than to extinguish Mr. Coningham by a few well-chosen sentences of merciless ridicule, provoking a perfect storm of cheers and laughter from the House. But the Premier refrained; he could not condescend to such small game. He chose to understand the question in a manner in which it merely implied gross ignorance, and not ridiculous folly; and explained the attitude in which the Federal and Confederate Governments respectively stood towards the African slave trade. Mr. Coningham tried to explain himself, but he only succeeded in eliciting from Lord Palmerston an emphatic repetition of a phrase very disagreeable to the feelings of the Americanizing members who sat below the gangway. "The Federal Government has no relations with the Confederate States but that of war." As it has become plain by this time that, until it discontinues this relation, it will never have any other, would not the Premier do well to ask himself how long we are to consider ourselves bound by its obstinacy, and to have ourselves "no relations" with a people linked to us by the ties of common blood and common interests?

A SOUTHERN REPLY TO "HISTORICUS."

WE publish to-day from the Charleston Courier, the second and concluding portion of a review to the letters of "Historicus" to the Times on the law of nations respecting recognition. This admirable and unanswerable argument appeared over the signature of "Juridicus," but we are enabled to state that it is from the pen of the Hon. A. G. Magrath, late United States Judge for the District of South Carolina, and now a member of the Confederate Supreme Court for the same district. In this connection we may properly correct an error into which our Charleston contemporary has fallen in regard to the authorship of the "Historicus" letters. These letters, the temporary success of which is attributable to the fact that they afforded to the public a plausible pretext for neglecting an inconvenient moral obligation, in spite of the promptings of the national conscience, and not to their having convinced anybody or changed any one's previous opinions on the subject of recognition—are well known here to be the productions of Vernon Harcourt, Esq., a writer of greater repute than popularity, connected by marriage with the family of the late Secretary of War, Sir G. C. Lewis, and a barrister and special pleader of considerable ability. We state these facts on account of the erroneous mention of several other names in our Southern Exchanges.

A singularly apt refutation of the doctrines of the "Historicus" letters, by an authority which the author of those letters is above all others bound to respect, may not inappropriately be quoted here. In the second volume of "Dissertations and Discussions," by J. S. Mill, London, 1859, is an article reprinted from the Westminster Review, of April, 1849, being a vindication of the French Revolution of 1848. Speaking of the manifesto of M. de Lamartine, Mr. Mill says:—

One entirely new principle was for the first time established in Europe amidst general approbation within the last thirty years. It is that whenever two countries or two parts of the same country are engaged in war, and the war either continues long undecided, or threatens to be decided in a way involving consequences repugnant to humanity or to the general interest, other countries have a right to step in, to settle among themselves what they consider reasonable terms of accommodation; and if these are not accepted, to interfere by force, and compel the recalcitrant party to submit to the mandate. This new doctrine has been acted on by a combination of the Great Powers of Europe in three celebrated instances:—the interference between Greece and Turkey at Navarino, between Holland and Belgium at Antwerp, and between Turkey and Egypt at St. Jean d'Acre. It is too late in the day, after these precedents, to tell us that nations may not forcibly interfere with one another for the sole purpose of stopping mischief and benefiting humanity.

THE ATTACK ON PORT HUDSON.

(From our own Correspondent.)

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA,

Friday Morning, May 29.

Never were correspondents, citizens, editors, officers, soldiers, and sailors more mistaken than were nearly all the inhabitants of Louisiana when they supposed, as they have for a long time past, that Port Hudson was nearly evacuated, if not entirely deserted, by the Confederate troops. There were many things to induce this belief. Vicksburg has been largely reinforced—the return fire from the Port Hudson batteries to the almost daily visits of the Federal gun-boats had been very faint—the importance of the position was much lessened when the Federal fleet cut off the source of supplies from Red River—and there has been a wide-spread supposition that Banks's army could walk into the place any time these three weeks past.

Since Sunday last, however, public sentiment on this subject has materially changed. We have had rumours that the doors of Port Hudson did not stand wide open, and that an entrance there was disputed by a force of about ten thousand men, commanded by General Frank Gardner.

And last evening we received our first authentic intelligence with regard to the situation "up river." First came the despatch boat Antona, which left Port Hudson at eight o'clock, and Baton Rouge at half-past eleven o'clock Wednesday night. Close following, arrived the tug Ida, bringing three wounded officers. Soon, rumour was wild-flying through the streets; then came more definite reports; and lastly, we had news authentic and to be trusted.

Soon after Banks landed his army at Bayou Sara he marched down and effected a junction with Augur's division from Baton Rouge. The combined force was not far from 23,000 men. Augur already had had a sharp fight with the Confederates, who hoped to drive him back to Baton Rouge and prevent his junction with Banks. Last Sunday there were frequent skirmishes in the rear of Port Hudson. On Monday, at six A.M., there was an attempted attack by the Federals upon the earthworks in the rear of the place, while, during the day, Farragut's flag-ship, the Mouongahela, with the iron-clad Essex, the Richmond, and the Gennessee, engaged the batteries on the bluff and on the river bank, while half a dozen mortar schooners shelled the town. In the course of the day Banks sent word to the fleet that he had ninety field and siege guns in position, and that he was ready to co-operate with the fleet in a combined attack upon the place early next day.

All day Tuesday, the gun and mortar boats fired at intervals upon the batteries, and there was a deal of fighting in the rear of the town for several hours, without, however, any special gain on either side. Early Wednesday morning the fleet again engaged the batteries while the army attacked the entrenchments. At eight o'clock the fleet fell back, dropping down the river, and not renewing the attack till evening. The best gunners and artillerymen, who fired so effectively at the fleet the night of March 14, have gone to Vicksburg, or were employed at the land batteries in the rear. The firing was very bad, and although most of the shots were aimed at the flag-ship, so far as we can learn, none of the vessels were hit even once. The cannonading on land and the almost ceaseless roll of musketry continued almost without interruption all day long. Towards evening the fleet opened fire again. The army in the attack was disposed as follows:—Weitzel had the right wing, and engaged the force in the rear of the batteries above the town; Banks, Augur, Dudley, and Grover attacked the centre, and Sherman commanded the left wing. Some of Sherman's cavalry and infantry, late in the day, entered one of the lower batteries, and found the guns spiked and the place abandoned. While moving upon the second battery, Sherman, at the head of his division, was struck below the left knee, the ball shattering the bones, and he was borne from the field. He sent an aide for Brigadier-General Nickerson, but Nickerson had just been killed. During the day, three acting brigadiers,—Nickerson and Paine, of the 2nd Louisiana, and Chopin of the 42nd Massachusetts; Colonels Cowles, 128th New York; Clarke, 6th Michigan; Bullock, 20th Massachusetts, were all killed. General Sherman and Brigadier-General Neal Dow, and Lieutenant-Colonel Smith, of Duryea's Zouaves, were badly wounded. The 6th Michigan and 128th New York regiments were dreadfully cut up, losing full half their officers and men, and the killed and wounded of the entire Federal line number not less than 3,000 for that one day's fight. No doubt the Confederate loss is very, but not equally great. The 2nd Louisiana "Native Guards" attacked the works, going in with 900 and coming out in an almost inconceivably short space of time with only about 200 negroes! It is currently reported and generally believed that soon after Wednesday's engagement commenced, Frank Gardner sent a flag of truce to Banks, telling him that he did not wish to fight negroes, and asking him to remove them to the rear or to take them from the field. The three negro regiments raised in this department were all engaged. Banks refused to comply; and Gardner sent word, so the story goes, that if the negroes were engaged, he should raise the black flag, and neither give nor take quarter. The destruction among the negroes was terrible.

And why not? They were placed in front—a negro's life is of little account, it seems, in comparison with that of a white man's. But in view of the fact that it is proposed to raise a Corps d'Afrique of 18,000 blacks, it is hardly probable that the "niggers" (as all Abolitionists sneeringly call them) will be completely fascinated with a service which threatens to expose them to the hottest of every fight. It is one of Mrs. Beecher Stowe's boasts, that negroes discuss all subjects connected with their own welfare and misery among themselves, and the Port Hudson slaughter of Wednesday has been, you may be assured, a theme of much and animated confabulation among the blacks, griffs, and "coloured" men of every hue and shade in this city. Appropos, I learn that several hundred negroes were brought from the Teche and Lafourche regions yesterday, either for conscription or for safe-keeping; for it is widely rumoured that since the Attakapas country was abandoned by the Federals, so that every available man could take part in the movement upon Port Hudson, General Kirby Smith has come down with a force of 4,000 or 5,000 Confederates from Shreveport, and is reconnoitering along the lower part of the Teche.

From 6 till 8 o'clock on Wednesday night, the gun-boats and mortars shelled Port Hudson. The land fight was still in progress when the Antona left, and was going on all day yesterday. The Federals were confident that the place would be carried last night. Banks is said to have expressed himself determined to carry the position with this attempt, if it cost him 10,000 men. He does not wish to begin so formidable an undertaking de novo.

The early hour at which the mail-carrying steamer goes North this morning prevents the sending of further particulars, though we have no telegrams to indicate that Port Hudson was taken last night, and the fight will probably begin again this morning. You may receive the news of the final result, via Cairo and New York, before it can be sent from here.

Monday, May 18.

Now that the advance upon Alexandria is complete, we may say something about the Confederate force in this State. No doubt the despatches which go North by special steamer to-morrow, will contain full and glowing accounts of the various victories over the Confederate army at Camp Bisland, at Vermillion, and elsewhere on the Teche. But to speak of a "Confederate army," when it merely meant the handful of men who so vigorously opposed the advance till the column reached Opelousas, is a simple absurdity. The State has already sent its best men to the Virginian and Vicksburg armies, and General Dick Taylor, who was in command during the recent movement, never had more than 4,500 men, recently conscripted and reinforced by a small cavalry body from Texas. That these few men did their best to oppose the advance is sufficiently attested by the Federal hospital reports, and by the new-turfed graves that line the Teche. Forty-five hundred to dispute "the right of way" with 23,000 men; and then to get safely away, as nearly all did, and to effect a safe retreat into Texas, is doing much.

But the knowledge has come to us since the Teche fights, that even this small Confederate force was ordered to Richmond before Banks's advance. It hardly seems possible that the Confederate authorities, for the purpose of adding a few more hundred men to the already enormous army in front of the capital, could leave Louisiana entirely defenceless. But it is so. As it was, next to no defence at all could be offered; and there is a general impression that the people and planters of the Teche and the Attakapas country would have suffered far less if there had been no opposition whatever to the advance upon Alexandria. Alexandria is nothing in itself; but it is a good base for Banks on Red River, and it is strategically important to him, as I wrote you in my last, in his descent upon Port Hudson.

There are some additional particulars about the Fort de Russy affair which are interesting. This position was midway between Alexandria and the Mississippi, commanding an abrupt bend in the river, and in itself almost impregnable. There were three batteries on the river bank, mounting one gun each, and in the rear a star-shaped fort (De Russy) well built and well armed. A raft of logs extended across the river, and the trees on the opposite bank were cut down, giving full sweep to the guns. General Mouton was in command of a small force at the fort, and he could have successfully kept back Porter's gun-boats, were it not for the advance of Banks by land.

When Mouton heard of the march up the Teche of a large force of Federal soldiers, as he had no place of retreat in case they came in his rear, he ordered his guns to be thrown into the river; the forts and batteries were dismantled, and he embarked his few men on steamers and went up to Shreveport. For this, it is understood that he is now under court-martial; but there really seems to have been but one alternative for action—it was go, or be "gobbled." When Porter went up from the Mississippi with the gun-boats Estrella, Arizona, and Albatross, he reached the raft and found the fort deserted. Above the raft, however, were two small cotton-clad steamers, one of which was soon disabled by a shot, and the Federals reported her as destroyed. She was not, but was towed safely by the other boat to Shreveport; and on the way up they notified the Alexandrians that Porter had destroyed the raft, burned two houses on shore, and that he would soon be up the river. If Kirby Smith, as has been reported, was there with a small force, he at once embarked, and went further up the river, saving his material and men. But I do not think there was any Confederate force there, and that Kirby Smith was all the while at Archidelpia in Arkansas.

When Porter arrived he immediately appointed one of his officers as naval commander of the town, and called upon the mayor to assist him in preserving order. He then issued an order that all persons must stay in the house after nine o'clock at night, that the property of those who should sell liquor would be confiscated, and that the inhabitants must attend strictly to such rules as he might establish from time to time. And thus, awaiting Banks's arrival, the new reign began.

When the army arrived, Banks sent Weitzel with three or four thousand men up the river road towards Shreveport, to see if he could discover anything of Kirby Smith. At last accounts he was seventy-five miles above Alexandria, and "marching on." Meanwhile, every boat capable of carrying troops was brought up through the Atchafalaya in readiness for the movement from Red River. For the past two days the army has been massing at Simmes's Ferry, near the point where the Atchafalaya runs out of Red River, and not far from the Mississippi. From this point the movement will be to Bayou Sara, exactly as I wrote you in my last, and it will be first against Port Hudson, which is generally believed to be evacuated. Banks expects, at all events, an easy victory at Port Hudson, and then, in conjunction with Grant, he proposes to try Vicksburg. If the Confederates have gone from Port Hudson to assist in strengthening Vicksburg, the reduction of the latter place will furnish a full summer's work for the Federal fleet and forces.

Not much more can be done by unacclimatized Northern troops in this department till the warm season is over. There is now a great deal of diarrhoea and typhoid in the Federal army, and as the season advances there will be an increased rather than diminished sick-list. Nor are we free from fears that the yellow fever may visit us, and this dread disease, which is a source of alarm and anxiety to old residents, will make fearful havoc in regiments unused to the climate, living in all the irregularities of army life, and in the hands of verdant Northern surgeons, who know nothing of the treatment of the disease.

Farragut went up to Port Hudson on the Monongahela last Saturday to direct the movements of his gun-boats. Banks goes up to-morrow; meanwhile, we suppose his army is now crossing the Mississippi to Bayou Sara, and in a very few days we ought to receive the intelligence of his operations at Port Hudson.

The latest Federal raid in the direction of Pontchartroula resulted in the capture of two or three Confederate soldiers and fourteen young, full-blooded Choctaw Indians, only one of whom could speak English. They were from Lower Mississippi, and were engaged in guarding the line of the Jackson railroad. We have had a painful report that Stonewall Jackson, who lost an arm at Fredericksburg, had not survived the amputation. He would be an enormous loss to the Confederate army, and his character as a soldier, a Christian, and a man, is universally respected by his foes, as well as by his friends. Ex-Governor Mouton has been arrested at his residence near Vermillion, in the Teche country, and he has been placed in charge of the Provost Marshal in this city. The "registered enemies," as they are called, are now daily crossing the Lake in schooners chartered by themselves, or in the Federal boat Brown, to pass Christian, Madisonville, and to East Pascagoula. There are about 2,000 to go in all; though the new and stringent oath, which rumour says is to be administered to the suspected, will send over many more. Not less than 2,000 young men, registered as enemies, have slipped through the lines, without waiting for Federal transportation, and have joined the Confederate army. On the last list there are twenty of the longest-established and best physicians in the city, and after they had made their arrangements to depart, they have been privately informed that no one of them will be allowed to leave the city, till fears of an epidemic have gone by. The Federals feel that these "enemies" who are thoroughly acquainted with local diseases, may possibly be their best friends before summer is over. The military Governor of the State has issued a general order, declaring the act of the Legislature (March 6, 1857), prohibiting the emancipation of slaves, entirely inoperative—as "never having been adopted by the military authorities, and as being inconsistent with the principles which control the policy of the Government." So then, the Abolition element in the Federal "policy" is not quite exhausted, and is to be tried a while longer before, and as auxiliary to, the initiation of the grand scheme of extermination. This last is nearly ready for proclamation. You have noted, no doubt, that Butler openly advocated it in New York, and a leading general (not Banks) in this department, said not long ago, that "this was to be a war of extermination." "These people," said he, "must come under the flag, and they must do it soon, or we" (who are "we"? "will exterminate them; and we" (query, again), "can do it." The Governor of Connecticut, who has just been re-elected by the votes of soldiers sent for the purpose from the Potomac army, in his message, speaking of the rebellion, says, "Let the retribution be so terrible, that future generations shall not dare to repeat the crime." Thus has "restoration" given place to retribution and revenge.

From Texas and the Rio Grande we have advices by papers of the 24th ult. Major-Gen. J. Bankread Magruder commanding, had been on a tour of inspection through his department, and was then at Fort Brown, on the Rio Grande. He was enthusiastically received at Brownsville, and was tendered the compliment of a public dinner. Governor Lopez, of Tamaulipas, Mexico, paid him an official visit. Leon Smith was with General Magruder, and the following officers were on his staff:—Colonel M'Neil, Majors Dickinson, Pendleton, Magruder, and Smith; Dr. Berrison, Captains Turner, Dwyer, Alston, Ray, Da Ponte; Lieutenants Stanard and Yancey.

One of General Magruder's much approved acts in the department was the revocation of all cotton orders; and hereafter the exportation of cotton is to be unrestricted. The $5 exchange is abolished. Cotton was quoted at 25 to 29 cents per pound, at Brownsville.

We received the Times, by last steamer, with the report of the debate on American affairs. Said a gentleman to one of the Federal navy surgeons, "The Times says that it is useless to deny that there is much irritation on the subject of American affairs, in all classes in England." "Well," replied the surgeon, "it is useless to deny that there is much irritation in all classes in America, with regard to the English outfit of ships and iron-clads for the Emperor of China. The two irritations may produce a suppuration, requiring the use of the lancet." "Then with your iron-clads built and building, you really are ready to fight with England?" "By no means; England was never better, nor America worse prepared for a naval war than now." That's so; and Mr. Lincoln says that England "may kick us" first.

Saturday Evening, May 23.

General Banks rejoined his army at Simmes port this week, going up by the way of the Atchafalaya. Every Federal soldier left Alexandria and went down the river, the gunboat Switzerland lying opposite the place and remaining to watch. Nor was there a force left at Opelousas; only a few soldiers at Berry's Landing near by to take care of the piles of collected and "confiscated" cotton there waiting shipment. Soon after Banks's arrival at Simmes port, his army began to move towards the Mississippi, and by this time they are all across and concentrated at Bayou Sara, fifteen miles above Port Hudson.

Meanwhile, the Mail and Government steamers here were taken to Baton Rouge to carry Augur's division up the river, saving the men the march by land. A gunboat was sent within range of the batteries a few nights since, and fired a few shells. The return fire was so light that there was a general impression that the place was nearly abandoned. A deserter or two, a runaway negro, and a captured picket, all reported that the force inside of Port Hudson was very small. The most of those who were there when Farragut ran the batteries (March 14), had gone to Vicksburg.

You have already read from New York, where the news was received via Cairo, that Grant has been at Jackson—I say "has" been, because there are strong reasons for believing that he is not there now. The Mobile Evening News, in announcing that Grant had invested Jackson, said that it was permitted by the Confederates, and that "there was nothing discouraging, much less alarming, in the aspect of such a campaign programme." It is known that Grant had command of the line of the Jackson railroad as far down (seventy-eight miles) as the late Confederate camp, Moore at Tangipahoa. It is quite as well known that he has fallen back to this point—perhaps to operate with Banks and Augur in the rear of Port Hudson—at least, that is the reason assigned by the Federals. There are in town, to-day, Mobile papers of the 19th and 20th, and they contain such information as to render their retention at headquarters a matter of prudence. Rumour says that Grant has met unexpected friends, and that they did not treat him and his men with that hospitality for which the South was once so distinguished.

The Mobile Evening News, of the 16th inst., contained the following correspondence between H.B.M.'s Consul, James Magee, Esq., and prominent citizens:—

JAMES MAGEE, ESQ., LATE H.B.M.'S CONSUL AT MOBILE.
MOBILE, May 14, 1863.
To James Magee, Esq., late H.B.M.'s Consul at Mobile.

Dear Sir,—The undersigned, representing the sentiments of the civil and military elements of this community, desiring to offer to you some token of their personal esteem, as well as their respect for you, as the retiring Consul of Her Britannic Majesty at this port, ask your acceptance of a public dinner, to be given at the Battle House, at 6 P.M., on Monday, the 18th inst.

As a Briton, who understands the sacredness of our Confederate struggle for the true principles of English freedom, and who has suffered official decapitation because of his just appreciation of it—as a gentleman long resident and highly esteemed amongst us, and as a public functionary, who has fulfilled all the requirements of an honourable and responsible station—we owe and desire to testify to you, in the name of our fellow citizens, our respect and sympathy, and to accompany you, wherever the fortunes of life may lead you, with our best wishes for your prosperity and happiness.

We have the honour to remain, dear Sir,

Your obedient servants,

FRANKLIN BUCHANAN, Admiral C. S. N.
J. S. SLAUGHTER, Brig.-Gen. Com.
CHAS. WALSH.
DAN. McNEILL.
R. H. SLOUGH, Mayor.
JOHN FORSYTH.
H. A. SCHROEDER.
CHAS. A. MARSTON.
DAN. WHEELER.
GEO. A. KETCHUM.
J. E. MURRELL.

MOBILE, May 15, 1863.

To Franklin Buchanan, Admiral C. S. N., J. E. Slaughter, Brig.-Gen. Commanding, Hon. R. H. Slough, Mayor, Hon. John Forsyth, and others.

Gentlemen,—I have before me your note of yesterday, inviting me, in the name of yourselves and other citizens of Mobile, to a public dinner, to be given at the Battle House, on Monday, the 18th inst.

I regret exceedingly that my limited time here, previous to my departure for Europe, will deprive me of the pleasure of accepting this mark of esteem from my fellow-citizens, with many of whom I have so long and so pleasantly passed the happiest days of my life.

I beg, gentlemen, for yourselves, you will accept my most grateful thanks for this kindness, and convey to the other citizens my full appreciation of their esteem.

I have the honour to remain,

Your friend and servant,

JAMES MAGEE.

The "starving rebels" there, as the Northern papers call them, are abundantly supplied by blockade-runners, if the advertisements of "just-received goods" mean anything. A publishing house in Mobile (Messrs. Goetzel and Co.) have reprinted an edition of 10,000 copies of Bulwer's "Strange Story," and have placed $1,000 to the author's credit. It will be a favour to them and to the reading public in the Confederacy if the next boat "direct" would bring out the English translation of "Les Miserables," "No Name," Kinglake's Invasion of the Crimea, and anything worth reprinting. It is easy to send letters, but difficult to get a book through the lines from here.

The "nigger regiment" enlistments proceed very slowly. To illustrate the excellent discipline that obtains among these native guards, it may be mentioned that a private killed a sergeant (both black) the evening before last. A general order has been issued offering to the nine-months' men, whose term is about to expire, $50, if they will re-enlist for one year, and $100 for two years, with forty days' furlough and transportation to New York and back. You shall be duly informed if they bite freely at the bait. Sherman takes the field, and Emory relieves him in command of the defences of New Orleans. Ex-Governor Mouton, taken prisoner on his plantation near Vermillion, because his name appears as President of the Convention which passed the secession ordinance, is in a house in First-street, in this city, waited upon by his own servants, but under all the restraints of a military arrest. Some of the "registered enemies" ordered to leave the city were summarily stopped as they were about to depart, and were told to stay here. No reasons were given. A poor Jesuit schoolmaster was fined $250 (£50), yesterday, because some of his little boys drew pencil sketches of Confederate flags on the fly-leaves of their school books; several ladies have been fined for similar "treasonable practices" on the part of their scholars. People here are "reading up" on the history of Hungary and Poland. A newspaper correspondent for a Northern journal recently published a card with regard to his own "arbitrary arrest" (for writing a paragraph he never saw till it was in print), which was pronounced "seditious," and he was ordered to go to New York. He preferred to accompany the advance to Alexandria, and on his return was arrested and placed in confinement. I have no idea that General Banks knows half of the doings of his subordinates. He is himself so widely different in all things from his predecessor in office, that all classes of citizens have been disposed to respect him. But the number of annoying and unnecessary—indeed, contemptible orders, lately issued, are inducing many to pray for the return even of Butler.

The next steamer ought to carry North something definite about affairs at Port Hudson. The occupation of that place has ceased to be of the least importance to the Confederates now that the source of supplies from Red River is cut off. If the Federals take Port Hudson, military operations, in this State, at least, are closed for a summer rest. There may be a naval expedition against Mobile or Galveston, but I do not think at present.

There is no business doing here. The city is tolerably healthy—stringent quarantine regulations issued by the military governor require that vessels touching at Key West or Havana, shall remain below at Balize ten days. The only steamers which have arrived via Key West since the issue of the order were United States' transports, and they were permitted to come up without quarantine, for, of course, no "loyal" vessel would be guilty of bringing the yellow fever to 40,000 Federal troops.

Wednesday, May 27.

The latest news, received here last night, reports that Banks had effected a junction with Augur, and that they were investing Port Hudson. The gun-boats have been shelling the place for a day or two, but the batteries have not responded, and there is a general belief that the position is nearly, if not quite, evacuated.

When Banks's army first landed at Bayou Sara, the residence of ex-Governor Robert C. Wickliffe, near there, was surrounded by soldiers. He was arrested, and sent to this city, with other prisoners taken near Port Hudson. Even the official (Banks's) organ, says, "that he took no part in the acts of secession." Yet he is likely to remain a prisoner for some time to come.

In the fight with Augur's division, May 21, when the Confederates in very small force came out from Port Hudson and gave battle in the open ground, the Federals lost 19 killed and 80 wounded. The list of names is given in the official organ.

The accounts of Grant's operations near Vicksburg are likely to reach you from the north sooner than from here. We have the very conflicting accounts—first from Augur, near Port Hudson, that Grant, on the 20th inst., "carried two parallels, captured 6,000 prisoners, and took 100 guns;" and next the Confederate account of the same day's work, telegraphed from Jackson (showing that they had control of the wires) to the Mobile papers, as follows:—

JACKSON, May 22.—Heavy firing is heard in the direction of Vicksburg this morning.

It is reported and believed in official circles, and generally believed here, that the enemy assaulted our works at Vicksburg on Wednesday, the 20th inst., and were badly repulsed.

JACKSON, May 22.—Snyder's Bluff is evacuated, and a courier reports that Yazoo City was captured yesterday by the Federals. The Navy Yard was burned by us.

An officer, who left Vicksburg on Monday night, got safely through with 600 mules. He reports that Grant attacked Vicksburg and was whipped back.

Another despatch from Jackson, of the same date as the above, mentions the fact that General Grant had made three assaults on Vicksburg. A semi-official report says that Sterling Price has captured Helena.

Time will tell which of these telegrams are true.

The Brandon (Miss.) Republican publishes the following account of the attempt to "restore the Union" in Jackson:—

In order to ascertain the amount of damage done by the Federals during their forty-eight hours' occupation of the city of Jackson, we went over and took a careful survey of the place yesterday morning, and give below the result of our observations. We could not get a complete list of the property burned and destroyed, owing to the great confusion in the city. The following buildings were burned:—

Given the cotton factory, together with all the machinery, 300 bales of cotton, and all the buildings connected with the factory; Phillips's factory, and all the small buildings connected therewith; J. A. Stevens's foundry; Bailey's cotton shed, containing a large quantity of tar, lime, cement, &c.; Catholic Church and parsonage; Mrs. Bakewell's house and contents; Confederate house, together with furniture, &c.; railroad depot, and all the buildings immediately west and east of the same; state penitentiary, with all the machinery; flouring mill near Phillips's factory; all the houses on State Street from Shaw's store to Graves's corner, including Green's banking house; Ambrozier's grocery; Allen and Ligon's store; and Graves's large brick building, with a number of small intervening houses; all the houses on the south side of Pearl Street from State Street to the Mississippi Baptist office, including the Confederate Quartermaster's office, a number of sheds or warehouses near the old depot of the southern railroad, containing an immense quantity of cotton, sugar, molasses, &c., and a number of old cars belonging to both railroads; all the houses in front of the City Hall and Market House, except Mrs. Sanders's boarding house and one or two small shops; Lemley's hat factory; Robinson's warehouse; General Freeman's dwelling-house; all the buildings belonging to the fair grounds; the rope factory and saltpetre works; the railroad and city bridges across Pearl River, and all the bridges and trestle work on the Southern railroad; all shops where government work was being carried on. All the stores were pillaged, their contents either carried off or thrown into the street and burned. The Mississippian office was broken open, the type thrown into the street, and the press and furniture broken up. The Post-office was rifled of its contents. The Governor's mansion was broken open and pianos and furniture destroyed.

The Episcopal Church was entered and the whole interior defaced. Nearly all the private residences were entered and trunks broken open, fine dresses torn to pieces, and all jewellery, silver wares, and provisions taken. Dr. Knapp's office was broken open, his dental instruments carried off, and his furniture destroyed. Captain L. Jullien's book store and bindery was destroyed. J. W. Gray and Co.'s drug store was partially destroyed. Joseph Morgridge was an extensive sufferer by the depredations of the enemy. E. Verden's loss in sugar, molasses, &c., is estimated at $200,000. D. W. Busiek lost heavily in his tobacco and commission store.

Allen and Ligon lost all their books, papers, money, and merchandise. Dr. S. C. Farrar lost his horses and mules. J. M. Rawlnt lost his carriage and carriage horses. Almost every horse, mule, cow, and hog in the city was taken. Negroes, from 300 to 500, were taken from the city and the adjacent country, and about 100 of them were armed before they left the city.

Intelligent gentlemen estimate the total loss of property in the city at five millions of dollars.

On Friday morning a squadron of cavalry came over to Rankin and tore up the railroad about four miles, and a few rails at other places to within two miles of Brandon. They ransacked the private dwellings for arms and ammunition, taking away a few negroes, horses, and mules. Among the chief sufferers in the raid were Mrs. S. M. Hamilton, 14 negroes; Austin Neely, 14 negroes; A. J. Neely, 6 negroes; A. P. Miller, 4 negroes; G. W. Rains, 2 negroes; General P. Henry, 1 negro and 3 horses, &c.

It is asserted and believed that in the retreat between Jackson and Clinton many houses were burned, and nearly all the horses and cattle driven away.

The account further says that the Federal soldiers robbed citizens of their watches in the streets! Can it be that these acts are committed by soldiers from the refined, free, and cultivated North? This attempt to "restore the Union" is only equalled by the recent wanton destruction of the beautiful city of Pensacola, and the robbing and burning of houses on the Teche. With the contractors and camp followers it is merely a mercenary war; with the troops and conscripts it promises to be merciless.

H. B. M.'s late consul at Mobile came over the lake on the last boat, and is now in this city.

Already advertisements appear in the Mobile papers for the formation of a Louisiana regiment from among the New Orleans refugees whom Banks sent out as registered enemies. $50 bounty is offered to every recruit, and Colonel A. W. Merriam, who is well known in this city, will take command. Goods through the so-called blockade are arriving very freely. In my last papers (the 23rd instant), the Ruby's cargo, direct from Liverpool, is offered at auction. Major-General D. H. Maury commands the Department, in place of General Buckner, who has gone to Vicksburg with his entire force.

The following officers are on General Maury's staff:—Lieutenant-Colonel George C. Garner, Majors D. W. Flowerree, C. L. Jackson, E. H. Cummins, and W. E. Burnett, Captain J. W. Gillespie, and Lieutenant D. F. Holland.

From Butler's very elaborate testimony before the committee on the conduct of the war it appears that his occupation of the State of Louisiana from Donaldsonville on the Mississippi to Berwick's Bay was not for the purpose of "restoring" a valuable portion of the State to the Union, not for the protection of the planters, but wholly and only in order that the Abolition Government at Washington might add two more votes to the motley throng which swallowed and "passed" all the war measures emanating from the Cabinet. Hear Butler's own evidence before the committee:—

In the meantime I was informed from Washington that it would be very desirable to have congressional elections held in that part of Louisiana which was under our control. The difficulty about that was, that New Orleans was divided into two election districts. The lower district was composed of the lower part of the city of New Orleans, and all of the State below the city. The other district composed the remainder of New Orleans and all along the river above for sixty miles to Donaldsonville. I therefore sent an expedition under General Weitzel, to Donaldsonville, and swept down through that country to Berwick Bay; drove out the enemy, who were there in considerable force, and brought the whole of that region, from one end to the other, within the Union lines. I thus got under the control of the American soldiery nearly the two districts now represented by Mr. Flanders and Mr. Hahn. General Shepley, as Military Governor, then issued his proclamation for an election, in order that every man in those districts should be allowed to vote who had taken the oath, and had the other qualifications prescribed by the laws of Louisiana; and everybody did vote.

Thus, according to Butler's own testimony, Messrs. Flanders and Hahn, who have been imposed upon foreign countries and the North as specimens of "loyal sentiment at the South," are simply two gentlemen who were elected at the point of the bayonet—by bullets, not by ballots—and in two districts which Butler "got" "under the control of the American soldiery." And this is "free America!" "Free," when it is "Copperheadism" and treason to talk of peace.

The steamboat Louisiana Belle was sent last week from Brashear City to Barre's Landing, near Opelousas, to collect a cargo of "confiscated" cotton. She loaded and was returning, when several sharpshooting Confederates followed her down the bayou five miles, killing the captain of the boat and wounding ten Federal soldiers on board.

A journal published in Boston—say 2,000 miles from here—attempts to glorify the recent advance into the Opelousas region by declaring that "it was occupied by an aggregate rebel force of 20,000 men;" and the official journal copies and "leads" the paragraph, although it is known to be utterly false, since the entire "rebel force," with the auxiliaries from Texas, did not number 6,000 men.

We have nothing later from Port Hudson to send by the morning's steamer to New York. Business is very dull. The general health of the city is good for the season. The weather is summerly and delightful.

The steamer Sea Queen, Captain French, arrived at Matmoras on May 19, after a passage of 29½ days from Falmouth, reports 60 vessels in port and trade dull.

THE ADDRESS FROM SOUTHERN CLERGYMEN.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—In case it has not been previously suggested, I should be glad to originate by a subscription of twenty shillings, a reprint in a Tract form, for universal distribution, of the "Address from Southern Clergymen," in your last impression. In so doing, of course, I do not indorse every sentiment or expression (nor what always occurs in your paper), but I can overlook these in the assertion of great principles, and subscribe myself,

AN ENGLISH LIBERAL and Member of the Society of Friends.

Reigate, 17th 6 Month, 1863

P.S.—Of course the Morning Star, if it means what it says, in the slightest degree, in its article of yesterday, ought to head the list by a handsome subscription, or at least, in common consistency, should reprint the "Address," in extenso, in its own columns.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, June 16.

The Emperor's letter on the fall of Puebla, inserted in yesterday's Moniteur, with its expression of a policy of conciliation, is the best proof what practical importance this event has. The expedition was unpopular, both with the army and the people, from the slowness of its progress rather than the distance of its scene of action. Of this feeling every advantage was taken by the discontented, and it began to be felt that if the dénouement was much longer deferred, the consequences at home might be disastrous. On the arrival of the news, all the sovereigns of Europe, one after another, telegraphed their congratulations to the Emperor, excepting the Queen of England. The omission has been very generally remarked on in the press, but it may be explained by English respect for precedent, and I doubt if there be any precedent authorizing a constitutional sovereign to express an opinion on the victories of another state.

The second ballot for the representation of one of the Paris circumscriptions has ended in the return by a large majority of the editor of the Opinion Nationale. Again, it may be remarked that more than one-quarter of the electors abstained from voting. Thus the whole of the members for Paris are inimical to the Government. M. Thiers has just had his place marked in the Legislative Assembly on the extreme left, beside M. Jules Favre. The only influence the elections have had on the Emperor's determination, has been his refusal to allow M. de Persigny's retirement for the present. There are some ministerial changes on the tapis. The Minister of Public Works, M. Rouher, is succeeded by the Prefect of the Seine, M. Haussmann, who, however, retains in his attributions the Demolitions of Paris, in which he has distinguished himself so actively. M. Barot, brother of the Minister in Madrid, becomes Prefect, and M. Baroche resigns the post of minister without a portfolio. This was inevitable, after the unfortunate disclosures made about his son by M. de Persigny, during the late elections.

There is a singular unanimity among the Paris papers in urging extreme measures against Russia in the Polish question. Only M. Emile de Girardin brings out a new pamphlet, L'Apaisement de la Pologne, which advocates its absorption into a free Russia, as the only possible means of permanent pacification. He says,—"The more I read and study the books and documents in which the separation and independence of Poland are advocated, the less am I able to believe in them. The researches I have made to strengthen my convictions in favour of these, have had no other effect than to weaken, and at last to destroy them. I only gave up the idea of the independence and separation of Poland, which I had at first thought the simplest solution, after I had recognised, not without regret, that it could not be realised, and that even if realised, it would not meet the object sought by diplomacy, namely, the assuring a durable peace in Poland."

There is nothing to report regarding American affairs the only article on the subject which has appeared for a week, was in the Siècle of Saturday. I have often admired the ignorance and limited political education of the majority of Frenchmen, who set up to teach the people through the columns of the newspapers. Of course, I presume that the ignorance is real, and the misrepresentations involuntary. In an article headed the Pirates of the South, the author utterly ignores the character of men of war which the Alabama, &c. possess, and calls in question their really having letters of marque, or if they have them, whether the Richmond Government had a right to issue such. On these premises he argues that letters of marque do not entitle to destroy, but only to capture. He then remarks that the disappearance of French ships is of frequent occurrence, and suggests that this is probably due to the malpractices of these Southern pirates, who, when they can do so with secrecy, may not hesitate to attack rich French ships.

A SOUTHERN REPLY TO "HISTORICUS."

(No. 2.)

Besides the argument rested upon the rule of International Law as contended for by "Historicus," and the practice of Great Britain under that rule, there are other considerations referred to, presenting objections, it is said, great, if not insuperable, to the present recognition of the Confederate States. Of these, three are made prominent. They are: First, That the claim set up by these States, of each being an independent sovereignty, makes their political union only a partnership, dissoluble at pleasure; and as such the Government is not a Government of that stable and permanent form which any foreign State could or ought to recognise. Second, That there is no sufficient distinct definition of the territorial limits of the Confederate States, to sustain the claim now made for their recognition. Third, That, until foreign nations are prepared with the arrangement they will propose concerning the institution of slavery, any interference in the present contest would be mischievous to them.

The first of these objections, if it had any weight, would prove much more than it is now proposed to establish. But while thus assumed in the letter of "Historicus" as a practical difficulty in the way of recognition, it is wholly ignored in that part of his argument in which he discusses the right of recognition. While, therefore, the non-existence of sovereignty is assumed as the basis of the argument, addressed to the denial of the right of recognition; the claim to the possession of the same sovereignty is urged as the practical objection to the enjoyment of the same right. If the States are sovereign, the question of right is clear; if they are not sovereign, the practical difficulty now suggested cannot be sustained. We hope that it will be within our capacity to show, that while the States are sovereign, and with them, therefore, the question of right is clear; yet, being sovereign, none of the practical difficulties which have been suggested can be sustained. If the objection which is now urged could avail, it would have been unanswerable when the colonies declared their independence and final separation from Great Britain. If their condition now, as separate States and independent sovereignties, is the same as they have ever maintained, and is the same as was eighty years since, recognised by the Powers of Europe, that condition cannot be considered an objection, at this time, either great or insuperable.

Let us come, then, to the facts, by which it will be seen that their condition now is precisely what it was then. The Treaty of Alliance with France was made the 8th of February, 1778. Its preamble announces, in plain terms, that "The most Christian King and the United States of North America, to wit, New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, have this day concluded a Treaty of Amity and Commerce." The Treaty of Amity and Commerce concluded the same day, in its preamble designates the parties to it as "The most Christian King and the Thirteen United States of North America," and then enumerates them in the Treaty of Alliance. The Treaty of Amity and Commerce with the Netherlands, concluded the 8th of October, 1782, sets forth in its preamble, as the parties to it, "Their High Mightinesses, the States General of the United Netherlands, and the United States of America, to wit: New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia." The Provisional Articles of Peace between Great Britain and the States which had been her colonies, bear date the 30th of November, 1782. The first article acknowledges "The said United States—viz., New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, to be free, sovereign and independent States; that he (his Britannic Majesty) treats with them as such and for himself, his heirs and successors, relinquishes all claims to the Government, property, and territorial rights of the same and every part thereof." In the definitive Treaty of Peace with Great Britain, concluded the 3rd of September, 1783, His Britannic Majesty acknowledges the said United States—viz., New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, to be free, sovereign and independent States; that he treats with them as such; and for himself, his heirs and successors, relinquishes all claims to the Government, property and territorial rights of the same and every part thereof." The Treaty of Amity and Commerce with Sweden, which bears date the 3rd of April, 1783, sets forth in its preamble as the parties to it, "The King of Sweden, of the Goths and Vandals, &c., &c., and the thirteen United States of North America—namely, New Hampshire," and the others as named in the preceding extracts.

It would scarcely be possible that more explicit and positive terms could be used than were thus employed by Great Britain in the recognition of the separate independence of these States.

The States are enumerated and specially named. The declaration or recognition of their rights is as "free, sovereign and independent States." And the treaty was with them, of course, as such.

If it be said that recognition and the treaty were with them in their confederated capacity, it may be replied, that in the joint recognition, is also the recognition of each State in its distinct sovereign and independent condition. Great Britain did not recognise the Government of the United States; for the States had not yet established a permanent Government; but its recognition of the separate States, involved, of course, the recognition of the Government of each State; and a part of the Government of each State was the Government which might be established by it in its federated capacity. Indeed, if the recognition of the Government of the United States is not derived through the recognition of the sovereignty and independence of the several States, that Government never has been recognised, except by the treaties subsequently made with it. When France recognised these States in 1778; when the Netherlands recognised in 1782, when Great Britain recognised in 1783, the Constitution of the United States had not been adopted. The Government which was subsequently adopted by the United States had not been created. And besides the recognition of these Powers, at these several periods of time, there has been no other recognition of the United States. If it be said, that the Government, could it be so called, under the Articles of Confederation, was that which was recognised, it ceased to exist when the Constitution of the United States was adopted. And if the recognition of the Government of the whole, and not the independence of the several States was intended, there would have been upon the organisation of the new Government under the Constitution a new recognition of it. But there was no new recognition, and there was none such required or intended. The States which sprang into the condition of independent political communities, had each been a colony; in their colonial condition, they were severally and separately dependent; as afterwards they became severally and separately independent. The history of their progress to independence is not that of a large community broken up into thirteen parts; but that of thirteen communities, settled at different times, governed under different charters, each maintaining it, until it was recognised. So separate and distinct was the colonial condition of each, that Connecticut, as is well known, denied any right or lawful authority to cause its militia to be ordered to the defence of New York, when both were colonies under the same crown. It was not with these States as is the case with France or other European Governments, that of Great Britain itself, for instance, under Cromwell, where upon the change of Government, there must be a new recognition of the new form of Government. No such necessity existed in the United States; because that Government which represented the several States with foreign States, was the representative of the separate sovereignties, already recognised; and did not represent them otherwise, than in their relations with foreign nations.

But more than this. When the Constitution of the United States was adopted by nine States, the Government created by the Articles of Confederation ceased to exist. The Constitution of the United States bound no States except such as adopted it. When the Conventions of nine States ratified the Constitution, it became thereby established. At that time four States were not bound by it. Of these two soon after accepted it; but North Carolina and Rhode Island delayed for some time their acceptance. They were then evidently no portion of the United States. Were they the less "free, sovereign, and independent States?" Did that explicit and positive recognition of their independence, which had been made by France, the Netherlands, and Great Britain, depend for its validity upon their acceptance of the Constitution adopted by the other States? Was the recognition of their separate independence equivalent to nothing more than that whenever they ceased to be a part of the United States, they would again become the colonies of Great Britain? Surely not. And if they were not each, as a State, "free, sovereign, and independent," what meaning or conception of their condition can be had by those who consider the recognition of their independence at that day as confined exclusively to their aggregated and united condition?

But in truth, curious as it may seem, the political organization of the several States which composed the United States, was doubtless much better known by those who then directed the statesmanship of Europe, than it has been at a more recent period. At that day the organization of the several States which composed the United States, not only in their united but in their separate political capacity, was curiously investigated and carefully studied. And despite the opinion of some at the present day, that organization was then considered rather indicative of strength, and the evidence of probable permanence. Benjamin Franklin and Silas Deane, writing from Paris in March, 1777, say "our Articles of Confederation being by our means translated and published here, have given an appearance of consistence and firmness to the American States and Government that begins to make them considerable. The separate Constitutions of the several States are also translating and publishing here, which afford abundance of speculation to the politicians of Europe." The letter of Mr. Webster to Baring Brothers and Co., in 1839, and which may be considered an exposition addressed to European nations, is a more recent explanation of the relations of these States to the common Government. The opinions of that distinguished man will be scarcely considered as affected with prejudices in favour of the slaveholding States. "Every State," said he, "is an independent, sovereign, political community, except in so far as certain powers, which it might otherwise have exercised, have been conferred on a General Government, established under a written Constitution, and exercising its authority over the people of all the States. Its General Government is a limited Government. Its powers are specific and enumerated. All powers not conferred on it still remain with the States or with the people. The State Legislatures on the other hand possess all usual and ordinary powers of Government, subject to any limitation which may be imposed by their own Constitutions, and with the exception, as I have said, of the operations on those powers of the Constitution of the United States." The circumstances which called forth this letter, and the character of the persons to whom it was addressed, give to it much more significance than otherwise would be attached to the opinions of an individual, however distinguished.

This view of the relations between the States and the General Government came to be practically understood in a very striking manner by the law of the State of South Carolina, establishing the regulations which must be observed in the case of coloured seamen, arriving in any of its ports. This matter has been particularly offensive to Great Britain, it would seem, from the pertinacious opposition made to it some time since by a former representative of the British Government. The authority of the Government of the United States was invoked to remove the objectionable law. The consequence which the remonstrance to the Government of the United States was intended to develop, was a conflict between the treaty-making power of the Government, and the sovereign authority of the State. The conflict, if established, it was supposed, would conclude the question. And it was so. But it did not conclude it, in the manner supposed. For the sovereign power of the State was paramount to the treaty-making power, if there could arise an actual conflict between them. A proper conflict, however, could not arise between them; for the fact that the operation of a treaty would affect the sovereignty of a State, was in itself the conclusive evidence that the power to make treaties had been abused, by involving in its operation that which it could not reach.

When, therefore, "Historicus" urges as a difficulty in the way of recognition, that the circumstances under which it is claimed involve the recognition of the States as so many distinct and independent sovereignties, the reply is that precisely in that mode the recognition was made by France, the Netherlands, and Great Britain at the time of the American Revolution. And when he asserts that a Government so organized "is not a Government of such a stable and permanent form as any foreign State could or ought to recognise," he subjects himself to severe criticism. Such was the Government of the United States. Did it not have as much power as foreign Governments desired? Was there any nation in Europe which regarded it as so weak and impotent as not to deserve a place in the family of nations? Do not its now discovered parts exhibit, each for itself, power, capacity, and resources which even to European nations would be considered formidable? And is not this the consequence of such a system of Government as that which "Historicus" assumes to be neither stable nor permanent? If stability and permanency be essential to recognition, was not the stability and permanency of the Government which the several States composing the United States, organized for their common Government, as stable and permanent as that of France in the last eighty years, or of the South American States in the last thirty or forty years?

Such is the case fairly stated. That case is not fairly stated when, in the argument of "Historicus," it is said "that, if South Carolina is and always was an independent sovereign State no struggle for independence was necessary antecedent to her recognition by the European Powers." Is the argument then intended to maintain the proposition that, because the Government of the United States has attempted the subjugation of the States which constitute the Confederate States, therefore these States never were independent sovereign States? "In this view of the case," continues "Historicus," "she might at any time, without an effort to throw off the yoke of the Federal Union, have negotiated a treaty with England." If by the use of these terms, "without an effort to throw off the yoke of the Federal Union," it is meant that South Carolina, continuing one of the United States, could, in good faith, have exercised the right of an independent sovereign by making a treaty with European Powers; it is only necessary to say that the illustration of "Historicus" is derived from his fancy and not from the fact; and he assumes that as claimed for these States, which neither they nor any one for them has asserted, while they continued under the Government of the United States. Although free, sovereign, and independent States, as Great Britain acknowledged them to be in 1783, when they agreed among themselves to commit to a common Government the exercise of certain powers, among which was that of making treaties, and each bound itself not to enter into any treaty or alliance, they ceased, as among themselves, to have a right to the exercise of this power. Their faith was pledged to each other for the due observance of this compact, which they had all made. But so far as any foreign Government was concerned, it might have made a treaty with either State; without in that doing an act, which either by the common Government of all the States, or by the States in their several capacities, could have been considered a cause of war. When Great Britain in 1783, recognised South Carolina as a free, sovereign, and independent State, in that was involved the recognition of the right of that State to enter into any treaty or compact it pleased with other States; and the right, moreover, with a due regard to the faith it pledged to such treaty or compact, to determine how far it would continue to be bound by its terms.

And when "Historicus" asserts that since the time "that the States chose for their own interests and in order to enhance their own importance to organise and present themselves to the world as a collective Federal Government, foreign nations have ceased to have anything to do, except with that Government, which for the purpose of all foreign relations, the States themselves constituted their representative and plenipotentiary," he states a proposition which in itself is admission of the existence of States, antecedent to the existence of their common Government. Nor does he show how, when or where, that antecedent existence ever ceased. The proposition, therefore, contains an admission fatal to himself, unless its effect is removed by the concluding portion of the sentence. That effect, however, is not removed; because the action of foreign Powers in treating with the common Government was made in conformity to the wish and by the consent of the States. Foreign nations so treating with that Government because of the wish and consent of the States; were controlled therein by the continuing wish and consent of the same States. And they have no more right to enforce the authority of that common Government over those States beyond the wish and consent of the States, than to impose over these States the authority of their own Government. To use the illustration of "Historicus," foreign nations have no more right to insist upon recognising the Government of the United States as the Government of the States which have withdrawn from it their wish and consent that it shall continue to be their Government, than have the same foreign nations to insist upon recognising as the representative and plenipotentiary of any Government one accredited in that capacity, but recalled by the Government, whose authority he had once received.
